In a taped address from the historic legislative chamber in Trenton, Whitman said a revolution is sweeping the country in which "people want less government, lower taxes and less spending from the federal government."

Resurrecting the themes that got him elected, Clinton's speech was pitched to the middle-class voters who deserted Democrats in November.

"I know a lot of you have your own ideas about tax relief," Clinton said. "My test for any proposal is: Will it create jobs and raise incomes? Will it strengthen families and support children? Will it build the middle class and shrink the underclass? Is it paid for?

"The plain fact is, you can't make a living on $4.25 an hour, especially if you have kids to support," the president said.

While calling for welfare reform, Clinton took a veiled swipe at Republican proposals that would deny cash and housing to teen-age mothers and bar benefit increases to women when they have more children.

"We shouldn't cut people off because they are poor, young, and unmarried," the president said. "We shouldn't punish poor children for the mistakes of their parents."

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

No morning classes, or no more Landon Lectures

Why do we have speakers like Perot if around 18,000 students are going to be tied up?

Another day, another Landon Lecture.

Sure, former presidential candidate Ross Perot came and spoke to a full house at Bramlage Coliseum. Sure, Perot made a dynamite speech. Sure, it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to hear him.

It was an average day for most of us anyway, because most of us had to go to class.

There were a lot of students at Bramlage. They were either lucky enough to have faculty excuse them for the morning, or they were lucky they could skip class without incident.

But a lot of students weren't at Bramlage. They had a test, a quiz, an assignment or an important lecture.

Why do we have speakers like Perot if around 18,000 students are going to be tied up?

Not only should we have no morning class for the next Landon Lecture, we should never have morning class on a Landon Lecture day. Not ever.

If President Wefald persists in keeping classes in session during Landon Lectures, we need to consider what the University's goal is in having the lectures. Is it to give the Landon Lecture Selection Committee and administration a chance to hobnob with prominent people, or are they for the students?

Ross Perot began his speech yesterday with, "I am here for the students."

We're sorry we missed you, Ross.

We had class.

Recent crimes are a sign of change

KADY MASSEY

Two people have been assaulted and robbed in Manhattan. Two people in completely different sections of town walking home, minding their own business, probably thinking about classes the next day or what they were going to have for dinner. Two guys with girlfriends and tests, who thought they'd just casually stroll home. Two people who weren't planning on getting jumped and robbed. But then, who does plan on it?

What are we coming to? Why do these things happen? I suppose the Republicans would blame the failure of the American family, and I might even buy that, but I have plenty of friends from single parent-families who are not park-stalking axe murderers.

The Democrats would probably say that these poor children, whoever they are, didn't get enough attention during childhood or that the victims were asking for it. I don't know about the rest of you, but I know for a fact that I have never asked to be clubbed about the head and shoulders and robbed.

As a registered Independent, I feel that I can say we need to put a stop to this, and I'm not real particular as to how. I don't have a plan for the nation. I'm not going to put out a call to arms, and I'm definitely not going to ask for the attackers' heads on a platter, although it's tempting.

I remember when I first moved here. I thought this place, especially campus, felt a lot like my hometown. Everyone was nice, the trees were beautiful, my classes were fine, and I thought that even if I get kicked out of school, I'd still stay. Then someone got attacked in the parking lot behind my dorm, and I wised up.

Maybe this is about the end of innocence. One of those guys is a friend of some of my friends, and they're scared and mad. They wanted me to write 'Mean People Suck' over and over. There's nothing quite like watching people you love realize the big ugliness is here now.

I'm tired of being safe. I don't enjoy parking by lights at night and checking my backseat for murderers. I really hate not being able to walk by myself at night. Every time I ask my fiancé to walk me anywhere, I feel like I'm giving in to them. If anyone should be scared, it should be the individuals who get their kicks from beating up poor college students. Besides, if it was money they were after, they were in the wrong part of town.

But justice is rarely ever served the way it should be. The police are not at fault here; those guys probably put a river and a state line between themselves and Manhattan by now. I hope they do get caught. I hope they do something stupid like brag about how easy it is to knock off guys in Manhattan. Maybe someone will overhear and call the cops, then the rest of us can breathe a little easier, but I doubt it.

How we deal with this is up to you. We can all start carrying guns, but then we'd probably be known as Fort K-State — small dictatorship and University. We can ask ourselves when and how this started. Who let this virus into our town, and how can we make it better? This is a virus. One town gets infected, and it spreads — one town fights back, and it slows. These two guys are a symptom of something that has been moving slowly through the country.

This whole thing makes me sick. The really sad part is that I know my one little column probably won't change that much. People will read it, but the bad guys won't go away. There have been too many attacks in the last couple of years for this one piece to change much.

Please prove me wrong.

K-State could learn from Ross Perot

Yes, it was a lot like having your grandfather stop by for a visit, but it was an honor nonetheless to have H. Ross Perot speak at yesterday's Landon Lecture in Bramlage Coliseum.

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

Is Perot just a palpitation in the pulse of the American body politic? No. While he may not be an FDR or Thomas Jefferson, he certainly ranks with figures like William Jennings Bryan and Eugene Debs as a voice of a disenfranchised segment of the American population.

Whether you agree with his politics or not, it's hard to deny that many Americans identify with his views and can-do attitude.

Perot is one of the few figures in public rhetoric today who doesn't just speak about our generation or refer to our generation — Perot actually has the humility to speak directly to Generation X, fully aware of the width of the generation gap but confident that it can be bridged with common sense and compassion, just like a grandfather.

Perot does not shrink away from taking on the ever-growing block of voters who call in to talk shows insisting that we younger people ought to feel privileged to pay some 30 percent of our wages in payroll taxes to bankroll their health care and retirement. It's political suicide to challenge the old folks, but he does, even though he's now one of them. (When younger people echo his rhetoric on entitlements, we're accused of generational warfare.)

Perot doesn't sweat challenging powerful transnational organizations whose interests seem to be unduly slanted toward quarterly profits for stockholders and away from long-term prosperity and opportunity.

Even if you can't stomach his politics, it's hard to refute the message that Perot brought to K-State. Instead of his usual topics (NAFTA, GATT, entitlements, the federal deficit) he chose to discuss our future and what we can do to improve it. It was a salutary reality check for someone to tell us how fortunate we are to be in college.

He didn't say it was easy for us to be here, but he was absolutely correct in pointing out that without the help of our parents, friends, and the people of the state of Kansas, many of us wouldn't all be able to pursue higher education.

Maybe some of us would rather be whiners all their lives who live in the past and dread the future.

Others will vainly try to prove to the world how self-made they are.

This non-traditional student believes that no one attending this University is here without some degree of divine and social intercession.

He also stressed the importance of persistent hard work.

In these days of hip class envy/disdain, many people believe that the vast majority of wealthy people attained their status by inheriting it or cheating other people when it is simply not true.

Most people are wealthy because of hard work and, as Perot pointed out, a little luck. Perot is himself an example of how hard work and persistence pay off.

We know that no effort brings no success; isn't it logical that working as hard as you can invites it

When K-State columnist William McKeen wrote last year that he was unashamed in his desire to attain financial success, he was swamped with letters chastising his so-called greed.

Perot correctly pointed out that wealth is itself not a means to happiness, and McKeen no doubt understands this.

What the people who protested his aims seek to do, along with the millions out there who are suspicious of anyone with money, is minimize the accomplishments of those who achieve financial success in order to exaggerate and validate more mediocre accomplishments.

It's a scenario right out of "The Fountainhead."

Our society, and certainly our generation, could use a dose of responsible self-interest right about now.

Our generation needs to be more motivated to work hard toward success in whatever way we as individuals define it. Once we've attained some success, we can then help those who haven't yet done so in spite of their efforts.

It's very difficult to help people realize their potential if we can't serve as an inspiration and role model to others in some way.

Once and for all, we have to quit settling for mediocrity and second-best results.

This is Perot's message and, as he might say, it's real simple, folks.

▶ ENGINEERING

Easy is difficult to define

Dear editor:

We are concerned about the mechanical engineering department's decision to eliminate DEN 450 from their humanities elective list based upon their perceived notions of the course difficulty level. Many of the other humanities electives are also "easy" courses, but have not been considered in their study. We do not wish to stoop as low as to mention which particular courses apply, for this is a direct insult to their respective professors.

As graduate students in engineering, we find that our easiest courses come from the mechanical engineering department. Does this mean that we should avoid them or that they should not count toward our degree? We have never received less than an 'A' in any of these courses. Does that mean that they are necessarily easy?

This debate over DEN 450 has led to a great deal of bad blood within the College of Engineering. As engineers, we are trained to work together to accomplish the tasks that we are presented. If the Mechanical Engineering department desires change in the course, they should work together with the professor responsible for the course and suggest changes. After all, we must practice what we teach.

▶ MULTICULTURALISM

Differences must be addressed

Dear editor,

In his case for why multiculturalism can't be taught, Jeremy Stephens provides a good column with honest frustration but a poor argument, by assuming and generalizing motivations for a multicultural agenda.

I agree with Stephens' insightful point that diversity of thought is what should be emphasized, especially in a university setting.

However, it is foolish of us to ignore the innate interdependence between a characteristic of like ethnicity and ideology.

Simply put, our individual make-up has a profound effect on how we are socialized.

Whether it is gender, age or ethnicity, there are some factors which play an integral part in shaping our views. A variable like culture influences our interpretation of events.

While different students may have shared relatively similar experiences, their cultural differences may provide them with very different perspectives.

If we were never judged by race or gender, then ethnic diversity would not be as essential, but the reality is that we are reacted to differently in part because of obvious characteristics like skin color.

Stephens prefaces his position by claiming that his individuality cannot be "represented by another individual's organization."

Similarly, we need to avoid making blanket assumptions about one "group." There is not a monolithic voice for any one group, whether black, white, young, old, male or female.

In the same vein as a multicultural curriculum advocate, I do not, as Stephens suggests, "propose" that multiculturalism will "give peace and harmony between people."

Certainly, it is no more a panacea than "slogans and buzzwords," rather it is an effort toward the ideal of peace and harmony.

No, variance in skin color does not alone create diversity, but it is an essential ingredient, because we live in a society where differences such as race matter. Why ignore this? As Jane Elliot, educator and consultant, urges: "Let us acknowledge our differences. Let's appreciate our differences."

Because a liberal arts education should provide a kaleidoscope view of our world where the color of life is not muted.

▶ PBS

PBS doesn't need tax money

Dear editor,

I would like to reply to the letter by Amy Brooks on PBS funding.

First of all, I would be distressed, too, if I had heard that the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services of the House Appropriations Committee had been plotting the demise of the entire Public Broadcasting System.

I would be up in arms complaining about that move because I, too, enjoy PBS. However, since that is not what is happening, I am strongly supporting the cutting of government funds (paid for by our tax dollars) that go to PBS.

Currently, government appropriations account for only 14 percent of the PBS budget. The rest comes from private corporate and personal donations. Therefore, after all government funds are cut, 86 percent of PBS's funding will remain.

This will not lead to the demise of PBS. I know that the president of PBS claims that 14 percent of the budget is their 'seed money' and that without it they will fail. But, he is only doing his job in attempting to get as much money for PBS as is possible.

By privatizing PBS, 300 million dollars a year will be cut from the budget. While this comes out to about $1.15 a person, this leads to less spending, which means less taxes that I have to pay.

If we adopt your attitude about this being a small amount of the overall federal budget and ignore this 300 million, we will not get rid of government excesses.

For an illustrative example that I'm borrowing from Newt Gingrich, consider the following scenario:

Pretend you are working for a large corporation, say IBM. You make $30,000 a year. You go to your boss and ask for a raise and want $200,000 a year. Will your boss reply, "Sure, Amy, no problem. That is only one-twentieth of 1 percent of our corporate budget, so I'll tell you what. We'll even give you $400,000 a year." That, of course, won't happen, so then why should we continue to give PBS $300 million because it is only one-twentieth of 1 percent of our federal budget?

Amy, if the management at PBS can't figure out how to raise the additional 14 percent of their budget they would lose by us (the taxpayers) not funding them, then they deserve to fold. But I think when push comes to shove, they will complain and speak of the end of PBS, but when they do lose their funding, they will just go out and solicit even more private (key word) donations. They have a lot of resources to tap. Barney generates $1 billion a year in merchandise sales. PBS just has to hit that 30 percent to get its $300 million back.

So, if you value public broadcasting as much as I do, please write your U.S. senators and representatives and tell them: Privatize, and save us the tax dollars. Make sure that the 104th Congress frees PBS from government constraints and funding to make PBS better than ever.

If the Discovery channel and the History channel can exist without government handouts, I think PBS can figure out how to do it, too.

This is not a drill.

Although they're not 'homeless' in the traditional sense of the word, some chapters on campus have to cope with being

WITHOUT A HOUSE

STORY BY LISA ELLIOTT ◆ ART BY SARA SMITH

When the word homeless is used, people think of bag ladies and winos.

That stereotype doesn't fit for some K-State students. They belong to fraternities or sororities that don't have houses. But not having a house doesn't stop them from being active on campus and in the community.

Although Delta Chi was on campus in the 1970s, the new Delta Chi chapter is relatively new to campus, Aaron Otto, Delta Chi housing chairman, said.

"For the past couple of years, we've been working to get our charter," Otto said.

The fraternity received its charter in October. The two years before, Delta Chi had a colony on campus.

"We're just having the struggles of being new on campus," he said.

Other relatively new chapters on campus besides Delta Chi are without houses as well.

Sigma Gamma Rho, an African-American sorority, received their charter in the fall of 1992, Waukeshia Gant, Sigma Gamma Rho member, said.

"Our sorority is the youngest on campus," Gant said.

Not many people know they are on campus. Three of the sorority members are on campus, and three other women are members of the sorority, Gant said.

"We just get together whenever," she said. When the group was larger, it had a set meeting time.

The sorority has been larger in the past, Gant said. She thought the members were better able to get to know one other with a smaller group. The size keeps the group closer, she said.

The sororities depend on word of mouth for recruiting new pledges, Gant said. Because the sorority is so new, few people know it exists on the K-State campus.

"We have flyers and invite people to our information meetings," she said.

Most black fraternities and sororities do not have houses on predominantly white campuses, Beverly McLean-Murray, adviser for Alpha Kappa Alpha, said. Houses cost a lot of money, and the number of members on campus is usually small.

AKA may have three houses in the nation, she said.

Dionne Lewis, AKA member, said she thought it was easy for her sorority to stay organized and informed because it is so small. She agreed that her sorority sisters look forward to getting together because they do not live together.

"It doesn't stop us from getting together," she said.

Lewis also said it was easier to have a private life because you weren't living with 40 other people who cannot help but know about your private life.

Delta Chi has a different problem — its members are just trying to keep everyone in the chapter informed of what's going on.

Despite the fact that the members are spread out all over town, Delta Chi still has functions and participates in other greek and campus activities.

Delta Chi and Kappa Kappa Gamma are working together on Earth Ball, which will be later this spring, he said.

Because of its size, Sigma Gamma Rho doesn't participate in activities the other sororities on campus participate in, Gant said.

"We can't participate with the organized houses because they ask for larger numbers than we have," she said.

Instead of participating in greek activities, the sorority is active in the national chapter's philanthropy, Habitat for Humanity, Gant said. Last year, the group helped the Crisis Center Inc. by collecting toiletries for battered women, and they helped with Special Olympics.

AKA has been active in planning the Martin Luther King vigil and luncheon with Alpha Phi Alpha, Lewis said.

"A lot of us are active in other organizations," Lewis said.

The sorority has regular chapter meetings and often gets together on the weekends to watch movies at a member's apartment, she said. Members also attend speakers and other campus events together.

"It's a new group, and it's great," Lewis said.

Even though they don't live under one roof and are a large group, Delta Chi members still have the opportunity to become close through small pledge classes. Delta Chi has two pledge classes in the fall and one pledge class in the spring, Otto said. They were urged to have three pledge classes by their national organization.

Otto said the pledge classes have 10 to 15 members, which makes it easier for pledges to get to know each other.

Although many chapters without houses are small, Delta Chi has 60 to 70 active members plus associate members, Otto said. Because the members live all over town, the group always has a different place to go.

Communication can be a problem between members. Delta Chi members spend lots of time on the phone, Otto said.

"We're learning what does and doesn't work and improving on it," he said.

Otto said he thought one advantage to living in different places was probably that the members don't get tired of seeing each other.

"Since you don't see each other every day, you want to see each other. You want to go and spend time together," Otto said.

For Delta Chi, having a home for their organization is a dream.

"A house is the No. 1 goal, the dream," Otto said.

Not every fraternity or sorority without a house is mentioned in this article. The Collegian does not mean to imply that the greek organizations mentioned are the only ones fitting this description at K-State.

There hasn't been a new fraternity house built on the K-State campus since the '70s, Otto said. The main reason is the expense of construction and purchasing land.

"Our projected costs range from about $1.4 million," he said.

Delta Chi hopes to locate a site and draw sketches for the house this spring and summer, Otto said. The location they hope to use is across from the Alpha Tau Omega house on Manhattan Avenue.

Land close to campus is sparse, and lots large enough to build houses on are outside walking distance from campus, Otto said. The hill above the B-2 parking lot is the only undeveloped site within walking distance.

"I think the University is hoping to develop a fraternity and sorority house row," he said.

Other fraternities or sororities wishing to build new houses could also build on the hill, Otto said.

"I think it will be a real showpiece for the University. The view is incredible," he said.

The next step after securing the site is fundraising, he said. The fraternity hopes to raise $250,000 to $350,000 for a down payment on the house over the next couple of years, Otto said.

"Within five or six years, there will be a new fraternity house up there," he said.

In the meantime, the fraternity is looking into moving as many members as possible into an apartment complex.. Otto said they hoped to have 10 to 15 apartments in one complex for members.

BIG 8 BASKETBALL

RUNDOWN

#7 Kansas 14-2 (4-1)

Upcoming games: Jan. 28 Connecticut at Kansas City, Mo., Jan. 31 Colorado, Feb. 4 Iowa State.

About the Jayhawks: KU rebounded with two impressive victories against K-State and Colorado. Saturday, KU will play at Kemper Arena against UConn.

#11 Iowa State 15-2 (2-1)

Upcoming games: J Jan. 28 K-State, Jan. 30 Missouri, Feb. 1 at Oklahoma, Feb. 4 at Kansas.

About the Cyclones: ISU proved that they are for real with a 69-65 victory over KU. Cyclones guard Fred Hoiberg scored 35 points against KU, and he was selected the Big Eight's Player of the Week.

#20 Missouri 12-2 (2-1)

Upcoming games: Jan. 25 Colorado, Jan. 30 at Iowa State, Feb. 4 at K-State.

About the Tigers: Mizzou dropped on the road to OSU for their first Big Eight loss of the season. Forward Derek Grimm is the Tigers-second-leading scorer with 11.9 ppg.

Okla. State 12-6 (2-1)

Upcoming games: Jan. 28 at Colorado, Feb. 1 at Nebraska, Feb. 4 CU.

About the Cowboys: OSU finally got on track in the Big Eight with a home victory against Mizzou. Big Country owned the paint against OSU, and Randy Rutherford was on fire from the field.

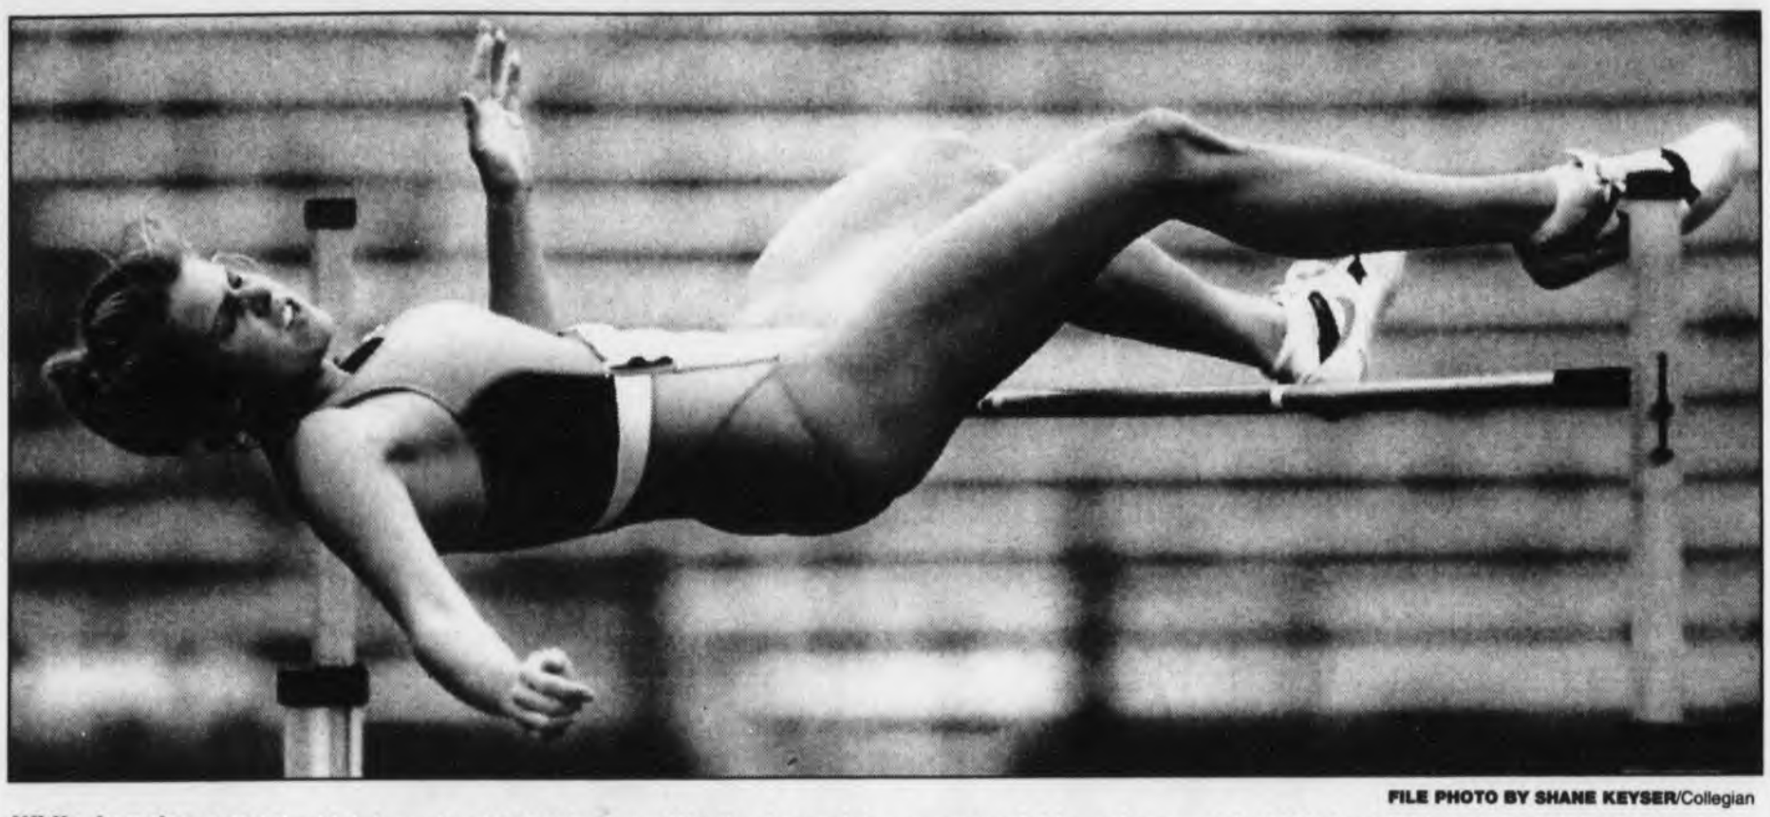
Nebraska 14-4 (1-2)

Upcoming games: Jan. 28 at Oklahoma, Feb. 1 Okla. State.

About the Cornhuskers: NU escaped UMKC with a 63-60 victory, which left coach Danny Nee wondering which team is going to show up for Big Eight play this week. After a tough game against OSU, the Huskers have a favorable home schedule.

#25 Oklahoma 14-3 (1-1)

Upcoming games: Jan. 25 at K-State, Jan. 28 Nebraska, Feb.1 Iowa State, Feb. 5 at Nebraska.



About the Sooners: Ryan Minor is the best shooting guard in the Big Eight. Currently, Minor is scoring 23.5 ppg, along with a 9.1 rebound average. The Sooners have three tough games coming up, but despite that the Sooners could be the surprise of the Big Eight this season. 14 wins is more than Sooner fans expected before the season.

Colorado 10-4 (1-2)

Upcoming games: Jan. 25 at Missouri, Jan. 28 Okla. State, Jan. 31 at Kansas, Feb. 4 at Okla. State, Feb. 8 Nebraska.

About the Buffaloes: Donnie Boyce was questionable before the game against KU because of a stress fracture. Ted Allen looked impressive with a dunk over KU's Greg Ostertag, but it wasn't enought to give the Buffs the win.

Gwen Wentland set the Wildcat Pentathlon on fire by breaking several records Friday.

She broke her own world pentathlon high-jump record by one-half inch with a leap of 6 feet, 4-1/2 inches.

"She is just so much stronger than before," K-State track coach Cliff Rovelto said. "People think there is some kind of trick to this. There's no secret — she has just been working hard.

"She realizes that there is a long way to go. That's the way it always is. You can't ever get satisfied, especially this early in the season."

Wentland recorded a three-peat by posting her third straight Wildcat Pentathlon victory with a new personal best of 4,115 points.

The women's pentathlon consists of the 60-meter hurdles, the long jump, the shot put, the high jump and the 800-meter run.

"She also had PR's (personal records) in the hurdles and in the shot put," Rovelto said. "Her score of 4,115 is a pretty significant mark."

Even with the records, Rovelto said he thinks Wentland could have jumped better.

"She really had to work to jump what she did," Rovelto said. "I really think she didn't jump as well as she could have."

Jill Montgomery finished second to Wentland with a mark of 4,001 points. This marks the second-best mark posted in the Big Eight Conference this season.

"Jill had a great meet," Rovelto said. "The score she posted is a great mark for this time of year."

Montgomery also set two meet records in the 60-meter hurdles and the shot put. Her time of 8.92 seconds in the hurdles broke the old mark of 8.99. Her 39'8" throw in the shot put broke the previous record, which was set in 1990.

The men's pentathlon had its share of records as well. K-State assistant coach Steve Fritz established a world record in the pentathlon with his score of 4,478.

Fritz scored more points than any other athlete in history in those five events while competing on a 200-meter track.

The men's pentathlon is similar to the women's, except the 800-meter run is replaced with the 1,000-meter run.

"If you average it out it's just under 900 points an event," Fritz said. "If I can keep that up in the decathlon outdoor, that's over 9,000 points. That's kind of exciting to think about."

Junior Travis Renner bettered his personal best of 3,650 by scoring 3,805. He now owns the top two scores in the Big Eight Conference so far this season.

Saturday, K-State, Kansas, Wichita State, Emporia State and Pittsburg State competed against one another in the KSU Invitational.

Kansas captured the men's side with 138 total points. K-State followed with 98 points, and Wichita State took third with 88 points.

However, jumpers Ed Broxterman, Steve Duren and Dante McGrew did not compete for K-State.

Broxterman is recovering from a ruptured appendix, which occurred after the Cats' first meet Dec. 9. Rovelto said he will compete next week at the MU/KU/KSU Triangular.

Duren strained his hamstring on his first attempt in the long jump and was forced out of the competition.

Duren posted a provisionally qualifying mark of 25'3-1/4" last week in the Wildcat Invitational.

"It would have been difficult for us to win the meet with all those guys out," Rovelto said.

The women, however, took first in the meet with 180 points. Kansas was second with 152 points, and Wichita State was third with 54.

Wanita Dykstra set a KSU Invitational record in the high jump with a leap of 6'0".

"It's exciting to watch her compete," Rovelto said. "She is jumping higher than Gwen was when she was a freshman, and it's still early in the year."

"If I can keep that up in the decathlon outdoor that's over 9,000 points. That's kind of exciting to think about."

Stires spent most of her junior-high years on the bench and Overlooked

TODD STEWART
Collegian

It's late 1989, and Shanele Stires is a senior in high school and starting point guard on her high-school basketball team.

This is her third year in the starting lineup for Salina Central, but she is not the go-to scorer for the team — her job is to throw it into the big girls inside.

However, in the second game of the year, against the third-ranked team in the state, something would change.

ONE on ONE

Central's highly recruited inside power would go down from an injury and leave the team searching for answers.

"All of the sudden, I am the tallest person on the court," Stires said. "And one thing led to another."

Thirty-three points later, Stires had led her team to victory by a margin of one, sealing up the win with two late free throws.

Stires' 33-point outburst bettered her previous career best by 23 points.

Even before her senior year coming-out party, the two-time, second-team all-Big Eight Conference selection encountered early troubles.

Stires' first basketball experience was during her seventh-grade year, when she filled in for an injury-depleted youth team.

"I was real bad. I was really just a body out there," she said. "But I enjoyed it. I was just no good."

She said she liked it enough to try out for her eighth-grade team. Stires explained a situation where almost 50 girls tried out, and only 20 made it.

The 20th initiate into the K-State 1,000-point club was cut from her eighth-grade basketball team.

Her ninth-grade year, Stires tried again. This time, there were no cuts. Only 15 girls had tried out, and the coaches decided to keep them all.

"They had a freshmen A team and a freshmen B team. The A team was for the better players. The B team was for the worse players," Stires said. "I basically sat at the end of the bench for the B team."

Stires attributes a basketball camp she attended the summer after that year to the big jump she made for her sophomore year.

■ In one year's time, Stires went from her seat on the end of the bench for the freshmen B team to a starting spot for the varsity team.

By the end of her senior year, Stires had still not proven enough to her critics.

"Everyone kept saying that I couldn't play Division I basketball," Stires said.

So that fall, she came to K-State on scholarship, but her scholarship was for track and field. She placed in the top three in the shot put at both the Big Eight Indoor and Outdoor Championships.

"But I missed basketball," Stires said. "I went to some of the games, and I kept saying to myself, 'I can do that.'"

■ She transferred away from K-State to Cloud County Community College to play basketball.

After a solid year there, she was heavily recruited for the sport she loved — basketball.

She transferred back to K-State and has been a fixture on the women's basketball team ever since.

"It's been a tough, tough road," Stires said.

■ After college, this social sciences major's plans are still up in the air, although Stires did hint that she might like to try her hand at coaching.

For now, she said she will just entrench herself in her love — basketball — for which she takes pre-game preparation very seriously.

"Sometimes, I go to the bathroom to

Sooners invade Bramlage Coliseum

OU proves critics wrong, reaches top 25 this week

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

At the beginning of the season, the so-called basketball critics said the Big Eight Conference would have a down season.

Oh, how they were wrong.

The Big Eight has four teams ranked in the Associated Press Top 25 Poll.

This includes Big Eight newcomer Kelvin Sampson's Oklahoma team, which at the beginning of the season had plenty of questions to answer. However, the Sooners are now sitting at 14-3 and 1-1 in the Big Eight.

The Sooners also made an appearance in this week's top-25 poll at No. 25.

OU will have its first opportunity to defend that ranking against K-State tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

That ranking and the Big Eight's leading scorer have K-State coach Tom Asbury concerned.

"They probably have the best player in the Big Eight — that's always a dangerous situation," Asbury said of Ryan Minor, who leads the Big Eight with a 23.5-point-per-game average.

"I talked with Kelvin before the season, and he knew that Ryan Minor was going to be the best player he ever coached," Asbury said.

Another reason the Sooners have been successful has been Sampson's presence in Norman. Sampson was hired at Oklahoma after Billy Tubbs exited for Texas Christian.

"Our kids thought I was crazy when I told them to sprint going to the end of the layup line," Sampson said. "I don't like 'Cool Daddies,' I don't like slop. I like things crisp."

Asbury said that attitude is what has made the Sooners winners so far this season.

"Kelvin does a really good job," Asbury said. "He's a disciplinarian and a fine coach. He gets his kids to play very, very hard.

"I've seen his teams play before when I was out west. Knowing Kelvin, it's probably his way or the highway."

Tonight's game against OU could be critical for the Cats. They have only nine games remaining, and they are sitting at the bottom of the Big Eight.

"I've sat and watched our game against Iowa State very slowly," Asbury said.

"We made mistakes in critical situations. We didn't dive on the floor when we needed to."

Another area that concerns Asbury in the Cats' recent four-game slide is that they have missed free throws in key situations.

"If you try to go through and strategically pick key times to miss free throws, that's exactly when we missed them," he said.

Asbury said tonight's game should be a perfect time for the Cats to break out of their slump.

"If we know we're good enough to be close, then we've got to be confident that we can play with anybody," he said.

Despite the four-game losing streak, K-State remains upbeat.

"These last three games we could have won," K-State guard Elliot Hatcher said. "We could be 4-1 right now."

■ After facing the Sooners, the Cats will travel to Ames, Iowa, to face Iowa State again.

This match-up will come just seven days after K-State played ISU at Bramlage.

In that game, the Cats were led by Belvis Noland who finished with 19 points.

The Cyclones were led by Fred Hoiberg, who finished with 24 points.

K-State was burned inside as Iowa State center Loren Meyer scored 17.

Despite Iowa State's victory in Manhattan, Hoiberg said the Cats are a dangerous team.

"They're a good ball club," Hoiberg said.

"They're probably the most athletic team in the Big Eight."

Stires' dress key in pre-game and talk to myself to psyche me up," Stires said. "I say 'This is what you need to do,' or, 'This is how to get it done.'"

Stires' dress also goes into the pre-game preparation.

"Different games, I wear different socks. One game I will wear a thick one and a thin one, another game I will wear real low socks. Other games, I'll wear one high and one low sock.

"It just depends on how I feel going into the game," Stires said.

Pre-game pep talk, socks and her coach-rationed chewing gum go into the pre-game routine for the 5'11" senior Wildcat post player.

With this season still far from over, Stires has in mind what she would like to accomplish.

"I want to win the Big Eight Tournament, go to the NCAA Tournament, and then go from there," she said. "I know it's going to take some serious effort on my part.

"We deserve it," she said. "We've worked too hard."

Cats don't come close enough

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

It was a tale of two close games.

But this tale didn't have a happy ending for K-State fans.

The Cats lost both games, Kansas 78-74 and Iowa State 79-73, extending their losing streak to four straight games.

"Our guys have played hard," said K-State coach Tom Asbury, whose team lost both games last week, dropping their record to 10-7, 1-4 in the Big Eight.

"I don't want to say we are overachieving, but I think we are playing as hard as we can. We got to win some games," Asbury said.

Against Kansas, turnovers were the norm for K-State.

The Cats turned the ball over 23 times, with 15 turnovers in the first half. Even with a high amount of turnovers in the first half, the Cats were within three until Kansas guard Greg Gurley hit a 35-footer for three points to extend the KU lead to six points, making it 38-32 at halftime.

In the second half, senior forward Belvis Noland caught on fire, scoring 16 of his career-high 23 points during a 10-minute stretch.

"Belvis really picked it up at the end. He is very streaky. He is a good shooter. If he gets his confidence, and you leave him open and let him get his feet set, he is going to do the job," Asbury said.

Even with Noland's efforts, the Cats fell short.

"I told Tom after the game that they outplayed us," Kansas coach Roy Williams said. "We just made a few good plays at the end."

The Cats came home Saturday and lost to an experienced Iowa State team. The Cats' lack of experience was the main problem.

"Probably the major difference in that game is just experience," Asbury said. "They made the big plays when they had to, and we didn't."

Both teams exchanged leads during the first half, with either team leading by more than three points until Fred Hoiberg closed the first half with three consecutive three-pointers to give Iowa State a six-point lead at the intermission.

Although the Cats held Hoiberg to 8 of 20 field goals in the game, he still scored 24 points.

The Cats started the second half on a 12-7 run, which tied the game at 47-47 on a Belvis Noland three-pointer at the 14:26 mark.

Noland led the Cats off the bench with 19 points. Demond Davis scored 14, and Tyrone Davis had 11.

K-State shot 45.2 percent from the floor, which was the best mark the team has shot since shooting 48 percent against Marshall.

Although the Cats stayed close for most of the second half, they would never lead.

"We played real hard and real spirited and got the ball when we needed it," said Iowa State coach Tim Floyd, whose team's record improved to 15-2 and 2-1 in the Big Eight.

This was apparent at the 1:24 mark when Iowa State center Loren Meyer rebounded a Jacy Holloway shot off the lip of the rim and put in for two with one second on the shot clock.

"That's what quality teams will do," Asbury said. "That's what experience will do for you. Look at the Big Three. There's the difference in the game right there — Hoiberg, Holloway and Meyer."

Hoiberg led Iowa State with 24 points and two steals. Both Julius Michalik and Meyer poured in 17 points.

Sooners, Cowgirls drop Cats in Big 8

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team fell flat this weekend by dropping games to conference foes Oklahoma and Oklahoma State in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cowgirls relied on solid post play and the hot hand of Regi Smith to down the Cats, 72-63, Friday.

The Sooners' balanced attack left five players in double figures as they held on to win by a score of 79-70 Sunday.

The losses dropped K-State to 10-7, 2-3 in the Big Eight.

"I think our intensity was lacking," senior post Shanele Stires said. "Our enthusiasm and our general attitude was bad from the beginning. I don't think we came ready to play, and it showed."

Prolonged scoring droughts in the first half cost the Cats in both games.

Oklahoma State reeled off a 23-8 run in the last 8:08 of the first half, and Oklahoma held K-State scoreless for more than seven minutes on the way to a 16-2 run.

"That's what's been killing us all year," Stires said.

The Cats have been struggling with their offensive execution of late.

"OSU had us standing, and that's one thing we can't do offensively."
MISSY DECKER
K-State wing

"We need to get quicker ball movement; we need to get more movement," guard Missy Decker said. "When we did that, we got shots.

"OSU had us standing, and that's one thing we can't do offensively."

Stires led all scorers in both games, putting in 21 points against OSU and 24 against Oklahoma.

Freshman Brit Jacobson contributed 13 and 12, and Decker added eight and 14.

Adding to the Cats' troubles, guard Shawnda DeCamp is in a shooting slump.

DeCamp scored a combined nine points on three-of-nine shooting this weekend and missed all five of her shots from behind the three-point arc.

"Everybody knows she's got to shoot well for us to be successful, so they're chasing her and not letting her use picks," Coach Brian Agler said.

"People are doing a good job of making her do different things to score instead of just three-pointers."

Despite the Cats' scoring woes, Agler said he feels the defensive intensity must pick up for K-State to start winning again.

"Right now, lack of defensive execution is hurting us," he said.

"Sometimes your shots are going to go, and sometimes they're not, but defensively we have to play consistent. When you hook up with a team defensively, it will carry you through the tough times."

Reader hurt by friend's sexist remarks

Dear Cassandra,

I have this friend who used to be really respectful about women. I never heard him make a snide remark or talk about women as objects. Now, whenever he refers to women it's about how attractive they are or aren't. He always puts the women he works with in two categories: the ones who would be good in bed or the ones who have attitudes. I don't want to confront him because I know he's been hurt in the past, but I'm starting to be uncomfortable being around him. What should I do?

Signed, Unhappy

Dear Unhappy,

Just because your friend has been recently hurt does not mean that he has the right to treat all women like objects. Talk to him and tell him you don't appreciate his oinkish comments.

Cassie

Bands get ready to rumble

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

Puke Weasel. The name brings fear to the hearts of bands. Especially those that must compete with the band.

The Manhattan four-man spearhead of metal recently changed its name to Spine. It also played at Snookie's Bar Sunday night.

The show's first course was an appetizer of boiled Invisibles, a medley of ingredients from different eras in Manhattan music history.

"It's kind of weird. We're all from different bands," said Ralph Reichert, lead singer and former frontman for Yaz Pistachio.

The Invisibles, which opened for Spine, is scheduled to appear tonight to compete in the Battle of the Bands.

The Invisibles has Derek Macy, formerly of Roach Factory, on guitar; Bill Hughes on bass guitar; and Kendrick Beachy on drums. Both Hughes and Beachy are occasional members of the existing band Carpetburn.

On Sunday night, when the Invisibles took the stage, the red lights came on as the main lights went out. A bluesy, early AC/DC rhythm emerged from the stacks, and two girls in the DJ balcony swung their heads in groove with the music. Reichert thrashed slowly around the stage, lifting the mike to grind out his vocals.

The band has been together for about a month. Reichert said the members just want to have fun, and they would be satisfied just playing in Manhattan.

"This is where we live. This is our town. When we walk on stage, it's about becoming a dream," Reichert said.

Spine will also return for the Battle of the Bands competition and will perform on Thursday night.

If Sunday night was any accurate predictor of what awaits patrons of the contest Thursday, look out.

"All right, let's get things started," Andy Sample, lead singer of Spine, said as he took the stage.

Guitars, drums and bass erupted, spurned on by Sample's growling vocal style.

Before a girl in a booth near the bar could say, "This bartender makes the best amaretto sours I've ever tasted," the pit exploded.

One guy jumped on stage, ran around and dove into the crowd. Three people caught him and brought him safely to the ground. Two more hopped up and performed the same stunt.

A partly sober patron righted a monitor amp just as it was knocked off balance by two flailing moshers.

Spine walked through several of the classic Puke Weasel tunes, such as the timeless "Burning the Dog" and "Dunt," along some new ones, spawned with the help of new guitarist Mike Custer.

SHOW TIME
The Battle of the Bands will be from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. today and Thursday at Snookie's Bar.

The majority of this band has played together for about three or four years. As a result, it has a cohesiveness that lies somewhere between friendship and sonic genius.

Spine will record its first full-length album next week in Lawrence. It is due out in stores March 1. Look for it.

And look for a good show tonight and Thursday night at Snookie's.

Students say speech was politics as usual

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

President Clinton, among other things, proposed tax breaks for college tuition and raising the minimum wage in his State of the Union address Tuesday night.

Opponents have criticized Clinton's plan, saying it will cause a loss in jobs and inflation.

Roger Trenary, economics instructor, said any job loss caused by raising wages 20 percent would be trivial in economic terms.

On a national level, as many as 100,000 people may lose jobs, depending on how much wages were raised, he said.

"There are only 2-1/2 to 4 million people that work at minimum wage out of a labor force of 150 million. In terms of inflation and the overall economy, it's not a big deal," he said.

Trenary used the example of the state of New Jersey, which raised its minimum wage, creating more jobs in the state.

Richard Hanson, senior in mechanical engineering, said all politicians have lost sight of the average working citizen.

"They are so far out of touch with us. Whatever they say is not what's going on in Manhattan, Kansas," he said.

Hanson was working on differential equations in Cardwell Hall and missed the address.

He said he would not have watched it anyway.

"Talk is cheap. Saying you're going to do something is one thing, but actually doing it is another," he said.

Some K-State students did not express concern about the president's speech.

Kale Campbell, freshman undecided, was watching "Grace Under Fire."

"Politics don't interest me. I'm apathetic. When it comes time to affect me, then I'll care," he said.

Campbell said he plans to vote in campus and state elections because those politicians make the decisions that will directly affect him.

"That stuff affects us more than the stuff decided in D.C.," he said.

For Perot, happiness came with children

corporation, said humbleness, concern for others and determination were the keys to success.

Perot borrowed $1,000 from his wife in 1962 to start a one-man processing company named Electronic Data Systems.

He later sold EDS to General Motors for $2.5 billion and started a new computer service company named Perot Systems.

Although Perot is financially successful, he said wealth doesn't ensure happiness.

"I've had the interesting experience of living across the economic spectrum," he said. "Thanks to the success in our company, I've been successful, but I'm not one bit happier than I was as a boy in Texas during the Depression."

Perot said although he came from a modest background, he was born rich because of his wonderful parents.

He said he gained happiness not through the success of his business, but through the birth of his five children and eight grandchildren.

"You will never have greater joy or greater wealth in your life than your children, and I tell you that from personal experience," Perot said. "You may be saying 'I want all these things,' but do you know what happens to all those things when you buy them? They break."

Perot talked about his past, but also focused on the future of the job market and the effect of NAFTA on America.

"Washington said that there were 700,000 jobs created. That's hot air that would make a helium balloon go to it's maximum altitude," Perot said. "If you want to have some fun, call. Ask where all those people are working."

Perot also talked about the possibility of an increase in the minimum wage in a press conference after the Landon Lecture.

"It needs to be a solid plan," Perot said.

"The government needs to be sure raising minimum wage will benefit and not hurt people," Perot said.

City to consult with attorney about ADA

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

The city of Manhattan will be conferring with an attorney in a hearing with Lewis "Tobie" Tyler regarding his 628 complaints that the city is in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act.

The 628 complaints are in addition to an earlier lawsuit Tyler filed against the city concerning city violations of the ADA, including absence of sidewalk curb cuts.

An expert on the Americans with Disabilities Act from the Kansas Attorney General's office will be asked to be present at the hearing to act as a facilitator.

The City Commission agreed to research complaints from Tyler regarding the accessibility of city facilities and programs for disabled people.

Tyler presented the commission with 628 complaints in regard to specific structures of buildings in the city he thinks are not convenient for people with disabilities.

The city responded to the complaints and informed Tyler whether or not they agreed.

The city said the complaints were valid, and modification of certain structures in the city was necessary based on the ADA.

One of Tyler's requests was that a directory sign in braille be installed at the City Hall front door.

City officials said ADA regulations do not require a sign of that kind for newly constructed buildings.

ADA law requires specific modifications on all new buildings, but the law doesn't apply for those buildings already in existence.

Mary Butler, city commission member, said many of Tyler's complaints were things the city already had addressed but that Tyler in some way did not find satisfaction with.

One of his complaints included the need for a van-accessible parking spot in the City Commission parking lot, Butler said. There is one at the west end, but maybe that isn't the place he thinks it should be, she said.

Tyler wants changes in existing structures to take place, but the city wants to comply with ADA law and only modify the plans for new buildings built since the ADA law was passed in 1990.

Tyler said he would like to talk with the board and reach some agreement on the issue.

"I want to sit down at the table and hash it out," said Tyler.

"The commission should be trying to help people, not just save money," he said.

Ann Christian, board member, said the commission is making progress.

"It takes a long time, maybe years," she said. "To make progress for making the city more accessible for those disabled, we need to keep pushing forward."

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Lecture time inconvenient

Stewart, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said.

Not enough people in the class showed an interest in attending the lecture, so the class took place as usual.

"It's a very small class. I think if we had asked, we could have probably gone. I'm glad I went because he gave us seven pages of notes," Ryan Province, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said.

The Intro to Political Science class still took place, but the instructor allowed the students to leave early to go to the lecture.

"Our teacher told us that if we were going to see Ross Perot, we had to sit in the back of the room so we wouldn't disrupt the class when we left," Cody Downard, senior in park resource management, said.

The instructor told the students he had heard Perot speak enough and didn't want to hear him again, so class would not be canceled for his speech, Downard said.

Students in Abnormal Psychology also had to choose between class and the lecture.

"I was one of the few people in class today. I would have gone if we didn't have class. I would have liked to see Perot," Kathy Markway, junior in human development and family studies, said.

The short notice of Perot's visit played a role in the classes not being canceled.

"We've known about Perot's visit since December," said Charles Reagan, chair of the Landon Lecture Series and assistant to the president.

Since the Landon Lectures are scheduled at times that most students are in class, some feel the lectures should be scheduled at a different time.

"I think it is up to the individual instructor. I wish the lectures were later in afternoon and not during class time," Catherine Cozzarelli, assistant professor of psychology and Psychology of Women instructor, said.

Another instructor also said he felt the lectures should not disrupt class and could take place at another time.

"I think the lectures should take place during a time when class is not going on. The instructors spend 50 to 60 hours planning a course at the beginning of the semester, and then it's disrupted by a lecture," Robert Linder, professor of history, said.

"It would be nice if they could coordinate the lectures with the class schedules. There's just got to be a better way to do this," Linder said.

Linder did not cancel his Modern Era class at 11:05 Tuesday and permitted students to use one of their six allowed absences to attend the lecture.

Linder said scheduling the lectures in the evening would permit students to attend and not conflict with classes.

It would be a better solution than trying to run a lecture series and a university at the same time, Linder said.

Since the administrators do not have a blanket policy, the decision lies in the hands of the instructors themselves.

One administrator said he doesn't think the administration should dictate the cancellation of classes for a lecture.

"It's a judgment call left to the instructors, not an external person," said John Fairman, assistant vice president of University relations.

Fairman said the Landon Lectures have always been at 10:30 a.m. with the exception of one.

The time works well, and he was unaware of complaints or problems with the schedule, Fairman said.

Mill memories come to a close condition in 1983.

The flour mill had the reputation as the best there was, Rousey said.

"Image — they just don't give that away," Rousey said.

The history behind the building and the company is extensive.

Jim Padgett, Manhattan resident, said many people had connections to the mill.

"This is where we played in the summer," he said. "We used to play hide-and-seek under the building."

Padgett said there were about 10 first and second graders who played in the area of the mill, at an old pond called Mike's Pond and around what was called Hobo Jungle.

"We had quite a time," Padgett said. "but tearing it down is probably for the good of the community."

Before it is torn down, the state wants to get rid of most of the assets on the property.

However, the auction's attendance wasn't necessarily about property. Some were there to say goodbye to Manhattan Milling.

"I just came to see it sell. My son worked here for three years," Marion Yoder, Chase County resident, said.

Others in attendance were operators of large farms, grain elevators and feed mills.

Kull Auction & Real Estate Inc., Topeka, clerked the auction. They said they registered more than 90 bidders from four different states.

Customers of the mill will have to find new places for their business because there are no other mills or elevators in Manhattan.

The nearest elevator is COOP, which is four miles east on U.S. Highway 24.

The local 4-H program will also have to go elsewhere.

Manhattan Milling sponsored plaques for the fair, provided feed for 4-H members and purchased livestock at the fair.

"We did all we could to help," Rousey said.

Although 4-H will find a new supporter, members of the community said they are sad to see the long-time fixture of the community go.

"The COOP will pick up the slack of the 4-H programs," James Yoder, former Manhattan Milling employee and current employee of COOP, said.

"But every time you lose a business in this town, it hurts," Yoder said.

Everything listed on the sale bill sold.

"We are selling the whole shoot 'n' shabang," Dan Kull, auctioneer, said to the bidders.

The only thing that Rousey still owned, his truck, was added as a last-minute sale.

The truck was a 1978 Ford with a recently rebuilt diesel Caterpillar engine with only 20,000 miles. Bidding started at $6,000 and was dropped all the way to $1,000 to get a starting bid.

"He said, 'Sell it, folks,'" Kull said.

Rousey paced in front of the truck with his head hung low. He did not even look at the crowd of bidders standing around the truck.

"It's the last thing I own of this business. It has some rust spots, but it is a good truck," Rousey said before the bidding started.

The truck sold for $6,100.

The final dollar amount for the sale was a little more than $40,000. The structures will have to be disassembled and carried away before March 30, or they will be bulldozed.

All the new owners of the buildings met after the auction. It was discussed how the owners would each take their portion of the buildings.

When asked about future plans without the mill, Rousey looked down at the floor and said he was going to retire and do whatever he wants.

"It has practically been my whole life," Rousey said. "I'm just retiring, even though it was forced."

ACCESS THE FUTURE

Today at noon in the Union Courtyard, there will be an Access the Future forum focusing on open admissions.

Access the Future is a program set up by student government designed to create a grass-roots base of Kansas citizens that will assist the student body in communicating concerns about increasing tuition and proposed changes to the current open admission policy to the Kansas Legislature.

Peterson hits half-way point

STEVE YOUNG
Collegian

Jeff Peterson, student body president, and Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, are in the twilight of their administration.

On March 28, 1994, Peterson and Finkeldei announced their candidacy and established the themes of their campaign.

The four ideas that dominated the pair's discussions were education issues, fighting fee increases, open communication with students and an executive-branch salary reduction.

Peterson and Finkeldei have had nearly a year to work on fulfilling their themes. Here is a look at the actions the campaign themes have produced.

■ Education issues

From the beginning, Peterson and Finkeldei said taking a stand on education issues was their top priority.

A year later, education issues are still what the two are most concerned about, Peterson said.

"That's been what we've talked about all year long," Peterson said. "As soon as we were elected, all summer and all fall we put together a project called Access the Future."

Access the Future has three objectives related to higher education.

The objectives are to fight tuition increases, to maintain open admissions to state universities and to work together to make a difference.

The student body presidents of all six Kansas Board of Regents universities have agreed to fighting tuition increases.

Audrey Nogle, student body president at Fort Hays State University, and Sherman Reeves, student body president at the University of Kansas, have not agreed to maintaining open admissions, Peterson said.

"What we're trying to do is something that is important so that students can afford to come. So that future students, my nephew that's 2 years old, when he's 20 years old he'll be able to come to K-State," Peterson said.

Going out and speaking to students, teachers and active community members is meant to generate action from the listeners.

With this support in front of the Kansas Legislature, Peterson said he hopes the campaign is more effective.

Peterson said $5,500 in private funds have been raised to help finance Access the Future. This is the first time private funds have been raised for such a program, he said.

Peterson said Access the Future is probably going to be the most significant thing in the Legislature that deals with students this year.

■ Fighting Fee Increases

As candidates, Peterson and Finkeldei said they weren't going to approve any fee increases.

With a two-thirds majority of Student Senate required to override a presidential veto, campus-fee increases can be made as difficult as possible, Peterson said recently.

No additional money is being requested for Wednesday is K-State scholarship deadline

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

More than $4 million in academic and performance scholarships are awarded to K-State students each year.

"We'll receive about 7,000 scholarship applications for the $4 million in funds," Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said.

The deadline for scholarship applications is Wednesday. Students can pick up and return applications to Fairchild 104.

"It takes one application to apply for all scholarships campus-wide," Moeder said. "That includes departmental and college scholarships."

Sherry Ahlgrim, junior in animal science and industry, has applied for scholarships since she was a senior in high school.

"It is a simple process," Ahlgrim said. "It only took half an hour to fill it out."

"In addition to the University process, students should take the opportunity of scholarship opportunities across the country," Moeder said.

Scholarships can also be identified by doing a national search.

"Students can do their own search at the library or could pay someone to do it for them," he said.

Moeder said some companies offer scholarship searches for a fee, and in some cases no output is given to the students.

The financial aid office has a national database, CASHE, that is available for student use at a fee of $15.

Students can complete a one-page application and return it to the financial aid office to run the search.

"K-State students bring with them $1.25 million in outside scholarship money each year," Moeder said, "so there are opportunities out there, and students might as well compete."

SCHOLARSHIP INFORMATION

All academic departments and colleges offer scholarships for:

- Students from many of the various counties in Kansas.
- Students who graduated from certain high schools.
- Students with a background in 4-H.
- Students whose parents are members of various civic and fraternal organizations.

Source: Office of Student Financial Assistance

ANDREA COREY/Collegian

More than 700 students used the service last year.

Jake Breeding, sophomore in pre-health professions program, participated in a national scholarship search in October.

"I was matched up with six scholarships," Breeding said.

He said it took less than three weeks.

"I would encourage other students to take the opportunity and participate in the CASHE search," he said.

Moeder said students should contact or visit the financial aid office or the scholarship representitives within their academic department to seek more information about scholarship opportunities.

New intersections slated for Tuttle Creek Blvd.

MIKE HILL
Collegian

The terror of the Bluemont Avenue, Tuttle Creek Boulevard intersection will soon be a thing of the past.

Motorists will have three different intersections to choose from when they go to Wal-Mart instead of the chaotic Bluemont Avenue, Tuttle Creek Boulevard intersection.

The Kansas Department of Transportation is in the process of adding a new intersection on McCall Road that will connect it to Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

KDOT has also started the process to obtain the land to create an intersection that will make Leavenworth Street cross Tuttle Creek Boulevard and continue past Village Inn on what is now Frontage Road.

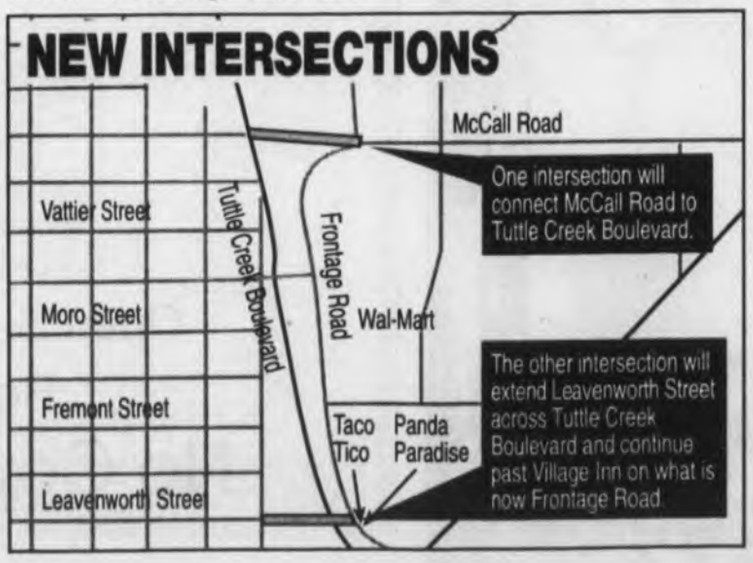
Jerry Petty, director of community development for the city of Manhattan, said the new intersections should help the traffic problem.

"We're trying to relieve the traffic at the intersection of Tuttle Creek Boulevard and Bluemont Avenue and also at the Frontage Road, Tuttle Creek Boulevard intersection by providing another access opportunity for the motoring public," Petty said.

The funding for this project is a grant from the state for 75 percent of the project. The rest will be funded by local interests.

The total cost of the project is expected to be $2.39 million.

The city is also planning to reconstruct all of Frontage Road before the intersections begin construction.



"The Frontage Road project is going to be funded by the city of Manhattan," Petty said.

Petty said KDOT is planning to start the construction in August and be completed with the project in the spring of 1996.

The new intersections will force two local businesses on the corner of Frontage Road and Tuttle Creek Boulevard to relocate.

The city is in the process of Student Publications board votes to change by-laws

NOLAN SCHRAMM
MIKE HILL
Collegian

Students who work in paid positions at the Collegian, Royal Purple and advertising department will not be allowed to have positions on the Board of Student Publications.

The board voted 4-1 in favor of the proposal in a meeting Wednesday night.

This would prevent those staff members from seeking office for the duration of their employment by Student Publications Inc.

The Board consists of five elected students, three faculty representatives and the three advisors from Student Publications Inc.

Aaron Otto, student board member, brought the proposal forward.

He said it would be a conflict of interest for students on the board to also work in the publications department because a person on the board could ask for favors in getting a job at the Collegian or the Royal Purple, or the Collegian or Royal Purple could help out someone on the board.

"I hate to exclude anyone, but it's too much of a problem to have them on the board," Otto said.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, said he opposed the proposal because people on the board who are not working for the publications have no working knowledge of what goes on and would thus be less informed on making important decisions.

"I'd be a little conscious of closing the door to them. Their points of view are important, too," he said.

Otto said former employees of the student publications could still be on the board.

▶ CLINTON WAITS ON RAISING THE RATES, PROMOTES MIDDLE CLASS ON TOUR

KUTZTOWN, Pa. (AP) — Hoping to avoid tangling with Republicans, President Clinton will hold off proposing a specific increase in the minimum wage until he first tries to work with Congress to raise the rate, the White House said today.

"His inclination is to go with 75 cents over two years, but obviously he wants to go with something that can be enacted," Labor Secretary Robert Reich said. He warned that if Republicans settle on a rate significantly less than $5 and hour, "we are going to have a very serious debate."

Clinton defended the merits of a pay raise for the nation's lowest wage earners in his State of the Union address Tuesday, but did not say how high the $4.25 rate should go.

Press Secretary Mike McCurry said the decision not to propose a specific increase did not signal a weakening of Clinton's resolve to raise the rate. Instead, the White House was afraid a specific proposal would die outright in the hands of GOP opponents, he said.

"We're not going to send any proposal to Congress that's just going to gather dust," McCurry said.

The president traveled to this mostly white, middle-class home of Kutztown University to build momentum from the address. He was promoting his "Middle Class Bill of Rights," which offers tax cuts to families with children, parents with kids in college and people saving for retirement.

It also would consolidate dozens of federal job-training programs, giving the money directly to people to use at training centers of their choice.

Clinton did not mention the minimum wage, but he asked for the crowd's support in a briefer version of his lengthy Tuesday night speech.

"We're trying to change the focus of the national government to the grassroots," Clinton said.

McCurry said White House lobbyists plan to work with congressional leaders and push for a minimum-wage bill.

"If they say ... they're not willing to have that discussion, we'll have to come back to drafting our proposal," McCurry said.

McCurry said the White House has been surprised that Republicans appeared open to talks about the minimum wage, and wanted to work with the GOP before pushing a specific measure.

He said reports that Clinton wants a $5 an hour rate are "in the general direction" of the president's plans. That kind of increase would make the rate more fair without costing jobs, McCurry said.

▶ U.S., VIETNAM WORK TOGETHER TO FIND MIAs, CREATE NEW DIPLOMACY

HANOI, Vietnam (AP) — A joint team of U.S. and Vietnamese investigators have recovered remains believed to be those of missing American servicemen, a U.S. officer said today.

Vietnamese and American specialists dug the remains from aircraft crash sites in a search that ended today, said Air Force Major Randall Garrett, operations officer for the U.S. MIA office in Hanoi. It was the latest in a series of field operations that began in 1988.

Forensic anthropologists will study the remains before sending them next month to the U.S. Army's Central Identification Laboratory in Hawaii for possible identification, Garrett said.

The Defense Department lists 2,211 servicemen as unaccounted for from the Vietnam war, including 1,621 in Vietnam. U.S. officials say two-thirds of them are known to be dead, but their bodies have never been recovered.

President Clinton has said the establishment of full diplomatic relations with Vietnam depends on Hanoi's help in solving the remaining cases.

The United States and Vietnam plan to open liaison offices in each other's capitals within the next several days in a sign of recognition of Vietnamese efforts so far. The offices are a transitional step toward the eventual exchange of ambassadors.

Washington agreed in February to the opening of offices, but progress has been slowed by differences over the status of diplomatic properties abandoned after the war. The two sides have initialed an agreement to return the properties and are now close to signing the agreement, U.S. officials say.

Vietnam turned over the possible remains of as many as 68 U.S. servicemen last year. Investigators dug some of them from crash and burial sites, and Vietnamese villagers voluntarily handed over others.

The next MIA field search will begin late next month, Garrett said.

▶ INVESTIGATORS DISCOUNT RUDDER, HYDRAULIC FLUID CRASH THEORIES

PITTSBURGH (AP) — There is no evidence to indicate a crashed USAir jet's rudder mechanism was accidentally thrown into reverse or that dirty hydraulic fluid caused it to malfunction, federal officials were told Wednesday.

Both theories had been advanced earlier in the investigation of the Sept. 8 crash of USAir Flight 427. The crash near Pittsburgh International Airport killed 132 people.

But investigators who X-rayed, poked inside and ran other tests on the plane's rudder mechanism found no evidence that could happen, Paul Cline, a flight-control engineer with Boeing Commercial Airplane Group, told a National Transportation Safety Board hearing.

"Based on tests we've done, the power control unit did what the control system told it to do," Cline said during the third day of the NTSB hearing on the crash of the Boeing 737-300 aircraft.

A lawyer for some relatives of crash victims said it was wrong for engineers from USAir, Boeing and Parker Hannifin Corp. to be taking part in the investigation because they have a stake in its outcome.

"It's a little bit like the building inspector letting the contractor inspect his own house to see that it complies with the building code," John Gismondi said.

Police Reports

Reports are taken directly from the daily logs of the K-State and Riley County police departments. Because of space constraints, we do not list wheellocks, calls for escorts and minor traffic violations.

K-STATE POLICE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 24

At 9:15 p.m., an anonymous male reported a hit-and-run at the south Union parking lot, A-30. The male said the car that hit and ran left its bumper and some other parts behind at the scene. The car that was hit belonged to Christine McIlvain of 1516 McCain Lane. The amount of damage was $500. The bumper left behind looks like it belongs to a Chrysler product.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25

At 2:00 a.m., Kyle Breer was arrested for a DUI on Kimball Avenue. The arresting officer stopped the car for a traffic violation and, upon speaking with the subject, suspected him of driving under the influence. Testing was done, and Breer was transported to Riley County Jail.

At 3:35 a.m., Chris House, a Goodnow Hall receptionist, reported that a female subject on the second floor had taken an overdose of medication. Riley County ambulance and officers responded to the call.

RILEY COUNTY POLICE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 24

At 11:41 a.m., a bomb threat was reported at Manhattan High School. The police interviewed an individual, who was released without being charged. The case is currently under investigation.

At 3:49 p.m., Officer Kellogg arrested Shane Lingenfelter, 301 Poliska Lane, for aggravated battery. Bond was set at $5,000.

At 5:43 p.m., Pamela M. Cunningham, 1012 Yuma St., reported being a victim of a battery. A report was filed.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25

At 1:47 a.m., Joe Danny Riddle was arrested for a DUI. He was released on $500 bond.

At 2:19 a.m., Investigator Hannes arrested Melvin Taylor, 122 N. 11th St., Apt. 3, for three counts of forgery. Bond was set at $3,000.

At 3:28 a.m., Matthew Cohen was arrested by the Wichita Police Department in Wichita on a Manhattan warrant for failing to appear for diversion conference. He was released on $1,000 bond.

Cruising through Rusty's Last Chance, Jeni Thomas, graduate student in statistics, looks for potential customers to buy her roses. Thomas spends her Saturday nights working for Just Roses selling single roses to bar patrons.

Flower power earns students cash

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Nothing says "I love you" like a long-stemmed red rose.

What? You forgot to buy the rose? No problem.

Just Roses employees sell roses in the bars on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights, Rosemary Pyle, owner of Just Roses, said.

Pyle began her business 5-1/2 years ago. She has employed four women who walk through the bars in Aggieville and around Manhattan selling long-stemmed red roses.

"I had first seen it in Dallas," Pyle said.

She said she thought Manhattan, her husband's hometown, would be a good place for a rose business with the singles population from K-State and Fort Riley.

Pyle dethorns the roses, puts plastic water holders on the stems to keep the roses fresh all evening and puts the roses in baskets. The women who sell the roses pick them up about 9 p.m.

"I hire on the quality of being able to socialize in a bar," Pyle said.

Pyle said she doesn't allow her employees to drink on the job. The women mingle and make themselves visible in the bar, but they don't need to make a hard sell.

"It's the right job for the right kind of person. The girls have to be comfortable right out there," Pyle said.

Jenifer Thomas, graduate student in statistics, answered Pyle's advertisement in the newspaper. She has worked for Pyle for 2-1/2 years and now works on Thursday and Saturday nights in Aggieville.

"For working eight hours a week, I make a lot more than I would at another job," Thomas said.

Thomas said one reason she really likes her job is because she has had the opportunity to meet so many people.

"I have a lot of people who don't work in the bars who look out for me," she said.

Thomas, who has been married nearly a month, said she began selling the roses about the same time she started dating her husband.

"When I first started doing it, he was protective," she said.

Now her husband is OK about her job, Thomas said.

"If I ever had any problems, I know most of the bartenders and

▶ CABLE TV

Welcome to the next level: Sega on cable

Sega to go local after 1-year trial in Wichita, Topeka

MICHELLE BELCHER
Collegian

TCI of Kansas will soon begin offering a premium Sega channel. Unfortunately, Manhattan residents will have to wait at least a year to receive this service.

"It will be launched into the larger systems first like Wichita and Topeka," Ron Frazier, general manager for Manhattan TCI of Kansas, said.

The new premium service will provide an adaptor from TCI of Kansas that fits into your own Sega Genesis system.

"For $14.95 a month, a customer will gain access to 50 video games each month," Mary Jobe, director of marketing for Multimedia Media Cable in Wichita, said.

Games will be downloaded into the software system and then directly sent to your Sega system via the cable hookup.

"An access menu will appear on the screen using the pads that come with the Sega game," Jobe said.

"The unit then shows the customer on the screen what games are available for that month."

Manhattan TCI of Kansas recently expanded its service to include two new channels: the Learning channel and the TV! channel.

"TV! is basically a satellite-programming sampler channel. It samples a lot of different programing from different channels," Frazier said.

"It might have the Disney channel one day and the military channel the next."

The Learning channel mainly broadcasts documentaries.

"It was pretty neat. It was kind of like the Discovery channel," Julee Cathcard, freshman in accounting, said.

Other students aren't enjoying the two new channels.

"I hope they are not charging for it," said Mike Langham, senior in food science.

Unfortunately, the rates for TCI of Kansas did go up by 76 cents a month.

"I don't really like them at all," Page Smith, freshman in biology, said.

Despite these new services, a Sega premium-service channel would be welcomed by most but not all of the TCI subscribers in the Manhattan area.

"My personal opinion is that I know people that waste too much time with the Sega already," Phil Nicoli, freshman undecided, said.

"I don't think Sega channel is a good thing. I am from Wichita, and I know about it going in down there, but my little brother is excited about it."

What could be in store for Manhattan TCI of Kansas with all of these changes?

Plans are for the same channels to stay permanent, including the new Learning channel and TV! channel. Manhattan TCI of Kansas will receive the Sega channel sometime soon.

"There is a good chance we will have it in the near future, but not this year," Frazier said.

IN OUR OPINION

Don't ignore hidden scholarship opportunities

A major, job, hobby or hometown may all qualify you for a scholarship.

Students are always putting up a big fuss about the high cost of tuition.

While we work toward getting tuition under control, there is something students can do to help offset the cost of a college education now.

There are $4 million in scholarships available from the University yearly.

Some students think it is not worth applying for a scholarship because the competition is too tough.

They think their GPA is too low or they are not involved in enough activities.

But there are scholarships for all shapes and sizes of students. A major, job, hobby or hometown may all qualify you for a scholarship.

The University still has scholarships it has not awarded for this school year. They have been unable to match the right person to the money.

K-State also offers a service to help students search for scholarships offered by other organizations throughout the country.

For $15, students have access to a database that will match them with scholarships for which they may be eligible.

The priority deadline for scholarships for next year is Feb. 1.

Information on other scholarships and their deadlines can be obtained in the financial aid office, Fairchild 104.

Lack of TV taboos reflect changing morals

JOHN HART

As our moral taboos are being annihilated one by one all around us, it seems everyone is eager to jump on the virtues bandwagon.

Television provides us with perhaps the best illustration of how moral values have changed in the past few years.

Although television can't be held solely responsible for a decline in virtues, it is a good barometer of what we consider to be taboos in our culture.

The best example of how television and taboos are related comes from the original Star Trek series. During one episode, Captain Kirk and Lieutenant Uhura performed TV's first-ever interracial kiss.

This kiss didn't cause a change in racial attitudes so much as it reflected a change in the racial attitudes at the time. It merely accelerated, in this case, a positive process already in motion.

Today, television is much more daring. Shows like Beverly Hills 90210, Melrose Place, Models Inc. and NYPB Blue treat old taboos as normal.

Homosexuality is no more of moral controversy than being left-handed. Sexual partners are treated like disposable lighters, and virgins seem to be on the endangered species list. Directly comparing shows from 20 years ago and less with those now yields some interesting results.

For example, during a recent episode of Beverly Hills 90210, the 90210 clan gathered at a friend's house for a rave dance party. Due to a mix-up in the planning of the event, a few dozen lesbian couples mistakenly arrived at the house. Nevertheless, the politically correct 90210 crowd got along well with their new lesbian friends.

The party turned sour, however, when the electrical wiring in the house overloaded and started a fire. Unfortunately, Steve and Valerie, two 90210 kids, were having sex upstairs at the time, but they managed to escape the flames. Incidentally, Steve is Valerie's second partner in about a month. Kelly and a lesbian guest weren't so lucky. Trapped in a downstairs bathroom, they escaped death but suffered burns.

Imagine, if you will, the same scenario played out on an older popular televisions series such as the Waltons. The Waltons hold a hip square dance party and a house full of lesbians show up. While the house is burning down, John Boy is upstairs having passionate sex.

If the Waltons don't suffice, imagine this scenario on the Brady Bunch, Partridge Family or Petticoat Junction.

My point in this comparison is not to offer a serious moral evaluation of homosexuality but to show how our taboos are being destroyed.

This is to be expected in a society that is coming to take the moral teachings of Ricki Lake more seriously than those of the Bible.

As our list of moral taboos has shrunk in the past 20 years, the number of teen-age pregnancies and births have doubled, and teen abortions have nearly tripled.

Also during this period, AIDS has reached epidemic proportions throughout the world.

Although the shift in values appears obvious when we consider the values of 20 years ago, many consider these changes to be subtle and insignificant.

We are like a frog in a pot of water on a stove that is too foolish to know to jump out instead of being slowly boiled alive.

As our taboos have been destroyed, so have we.

If values have changed this much in 20 years, what will they be like in another 20 years? Will fathers have affairs with their daughter's friends? Will mommy and daddy be two daddies?

More importantly, what will our standard be for judging morality; the feelings of a generation or an objective moral truth?

These are questions worth answering if we want the next generation, our children — the group that emulates the behavior we tolerate, to have any concept of personal morality.

John Hart is a senior in political science.

Per-credit-hour payment just might work

DAN LEWERENZ

Watch your pocketbooks, ladies and gentlemen. Before long, the Powers that Be will have found a new way of bilking you out of your (parents') hard-earned money.

Within the next couple of years, Kansas is expected to change the way you pay tuition. No, this is not the "pay-by-mail" system we have been screaming about for years. Soon, you will pay tuition by the credit hour.

Proponents of the per-credit-hour system argue that it is a more fair way of charging students. After all, why should one student taking only 12 hours pay the same tuition as another taking 21?

Some students will pay more, others will save, they say. The vast majority will probably come out even, enrolling in 13 hours this semester, 16 hours next, balancing out over the course of four or five years.

While the arguments in favor of a per-credit-hour system seem valid, they ignore several crucial points.

First, they often neglect to mention the very reason for switching to such a system — money. A per-credit-hour system allows for a tuition hike that nobody sees. While the additional revenue would certainly do K-State some good, it should not come at the expense of those who are simply trying to get the most out of their college experience.

Second, it will punish students for taking that extra step toward a balanced education. The same effect will be felt in honors and other special classes.

Many honors sections of regular classes (General Psychology, U.S. Politics, etc.) are offered for four hours of credit instead of three. A per-credit-hour policy will force a choice between paying for quality and enrolling in a less challenging course.

Finally, it will dramatically alter experiential learning at a school that takes pride in offering internship and cooperative-learning experiences. The academic credit that can be earned and the enhanced perspective that can be gained by analyzing and summarizing an internship experience will have to be weighed against the cost of enrolling in two or three extra hours.

Similarly, undergraduate teaching assistants may become obsolete. These students usually receive a combination of academic credit and minimal pay for leading labs or recitations. By allowing undergraduates to earn credit for teaching, departments are able to save their scarce dollars, while at the same time providing students an exciting opportunity to gain a better understanding of the subject.

If students are forced to cough up the scant earnings from their university paychecks, many won't be able to afford to teach. Unfortunately, the odds on convincing the Board of Regents to leave tuition alone are not good. There are two alternatives, however, that deserve consideration.

1. Instead of a direct per-credit-hour rate, a sliding scale could be developed. Students enrolled in one to six hours would be classified as part-time, paying either by the hour (as they do now) or at a designated flat rate.

Students enrolled in seven to 12 hours would be classified as half-time. They would pay a flat rate of 60 to 75 percent of the full-time tuition rate.

Students enrolled in 13 to 18 hours would be full-time, again paying a flat rate for tuition.

Students enrolled in 19 to 24 hours would be classified as overtime, paying a flat rate equivalent to 120 to 150 percent of the full-time rate.

Anyone enrolled in more than 24 hours would be shot without a trial.

2. An exemption could be made for honors hours, experiential learning and other special circumstances. This way, the state could collect its revenue while the student would still be encouraged to seek challenges both inside and outside the realm of traditional schooling.

Either of these options, if structured well, would achieve the goals of fairness and revenue.

More important, though, they would allow students the opportunity to look beyond the requirements and toward their education.

Dan Lewerenz is a senior in philosophy.

▶ ABORTION

Violence isn't the answer

Dear editor,

In an average year, 60 or more physicians are killed in the United States by patients or their families. Have you heard of them? Did they make the national news? Yet each time there is violence to adults at an abortion center, the media fix on the event. There is another side of the story.

There are approximately 1,000 abortion centers across the United States. With some exceptions, there have been sidewalk counselors outside of these centers most days of every week for the past 22 years. Just imagine — this involved tens of millions of man/woman days of protest on this very controversial issue. The real story is the nearly unbelievable, extraordinary story that in 22 years, involving millions of people on this intensely controversial subject there has been so little violence.

Let's look at the analogy with the Civil Rights Movement. Dr. Martin Luther King advised a peaceful crusade. But the Black Panthers are anything but peaceful. They were a violent lot and killed a number of people. Did the press condemn Dr. King for the actions of this aberrant, violent group? No, not at all; they recognized the Black Panthers as not being representative of the goals of Dr. King. Why then paint the entire pro-life movement for the actions of one aberrant and unstable person? He was clearly not representative of the peaceful, prayerful sidewalk counselors and the millions of others involved in the pro-life movement.

"We are well aware of horrible violence done to every unborn child."

DAVID A. GITTRICH
Executive Director
Kansans for Life

All of us in the pro-life movement have thought about the recent violence at abortion mills.

We are well aware of horrible violence done to every unborn child and the agonizing pain they endure before death. We are in the pro-life movement to oppose the gruesome violence and the act of abortion committed on pregnant women.

For myself, I remember that abortion was ruled legal by the Supreme Court (which, by the way, has no power to make the laws) in 1973. I did nothing until 1980. For seven years, I ignored the holocaust. I am sorry I did not stand against this evil. And still today, I would tell anyone in the abortion industry, "I have not yet begun to fight!" My church is not yet entirely pro-life. My neighbors are not yet pro-life. My relatives are not yet pro-life, and I know that hundreds and thousands of Kansans still have no idea what abortion does or how often it takes place. Education, prayer, answering the call of help for others and political action are the keys to success.

What would the pro-life movement be without the likes of Dr. Bernard Nathanson or Carol Everett? Both are former abortionists who, realizing the power of humanity of the unborn child, have stopped performing abortions and become strong leaders in the pro-life movement?

Perseverance and faithfulness will be the answer, not violence. We are fighting violence to innocent children, violence to women, violence to family and violence against the love of God. We fight with love, compassion, help, understanding and real alternatives to abortion, and we will continue to do so.

David A Gittrich
Executive Director
Kansans for Life

▶ ABORTION

Women deserve a choice

Dear editor,

Jan. 22 was the anniversary of Roe v. Wade. This case enabled women of the United States the legal right to choose to terminate a pregnancy. The key words are legal, right and choose.

Before Roe, women experienced violence to their lives by the risk of self-induced abortions or going to an illegal, and often deadly, abortionist.

The only exception was for those women who could afford to go to the few states which allowed abortion.

Women were the key to the case of Roe v. Wade — it was about all women and women attorneys: Sarah Weddington and Linda Coffee; with Ms. Weddington giving the case before the Supreme Court.

Yet in the years since Roe, violence to women has continued, but to a different level. Now if one needs to visit a clinic, not only for reproductive needs, but for other health needs, she and her family/friends must endure outright terrorism.

There have been 15 acts of violence, including bombings, arson and property damage to clinics that support women's health needs.

There have been five murders, men and women killed for maintaining a right of women to choose their reproductive lives.

Add this violence to the increase in domestic violence that women experience each year.

Enough, you might say.

Well, that is what women and men across America are saying. If you are tired of the violence toward women, want equality for women and do believe women have the right to choice of their reproductive lives; then I encourage you to join us at NOW to fight for those rights. If not NOW, then join and participate in women's organizations that will ensure women's rights will not be lost to a violent and vocal few who want to dictate your lives.

Wanted: new sewer

K-177 property owners have had their fill of septics

BRIAN HEIAR
Collegian

For some Riley County residents, a sewer system, or the lack of one, is very much on their minds.

Most landowners in the area around Kansas Highway 177 south of the Kansas River bridge have private septic systems, but some of these are inadequate, Dan Harden, Riley County public works director, said.

Some of the landowners in the area would like to rectify this.

To do so, they have proposed the Kanza sewer district, a benefit district, to supply themselves with a sewer system.

A benefit district is a group of landowners within a specific area that sign up to petition the county government to help them build something to benefit that area.

The total cost has not yet been determined.

Because of the expense involved, until the benefit district is formed, the county will not do the study to determine the cost of the sewer system.

Landowners in the area of 71.8 percent of the acreage, well more than the required 51 percent, have already signed up to start the benefit district, Harden said.

The landowners met once on Jan. 19 and will continue meeting on Monday. At the next meeting, they will either continue the meeting again or decide whether or not to create the benefit district, Harden said.

Because K-177 is being expanded to four lanes, several properties along the highway will lose the space required to maintain private septic systems.

However, very few of the properties in the area would be affected by the construction.

Sewage disposal will still be a problem for some people.

"Four or five people or businesses would have problems with or without the highway expansion," Harden said.

Without the sewer system, land owners are facing more problems than just sewage problems.

Several properties in this area are devaluing because of inadequate sewage and water sources, Harden said.

One of the main concerns with any public-works proposal is the cost. In most benefit districts, the more acreage a landowner owns within the district, the more that person or business pays for the improvement.

In the proposed Kanza sewer district, 50 percent of the equation to determine payment would be by acreage owned. The other 50 percent of the equation would use the assessed value of the land to determine payment, Harden said.

Some of the landowners within the area are definitely in favor of the plan.

"For the good of the community, it's just got to have it," Russell Briggs, owner of Briggs Jeep-Eagle, said. Because of EPA and health standards, without the sewer, this area cannot develop. It will go backward, Briggs said.

There is already a pipe running below the river. It was put there in case this area ever developed.

Money has already been set aside for a station to regulate the flow of water, Briggs said.

Burke Bayer, owner of Bayer Construction, said he supports the sewer district.

The land that Bayer Construction is on is approximately 30 acres in size and will not be affected by the highway expansion, but it does require a sewer, Bayer said.

Because of the high cost per acre, the sewer system might not be an easy sell, Bayer said.

"The property that's being affected isn't going to become valuable overnight," he said.

Other landowners in the area are not as definite on whether the sewer should be put in.

"I'm not really for it, and I'm not really against it," Gerald Grimes, resident within the proposed sewer district, said. "There are a few things I'd like to see done."

Grimes said that he would like to see a pipe on the east side of the area where it crosses the highway so that people could hook up to a water source without much cost.

Another factor of the question to build the sewer system is that some people in the area are retired and live on a fixed income, Ellen Grimes said. "Some people might have to sell their homes."

K-State graduate wins vet MVP after rocky undergrad beginning

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

Dr. Joe Kobuszewski almost decided not to go into veterinary medicine.

After his first four semesters at K-State, Kobuszewski was on academic probation and wanted to drop veterinary medicine as his major.

A scholarship changed his mind.

Kobuszewski became a doctor and was recently named the 1994 Kansas Veterinarian of the Year by the Kansas Veterinary Medical Association.

The scholarship that kept Kobuszewski in medicine was established in memorial to Brad Steele, a pre-veterinary student at K-State.

"I just couldn't bring myself to tell his father I was quitting school when he gave me that scholarship," he said. "He told me he saw the qualities of his son in me because his son was a struggling student just like I was."

Kobuszewski said he came to the point where he had to decide either to be a student or to get out, so he decided to become a student. It was not easy, because he had to learn how to study, Kobuszewski said.

Kobuszewski, who practiced in Valley Falls, was surprised to learn he was the winner of the Veterinarian of the Year award.

"I wasn't aware of it at all. I was shocked," Kobuszewski said.

Kobuszewski had no idea that he was receiving the award, although his wife, Denise, had known for about a month.

Kobuszewski said a poem, written by Conser, was read about the recipient, and when the sixth stanza was read, he realized they were referring to him because his internship in Friend, Neb., was mentioned.

"I turned to my wife and said, 'That's got to be me,'" he said.

Kobuszewski said he always thought this award would be the pinnacle of one's career and had thought about the possibility that maybe someday it would happen.

"I still ask, 'Why did I get this?' I enjoy what I do, so it's not work to me," he said.

Kobuszewski received his bachelor's degree in animal science in 1970 and his doctorate of veterinary medicine in 1976 from K-State. He then completed his internship in Friend, Neb.

After graduation, he stayed at K-State for one year as an associate professor for the College of Veterinary Medicine teaching microanatomy.

Kobuszewski also spent two years pursuing a master's degree in ruminant nutrition, but when he was accepted into the veterinary program, he made the decision not to finish his master's thesis.

"If you apply yourself, you can make it being a vet, and that was my ultimate goal. I had to make a choice, and it took a lot of pressure off of me," Kobuszewski said.

Kobuszewski and Denise, also a veterinarian, began practicing in Valley Falls in 1977. They continue to operate the Countryside Veterinary Clinics at Valley Falls and Effingham, Kobuszewski said.

Nominations for the Kansas Veterinarian of the Year came from members of KVMA, with the selection process being accomplished by peers in the profession.

Ron Marler, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said Kobuszewski was an obvious candidate for the award.

"Joe is an outstanding example of the quality practitioners in the state of Kansas, and it is a great and well-deserved honor," Marler said.

off will see this as a great break."

Otto said the purpose of the proposal was not to start a fight between the board and the Collegian, advertising and Royal Purple staff.

"If we fight each other, we shoot ourselves in the foot," he said.

Other changes voted into the board's bylaws were the establishment of two-year terms, an attendance policy and a grade recommendation.

The board will now consist of three one-year term members and two two-year members. The two-year term members will be elected every other year.

Board members will be allowed three unexcused absences before they could be considered for impeachment or dismissal.

The board also passed a resolution asking the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications to make a graded credit hour per semester for student board members based on attendance and participations.

Senior forward Stanley Hamilton and an Oklahoma player battle for a rebound during K-State's 87-77 upset of the 25th-ranked Sooners Wednesday in Bramlage Coliseum. The win ended the Cats' four-game losing streak.

K-State beats its 1st ranked opponent

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

Close enough was finally good enough.

After suffering three consecutive losses to nationally ranked teams by a total of 16 points, K-State pulled out an 87-77 upset victory over No. 25 Oklahoma in Bramlage Coliseum.

The win moved the Wildcats' Big Eight Conference record to 2-4, and it was a victory that couldn't have come at a more opportune time for K-State.

"If we would have lost this fifth one in a row, then it would have taken a lot out of us," K-State forward Stanley Hamilton said. "This game we had to win."

It didn't start out pretty for the Cats. They fell in a nine-point hole with little more than six minutes to play in the first half.

However, the Cats caught fire from the field and went on a 20-9 run to recapture a two-point lead at 36-34.

K-State's run was sparked by freshman guard Mark Young. He canned three three-pointers during the run en route to a career-high 17 points.

However, it was his final trey that gave the Cats the lead with 2:14 left in the first period.

"At that time, I felt like I could take over," Young said. "After I hit that first one, I knew that I would take over the game. It was just a matter of them getting me the ball, and they got it to me in that stretch. I just got into the flow."

Young's hot shooting sparked the entire K-State team, which jumped out to a 10-point lead in the first 10 minutes of the second half.

Despite the Cats' 10-point lead, the Sooners just wouldn't go away. Oklahoma mounted a comeback bid of its own and at one point had the K-State lead cut to two points.

After cutting the lead to two points, Oklahoma switched to a 3-2 match-up zone, but the switch didn't work.

K-State started to take the ball inside to forward Tyrone Davis, and guard Elliot Hatcher penetrated the zone for easy baskets.

"We would have had little or no success against that zone back in December," Asbury said. "We wouldn't have been able to do much with it. We executed better this time, and we needed it."

With Davis and Hatcher ripping through the OU zone, the Cats rebuilt a 10-point lead, which is the margin by which they would win.

Leading the way for the Cats was Davis, who finished with 26 points. This was Davis' career high.

"Tyrone has really been playing well for us lately," Asbury said. "I think the better he gets, the more confident the guys have in terms of going to him and allowing him to finish plays."

Another factor in the Cats' success was its shooting from the field. For the game, K-State shot 55 percent from the floor on 29 out of 52.

"We've actually taken open shots, but I don't know if the guys shooting them think the ball will go in," Asbury said. "The familiarity of the system should help us continue to get better.

OU gives Cats what they need

DEREK SIMMONS
Collegian

Oklahoma provided a welcome house call for an ailing, woeful K-State team — again.

Last season, the Wildcats were mired in a four-game Big Eight Conference skid before downing the Sooners 89-76 in Bramlage Coliseum.

The doctor was in once more Wednesday night.

No. 25 Oklahoma supplied the prescription in the form of an 87-77 victory for K-State, relieving the Wildcats of a three-game conference funk.

"We needed a win to keep our heads up," K-State coach Tom Asbury said.

"We played so hard, we needed to get a win."

Playing hard left the Wildcats just short in the last three games. K-State lost all three league games — all to ranked teams and by a total of 16 points.

The Cats couldn't catch a late break in the previous three contests, losing at Missouri by six, at Kansas by four and to Iowa State by six.

Erratic shooting, bad bounces and lack of luck set in like the plague.

But K-State found solace Wednesday, shooting 55.8 percent from the field, making 25 of 32 free throws and receiving a few friendly hops.

"This game helps us in a lot of ways," said Tyrone Davis, who scored a career-high 26 points.

"It gets rid of some of the frustration of losing so many close games."

Down 38-37 at intermission, the Wildcats engineered a 12-3 scoring run to take a 49-41 lead with 15:21 remaining.

K-State stayed in control the rest of the game.

Asbury said the timing was crucial for the Cats, finding themselves buried among league foes with a 2-4 record, 11-7 overall.

"I was worried about it," he said.

"We've been talking about it all week. We know that if we just start finishing some of these games, we are going to win some of them, according to the law of averages."

The Sooners, who had just moved into the Top 25 two days earlier, managed just one field goal in the first five minutes of the second period.

"It would be unfair to say what we didn't do, without saying that K-State played a great basketball game," Oklahoma coach Kelvin Sampson said.

"But we didn't shoot the ball well enough, play hard enough or play good enough defense," he said.

The Wildcats erased a 25-16 Sooner advantage early, using a 15-5 run and gaining their first lead at 31-30 with 3:35 to play in the first half.

Four Cats finished the game, scoring in double figures, including freshman Mark Young with a career-high 17 points. Point guard Elliot Hatcher had 16 and Demond Davis added 15.

"This game was very important as far as our enthusiasm the rest of the season," Hatcher said.

"We lost to three ranked teams, and then we found out that Oklahoma squeaked into the Top 25. That motivated us."

If it's a ranked team the Wildcats are now going to use for incentive, the next two games should keep them in high spirits.

K-State travels to No. 11 Iowa State Saturday then plays No. 20 Missouri at home on Feb. 4.

League more competitive

SCOTT REYNOLDS
Collegian

It's time to go find those old basketball shoes and grab a ball.

Intramural basketball is back and perhaps more competitive than ever. The men's preseason top-10 list had an almost equal number of independent and fraternity teams, with 10th ranked Marlatt 3 being the only residence-hall team.

Of the five independent teams, three rank in the top five, with Dream Team III claiming the top spot.

"Dream Team III is a stacked team comprised of members from last year's independent winner Ehlo, and another good team called Fastbreak," Bryan Skinner, assistant director for intramurals, said.

Skinner said that intramural participation was up in the co-rec, and the six-foot and under leagues but down slightly for independents.

"It could be that some of the better players are stacked on good independent teams," said Skinner.

With the talent pool spread unevenly across independent teams, the fraternities appear to have a more balanced division.

"I'm excited about our league this year," said Chris Troppito, senior in finance and a member of the Alpha Tau Omega team. "The competition looks really good this year. I've seen a lot of fraternities practicing up at the Rec."

Second ranked Tau Kappa Epsilon, last year's all-University basketball champion, appears to be the best fraternity team at this time.

"It seems that the fraternities are spending more time practicing this year," said Brian Siegrist, graduate in public relations and a member of El Fuego.

With spring break coming the week of March 20, the intramural-basketball season playoffs should conclude the week before.

Chiefs release 2 coaches

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs, who went from Super Bowl contention to a wild-card road team, appear to be making staff changes.

Published and broadcast reports have said defensive assistants Tom Pratt and Herman Edwards were told they would not be offered contracts. In addition, The Kansas City Star said Wednesday that Gunther Cunningham, an assistant coach for the Los Angeles Raiders the past four seasons, was close to accepting a position with the Chiefs.

A team spokesman said Wednesday he could not confirm the reports and that Coach Marty Schottenheimer would have no comment. The Star said Pratt, a Chiefs' assistant for 21 seasons in his two stints, was scheduled Wednesday to interview with the Houston Oilers.

Edwards handled defensive backs for the Chiefs last year, while Pratt worked mostly with the defensive line. The secondary, with newcomers William White and Mark Collins replacing departed starts Kevin Ross and Albert Lewis, was a big disappointment.

The defensive line also was less effective than expected, showing a particular vulnerability at times to rushing attacks.

The staff shakeup is not unexpected. The Chiefs were 9-7 one year after reaching the AFC championship game. When Miami knocked the Chiefs out of the first round of the playoffs, general manager Carl Peterson hinted heads might roll.

"We haven't had a chance to take an in-depth look at this. But certainly we will, and we will sit down with Marty and go through every aspect of what transpired. The season doesn't just begin with the first regular season game," Peterson said at the time, stressing that any staff changes would be up to Schottenheimer.

"I still stand with what I said at the beginning of the regular season. This is the finest group of players I have personally been involved with in my 14 years in the National Football League," Peterson said.

OSU player reprimanded

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Big Eight Conference on Wednesday publicly reprimanded Oklahoma State forward Randy Rutherford for criticizing officials following the Cowboys' rough-and-tumble game with Missouri.

Big Eight rules mandate that a coach, player or game administrator must not comment publicly on the work of officials.

Officials called 56 fouls in the game, and Cowboys players complained afterward that Missouri forward Jason Sutherland played dirty.

Rutherford was quoted in The Kansas City Star as saying Sutherland's play was the difference between being aggressive and overaggressive.

"They've got to get to a point where they can take over a game like they're supposed to and call some technical fouls on him," Rutherford said.

K-State coach Tom Asbury issued the following statement Wednesday concerning the comments he made about Texas Christian University head coach Billy Tubbs.

"I apologize for my comments made during Monday's press conference. In 28 years of coaching, I've never publicly criticized another coach. It was unprofessional on my part, and it won't happen again."

overcoming the ultimate loss

Grief.

Everyone deals with it differently.

Some withdraw. Others lash out.

But everyone it touches must address it.

Story by Kristin Brighton Art by Mike Marlett Design by Sara Smith

Ray McCann lost his uncle, grandfather and father during his first semester at K-State after losing his grandmother his senior year of high school.

"I didn't have any reaction. I didn't feel anything," McCann, senior in secondary education, said of his response following the deaths.

But his feeling of numbness didn't last forever.

"By my second year, I started freaking out," McCann said.

McCann found himself punching cement columns in the basement of Putnam Hall, literally knocking himself out from emotional frustration.

His grades were affected, and he lost his academic scholarships, adding to his frustration.

His mother connected him with a counselor who taught him to talk about himself and his pain.

"That's what I needed to do," McCann said. "I had kept everything in until I exploded."

Today, McCann said, by learning to talk more with others, he has become a more outgoing person and friend.

"I didn't talk to others at all. Now you have to work to shut me up," McCann said.

There isn't a guaranteed, cure-all approach to overcoming the emotional wound that can accompany the death of anyone — especially when that someone played a significant role in your life, said Ann Johnson, psychology intern for University Counseling Services.

Everyone deals with grief in a different, individual way, Johnson said. There is no right or wrong method to overcoming grief, and there is an infinite range of possible ways to get over the death of someone you care for.

McCann found his answer from a counselor. Other people turn to support groups, friends, relatives and religious and cultural rituals for answers, Johnson said.

Some people dive into their work to escape the pain of losing a family member, Johnson said. She said this is not necessarily a bad way to deal with the pain, but the feelings will eventually need to be handled.

"They may have to come back and deal with it later," Johnson said.

Jenny McGee, senior in elementary education, lost her grandmother last semester right before Thanksgiving, during a time when classwork was already putting a heavy weight on her shoulders.

To get through the pain of losing her grandmother and finishing classes, she kept herself active and tried not to think about it.

"If I thought about it — if anybody brought it up — I'd lose it," McGee said.

Once she made it through finals, McGee said, she took a weekend off to fall apart. She spent time alone watching television and reading books.

"I think that is what I needed to do," McGee said.

McGee said it is true that dealing with grief is an individual process.

"Every person deals with grief in a different way. You can't stop functioning, you can't stop living. My grandma wouldn't have wanted that at all," McGee said.

When Jill Sink and her friends found out about the loss of their schoolmate, Treena, during their senior year of high school, the initial feeling was one of disbelief and anger.

Treena died because of an aneurysm of the brain that could have been prevented had she been diagnosed and treated earlier, Sink, a junior in political science, said.

"We were upset. I guess the worst part was it was stupid she died. She could have lived," Sink said.

Losing a friend is different than losing a family member, Sink said.

"I don't have to deal with half of what her family has to," she said.

Today, nearly three years later, Sink said she still feels awkward around Treena's family. She said learning to deal with them has been the hardest part of the experience for her.

Recently, when Sink ran into Treena's mother, she said she didn't know what to say.

"I wanted to ask her 'how's Treena?' but Treena is not there anymore. It is strange," Sink said.

Teaching people to deal with family left behind by the death of a loved one is a large part of what the group Compassionate Friends sets out to do.

The group was established to help educate the public about how to treat parents who have lost a child or children and to help the parents left behind.

Carolyn and Leo Dreiling, Manhattan, are co-leaders of the group. The Dreilings lost a son and a daughter in 1975 because of a rock slide at Lake Wilson.

They lost another son 10 years later to suicide.

"When you go through it, you don't know you are going to survive," Carolyn Dreiling said.

The Dreilings found support within their church and family, but they said they found more help from the knowledge that other parents had succeeded in living without their children.

"There are other parents who have experienced it and gone on," Carolyn said.

The Dreilings began attending Compassionate Friends meetings as a way to deal with their grief.

Johnson said the hardest grief to overcome is the loss of a child, closely followed by the loss of a spouse.

Carolyn agreed losing a child is the hardest, adding that losing a child is different than losing a parent.

"To lose a parent, you lose a part of the past. To lose a child, you lose a part of the future," she said.

Carolyn compared the loss of a child to picking through a brick wall with an axe. You can pick and pick, and you can lay it down, but to get through, you have to pick it up again.

"There is no manual that tells you how to be a bereaved parent," Carolyn said.

Carolyn said Leo's favorite saying is, "I wish no parent ever had to know about Compassionate Friends." But that is not a reality.

"You never know who is going to be that next person," Carolyn said.

Through speakers, videos, audio tapes, pamphlets and a lot of talking and crying, the group tries to set up a support system for parents.

"Whenever you come, you are a part of the group," Carolyn said.

Carolyn said she has observed that men and women deal with grief in different ways.

She said women have an easier time talking about their child, but men typically clam up and don't show as much emotion.

However, at group meetings, she said they get as much or more response from men as from women.

Much of what the group hopes to accomplish is helping society overcome the awkwardness of how to treat survivors.

She said parents who have lost children love to talk about those children.

"There are not very many opportunities to talk to others about that child," Carolyn said. "It helps people to know how to deal with us."

The Dreilings have three living children, but they still consider themselves the parents of six.

"We remember our children. They may not be here in sight, but they are very much a part of our home," Carolyn said.

Students help Russia

Students bring goodwill to help Russian children

KIMBERLY KIRCHER
Collegian

K-State students traveled to Russia to sightsee and learn about its history. When they came back, they realized how lucky they were to be Americans.

"It's amazing how diverse we were when we left and how close-knit we were when we came back," Michael Doane, senior in agriculture business, said. "We were all Americans."

On Jan. 2, John Daly, professor of history, took 21 students to Russia for an intersession class. They toured St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The students not only went to Russia for the history, but also for charity.

Each student carried an extra bag filled with candies, toothbrushes, books, disposable syringes, clothes and pharmaceuticals. The items were donated by the Manhattan community or brought by the students themselves.

They brought these items for the sick children in the leukemia department of the Children's Hospital No. 10 in St. Petersburg, Daly said.

After hearing about the hospital and looking at the little children, it made it all worthwhile, he said.

The experience at the Children's Hospital had a powerful effect on the students.

"The kids had nothing. Their faces were pale, and their eyes were sunken in," Casey Niemann, junior in agriculture business, said.

The hospital did not have good medical equipment, Niemann said.

Doane said the medical facilities were poor, to say the least.

"It looks as if they haven't spent any money to maintain the hospital, and they didn't stress sterilization," Doane said.

"I thought the kids were happier than they should have been. I guess they didn't know any better," he said.

The Children's Hospital was the highlight of the trip, Niemann said.

"As Americans, we have so much stuff, and we don't even think about it," Niemann said.

Niemann said the economy is very depressed in Russia.

Daly said everything was paid for by the $1,208 fee except the airfare to and from New York.

"Our daily routine would be to eat breakfast and then head out on the road," he said.

The evenings were mostly free for the students, Daly said. They would sometimes attend cultural events.

"One event was folk dancing with a string orchestra," Niemann said. "It was amazing to me that it would cost only two or three dollars to attend an event like that."

Niemann said he thought the performers were the best in the world.

During the intermission of a cultural event, champaign, caviar and vodka were served at no extra charge, Niemann said.

Daly said it was a benefit seeing Russia through the students' eyes and seeing them learn.

"St. Petersburg was my highlight," Doane said. "There is a kind of history there that you don't find in the U.S."

Doane said he thought Moscow was somewhat of a disappointment.

"Moscow is modernized, and it kind of lost its history," Doane said. "I wanted to see the historical part of Moscow."

The students found themselves feeling very lucky for all that they have.

"We get caught up in the materialistic things and take for granted that there is nothing holding us down," Niemann said.

"In Russia, someone could be a Nobel Prize winner and never know it because they are so involved in maintaining life," Niemann said.

Yeehaw! Judging team wins

K-State places third; students now closer to the top

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

Seven K-State students and three coaches competed in the 89th annual National Western Stock Show and Rodeo Jan. 14-22 in Denver.

Rodeos, stock shows, judging contests, concerts and the famous Show in the Yards were all attractions to the stock show.

Scott Schaake, assistant professor in animal science and industry and livestock-judging coach, said K-State placed third out of the 24 teams participating.

"This team has been closer to the top than any team I have had at Denver in the last four years," Schaake said.

Chad Ward, junior in animal science and industry, was ranked high in the individual contest, Schaake said.

"Ward winning by 34 points is outstanding," he said.

Jeff Brandenberger, junior in animal science and industry, placed first in carloads division of the livestock-judging contest.

The K-State meats-judging team placed fourth.

John Unruh, associate professor of animal science and industry and meats-team coach, said that individually, Spencer Schrader, sophomore in animal science and industry, was fifth overall.

Schrader and Kristi Oleen, sophomore in animal science and industry, placed in several divisions.

"This year, students have been working very hard for competition and will be very competitive in the next two contests," Unruh said.

The livestock and meats teams will participate at the Southwestern Exposition in Fort Worth the first week of February and at the Houston Stock Show in March.

The K-State wool-judging teams placed fifth and seventh at the stock show.

Clifford Spaeth, professor in animal science and industry, said that this year's contest was the largest one he has ever been connected with. Thirteen teams competed in the contest.

Julie Tipton, senior in animal science and industry, placed seventh overall. T.L. Meyer, freshman in animal science and industry, placed ninth in oral reasons.

Spaeth said the team will be very competitive at their next competition, Feb. 28 in Houston.

Chris Mullinix, junior in animal science and industry, was also a member of the livestock-judging team. He said he has been to Denver five times previously as an exhibitor, spectator and member of the judging team.

"It is really unique," Mullinix said. "It's a true stock show. They don't bring in other things to attract people."

"It is one of the few places you can go and spend all day and look at the best livestock from everywhere and not get bored."

Schaake said that Denver is one of a kind with the Show in the Yards. Anyone with ties to the cattle industry goes to Denver, he said.

Other students were at the show working on their own animals or working for other people exhibiting livestock.

Karen Goss, freshman in pre-professional elementary education, participated for the fifth time in the national sheep show during the stock show.

"This is our annual family vacation," Goss said. "We learned a lot from people from all over."

Bill introduced to limit lobbyists' gifts to legislators

A Kansas Senate bill would prohibit lobbyists buying lunch for legislators.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA (AP) — A bill introduced in the Senate Wednesday wouldn't let lobbyists buy lunch for their favorite legislators — unless the meal cost less than $3.

The bill is aimed at reducing the influence of special-interest groups and would prohibit lobbyists from giving state officers or employees gifts, except for food or beverages costing less than $3. It would also ban all gifts to state officials.

Currently, lobbyists can provide gifts to anyone in state government, as long as the total value of them doesn't exceed $40 a year for each person. There is no limit on money spent on recreation or meals by lobbyists.

"Our current law is open to abuse," co-sponsor of the bill Sen. Mark Parkinson, R-Olathe, said.

"For the last two years, over $400,000 has been spent each year to entertain legislators. The lobbyists are doing this to influence our votes, and that is simply not right."

Sen. Bill Brady, D-Parsons, the other co-sponsor, said the bill follows the lead of legislation being considered by Congress.

"There is no justification for giving gifts to legislators," Brady said. "We believe the public is expecting fundamental change not only at a federal level, but the state level as well."

A similar bill passed in the House last session, and this bill seems to have a large number of supporters in the Senate, Brady said.

Another bill, introduced by the Education Committee, would raise community-college tuition rates from a minimum of $19 per credit hour to a minimum of $23 for in-state students.

It would also remove the current maximum rate of $27 per credit hour for in-state students and increase the minimum rate for out-of-state and foreign students to $80.50 per credit hour.

The bill removing the lid on community college tuition rates and increasing the minimum charge was introduced by the Education Committee at the request of the Kansas Association of Community Colleges. Its director, Merle Hill, said the colleges' board of trustees should be able to determine their own maximum tuition.

A bill sponsored by Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, would require any political advertising aimed at defeating a candidate for nomination or election to public office by making personal attacks or allegations to include the signature or picture of the candidate the ad benefits.

In television and radio ads, the candidate would be required to read the allegations or attacks being made.

Other bills introduced in the Senate were ones that would:

■ Prohibit surface mining or sand- and gravel-dredging operations that result in a permanent lake or pond.

■ Require an analysis of the immediate and long-range fiscal impact of bills decreasing or increasing revenues for counties, cities or school districts.

Among new House bills were ones that would:

■ Make quality performance accreditation optional, and if the state Board of Education continues it, the emphasis must be on academics.

■ Prohibit abortions that are induced by use of a saline solution.

■ Expand the Kansas Open Meetings Act to have its provisions apply to quasi-public bodies.

■ Require the Legislature to fully fund mandates it imposes on local units of government, unless there is a compelling state interest.

Neighbor bothered by sexual advances

Write to Cassie:
116 Kedzie Hall
Manhattan, KS

Dear Cassandra,

I am rather fed up with men who don't know the definition for monogamy. The dictionary states "the state of being married to one person at a time." In my own book it means dating and having sex in a one-on-one relationship.

I have one married neighbor who is very good looking who likes to touch me as he leaves. I thought we'd nipped this action in the rear a year ago. Then I have another neighbor who says that I have "bedroom eyes." Well, I can't get rid of my eyes, and thankfully, I graduate this year and will move away from these neighbors.

Tell your married readers to stay monogamous and be nice to their spouses/partners. I really know how to entertain a man; I just want one of my own, not someone else's.

Signed, the Yellow Rose

Dear Yellow Rose,

What your neighbors are doing constitutes sexual harassment. If one of them makes another comment or touches you one more time, tell them that you will file a complaint with the police, your landlord and their wives. And if they persist, follow through with the threat. You don't have to put up with their intrusions into your personal life.

Film looks at disease, good, evil

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

People are dying like flies, some say Judgement Day is near, and Death plays an actual game of chess with men. This sets the stage for Ingmar Bergman's "Seventh Seal" (not to be confused with the Seventh Sign).

This 1957, black and white movie depicts the travels of a knight returning from the Crusades, only to find most of medieval Europe ravished by the Black Plague.

The knight not only struggles with the sights of misery he witnesses, but also with his own faltering convictions of good and evil and heaven and hell.

He senses his own immortality and spends a majority of the movie seeking answers to his haunting, ageless questions, such as why an all powerful God would let this horrendous disease kill so many innocent people.

UPC FILM

The Union Program Council presents "Seventh Seal" at 7:00 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. today and at 9:30 p.m. Saturday at Union Forum Hall. The film is 96 minutes long. Tickets cost $1.75.

The movie, which is in Swedish with English subtitles, takes a while to get used to. But after the initial shock of having to read subtitles instead of being able to fully relax and sit back, the storyline captivates.

Bergman, who also directed and wrote the "Serpent's Egg," "Scenes From a Marriage," and "Face to Face," is well known for his provocative films. "The Seventh Seal" doesn't disappoint in that aspect.

Bergman presents horrifying images, accompanied with dramatic music, of peasants and priests hovered over crosses, announcing the end of the world.

Crawling, legless, plague victims follow them, as the music reaches an eerie climax and a woman is burned at the stake after being accused of witchery.

Even with these grim undertones, the film manages to generate humorous scenes, mainly revolving around a caravan of actors that the knight and his companion run into on the way back home.

They are the last hope of the people as they have nothing left but humor to keep their minds off their circumstances.

Overall this is no sword-fighting, dame-winning sort of adventure.

Instead, it is a venture into the souls of men and their weakness against nature as well as a quest to understand the greatest mysteries of man.

If nothing, it is a good peek into the pages of history.

Friendship is a Golden Key unlocking every door,
Creating understanding that did not exist before...
You're someone who has found this key,
For you possess the art of thoughtfulness
That finds a way to open every heart.
And we had the strongest feeling,
From the first time we met, that we've found in you
The very kind of friend we could never forget.

Regents wait for Bicknell

Appointment to board requires Senate's approval

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gene Bicknell has recently come under fire from a senator because of his appointment to the Kansas Board of Regents.

Bicknell, who unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for governor and then endorsed the Democratic candidate, was appointed to the Board of Regents by former Democratic Gov. Joan Finney.

The appointment came just weeks after he endorsed the Democratic candidate, Jim Slattery. Slattery was later defeated by Republican Gov. Bill Graves.

Bicknell testified before the Senate Education Committee, which will make a recommendation to the Senate to confirm or not confirm. The committee can also make no recommendations.

Sen. Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, who was Bicknell's running mate, is a committee member.

Bicknell is a Pittsburg multimillionaire who holds a master in business administration.

Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, asked Bicknell whether his appointment to the regents was a payoff for his endorsement of Slattery.

"Senator, I'm not for sale," Bicknell said calmly. "I never discussed with Finney about who I would endorse in the race."

He also said the Kansas Bureau of Investigation was making a background check for the regents appointment at the time he endorsed Slattery.

"I totally support the sitting governor at all times, regardless of who he is, because he's my governor," Bicknell said.

Then, referring to Graves, he said, "It's very difficult to support someone who attacks your character and misrepresents your business. I have learned how to forgive and forget."

The meeting Wednesday could be a Senate floor fight over Bicknell's confirmation.

Some Republicans were extremely bitter about Bicknell's endorsement of Slattery after the primary.

"I think we have to look at the overall integrity of the individual," Langworthy said after the meeting. "My concern also is to look after the integrity of the Board of Regents. It certainly smacks of a payoff."

"There's still some resentment, obviously," Bicknell said as he left the Statehouse. "I think it's going to be a pretty close vote. I know there are a certain number of individuals who want to see me not confirmed."

Sen. Christine Downey, D-Newton, said she would consider his appointment strictly on qualifications and not on political implications.

During the hearing, Bicknell emphasized both his business and academic background.

He has taught business courses at Pittsburg State University, Wichita State University, the University of Kansas and other universities in the nation.

Bicknell is chief executive officer of the Pittsburg-based National Pizza Co., the world's largest holder of Pizza Hut franchises.

He also owns manufacturing plants and seafood and Mexican restaurants.

"I know exactly how to run a business," he said. "I think regents institutions are a business."

Bicknell said he believes qualified admissions — requiring students to meet certain minimum standards beyond being high-school graduates — should be considered for admission at least two or three of the six state universities.

"We must expect more from our students if we are going to be global in our philosophy," Bicknell said.

Langworthy was unimpressed by Bicknell's statements.

"What I'm not hearing from you is any kind of commitment one way or another," she said. "As a regent, I don't see a commitment to make hard choices."

He replied: "That hard choice might be that qualified admissions must be used for the top three universities."

Bureau rethinks lobbying tactics

STEVE YOUNG
Collegian

In an effort to capitalize on the recent power surge by Kansans in Washington D.C., Kansas Farm Bureau has restructured its lobbying division.

Paul Fleener, director of public affairs for Kansas Farm Bureau, will begin concentrating on congressional issues affecting agriculture.

"We are expecting much more in terms of his time on national issues," said Gordon Hibbard, administrative vice president of Kansas Farm Bureau.

However, it is not necessary for Fleener to be in Washington full-time because the American Farm Bureau Federation will be active on the national level, Hibbard said.

Still, Kansas Farm Bureau hopes to have its own effect on policies that will come from the 104th Congress. Among those policies are a new farm bill, clean-water act, safe-water act and an endangered-species act, Hibbard said.

"We know Kansas is going to be a keystone state," Hibbard said.

Kansas' influence on the formulation of agricultural policy will come from having Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., as Senate majority leader; Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., as the House Agriculture Committee chairman; and Dan Glickman as the U.S. secretary of agriculture, Hibbard said.

Representatives from Kansas Farm Bureau met with Kansas' congressional members in Washington Monday through Thursday. The parties discussed agricultural issues important to each, Hibbard said.

Motivation for increasing Kansas Farm Bureau's efforts in Washington comes from a political climate that is not always friendly to farmers. The challenge to farm workers can come in the form of anything from spending cuts to regulations, Hibbard said.

The question that frequently comes up in policy debates is "Where is the money going to come from?" Hibbard said.

"We want people to realize that farm programs are the only program that has had a significant reduction in its costs over the last 10 years," Hibbard said.

Mountain elk find refuge at Fort Riley

BRIAN HEIAR
Collegian

In January 1994, Fort Riley received 18 new recruits of a somewhat different nature. Eighteen elk were brought to Fort Riley from South Dakota and released into the wild.

The Fort Riley Natural Resources Division, in cooperation with the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation, a non-profit conservation organization, brought the elk from South Dakota to integrate with the existing herd.

"We brought in the elk to increase the genetic diversity of the elk in Fort Riley to bring new blood in," Dave Jones, a fish and wildlife biologist for the Fort Riley Natural Resources Division, said.

The elk are doing well, Jones said. Within the first week, they began intermingling with the older herd. Since then, two elk have died of what are believed to be natural causes, and three have left the Fort Riley area.

To keep track of these new elk, belts made of nylon webbing and equipped with radio transmitters were put on the elk. The young elk were fitted with expandable collars of elastic belting to allow for growth.

The transmitters are lightweight but have a range of more than one mile. Each transmitter has a unique frequency so that individual elk can be tracked.

The cost of these belts was paid for by the Natural Resources Division's wildlife account, made up of licensing fees for hunting and fishing.

"This is really a cooperation between government and a private organization," Jones said.

The cost of getting the elk and transporting them to Fort Riley was paid for by funding from the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation.

"We got the elk from Wind Cave National Park," said Jim Norine, central midwest field director of the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation.

The Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation receives much of its funding through fundraisers, such as big-game banquets, Norine said.

In its 11th year, the foundation has raised almost $31 million and has enhanced more than 2 million acres of land for wildlife reserves. The foundation has seven chapters in Kansas, including one chapter for Manhattan and Junction City.

Since 1990, the Natural Resources Division has allowed limited hunting of elk in Fort Riley.

One to four tags are issued each season. Each tag allows the person to hunt one adult buck.

Rose peddling romantic work bouncers, and they're real protective of us," she said.

Working in the bars for so long, Thomas has seen a lot of things, she said. Men sometimes buy roses and ask her to deliver them with messages she's embarrassed to say to another woman, Thomas said.

One night when Thomas was working in Snookie's Bar, a guy came up and asked her how much she would sell six roses for. He bought the six roses and had Thomas take them to her while he hid. Later, he bought another 12 roses from her and had her give them to the girl while he hid again. By the time the night was over, he gave her more than 30 roses and spent about $100.

"This guy never told her where they were from," Thomas said.

Thomas said she thought it was the most romantic and the oddest thing she has seen at work.

"It's really kind of neat when they buy them and don't let me tell the girl where they're from," she said.

Depending on the size of the bar and the number of people in it, the women spend 20-30 minutes in a bar.

"Each girl has maybe seven or eight bars," Pyle said.

She said she expects them to make two or three passes through their bars a night. The women don't have to pay a cover charge to get into the bars.

"We've got arrangements with all the bars we go to," Pyle said.

Thomas said she has the best luck selling roses in Silverado Saloon, but she's not sure why. Her success usually depends on what time it is, she said.

Students spend more at the beginning of the semester when their financial aid comes in. The military customers usually spend more around payday.

"A lot of people are really rude when I tell them how much the roses are," Thomas said.

When customers complain they can get the roses cheaper somewhere else, Thomas said she tells them they can't because no one else is open.

Pyle said she expects her product to hold up through being dipped in beer, bent and bruised by life in a bar.

"I start with a fresher product," she said.

Pyle buys her roses directly from the growers.

Since she sells such a high volume of roses, she can keep purchasing new roses.

"If we want it to last, you've got to start with a fresher product," she said.

Pyle said she sells nearly all of her roses in the bars, although she does things for friends or organizations on contract.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Peterson: Forums set up; no one showed the executive branch, Peterson said.

Clayton Wheeler, Student Senate chair, is going to seek more funding for the legislative branch, Peterson said.

Wheeler said the net amount of money will be about even because salary increases will be partially offset by cuts in the communications budget, Peterson said.

Peterson said if he were in charge of the legislative budget, it would not be increased.

Beginning in February and lasting until April, the Kansas Board of Regents will consider tuition and fees for the 1996-1997 academic year, said Ray Hauke, director of planning and budget for the board.

So, it will not be known for some time whether Peterson and Finkeldei's opposition to campus-fee increases will be effective.

"So far, no one is talking about a fee increase because we've said from the beginning we're not going to support it," Finkeldei said.

"So, it looks like for the first time in eight years, there won't be an increase."

■ Open Communication With Students

Candidates Peterson and Finkeldei said they hoped to bring about more student involvement in government by listening to students.

Proposed by Peterson and Finkeldei were weekly forums and the printing in the Collegian of answers to students' letters of questions and concerns.

Neither of these ideas have been put into place.

The weekly forums would have allowed students to discuss their concerns on any issue — not just the major issues on campus, Peterson said in March.

Because no students showed up to the forums the first couple of weeks, the plan for forums was changed, Peterson said.

"We got a lot of talented people, and we couldn't have them putting all their time and energy into promoting a forum and spending their time there and no one showing up," Peterson said.

As a result, the president and vice president decided to conduct forums only when events necessitated them. This was the case with the forums at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon about the 50-cent fee overcharge and the bikes on sidewalks issue, Peterson said.

Peterson said he is happy with the communication he has with students. His open-door policy has allowed quality communication, he said.

"The mechanism isn't nearly as important as that it gets done," Peterson said of his method of listening to students.

■ Salary Reduction

Taking a paycut was one of the first things Peterson and Finkeldei wanted to do if they were elected, Finkeldei said during the candidacy announcement.

The 10-percent paycut proposal was meant to be an example that would lead the rest of student government to fiscal responsibility, Peterson and Finkeldei said recently. Finkeldei said in March that the money saved would be used to set up a scholarship.

The pair were not able to cut their pay because the salary is predetermined by rules, Peterson said.

Still, $500, which is 10 percent of the president and vice president's combined salary, was put into the general scholarship fund at the KSU Foundation, Finkeldei said.

City may condemn land acquiring Taco Tico and Panda Paradise. If the city can't buy the land from the owners, they will condemn the land and obtain it in the courts.

Petty said the Panda Paradise was in the middle of the negotiation process but the Taco Tico land was more of a problem.

"The problem with the Taco Tico acquisition is we have multiple parties involved. Both the owner of the land and the lease owner want compensation. That's probably why we will have to condemn that property," Petty said.

Larry Keltner, owner of the Taco Tico lease, said he had never been part of any acquisition plan.

"I have never had anything to do with it. The owner of the land is the Robert Stephan Land Trust. That's who the state has to deal with. I will not receive any compensation from the state when we're forced to relocate," he said.

Former Attorney General Robert Stephan was unable for comment.

Keltner said he planned to relocate Taco Tico when he found some land.

"Manhattan has been real good to us," he said.

"We really appreciate the support of the students and Fort Riley personnel."

The Kansas Veterinary Medical Association presented the award at its annual meeting in Wichita recently.

"I think he makes an excellent representative from our profession and is an excellent role model for young people interested in the vet profession or becoming a vet," Russell Frey, professor of veterinary medicine, said.

Selection of the award recipient is based on two main criteria, said Michael Lorenz, chairman of KVMA and professor of clinical sciences at K-State.

The first is the service or accomplishments to the veterinarian profession, which covers the veterinarian's practice, the Kansas Veterinarian Medical Association or the American Veterinarian Medical Association.

The second consideration is the recipient's community service or involvement, he said.

He has served as a district trustee for 2-1/2 terms in the northeast district of Kansas on the executive board.

Kobuszewski also served the American Veterinary Medical Association for eight years.

Student SENATE

▶ RESIGNATIONS

Chairpersons quit

3 committees must search for new leaders

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

The bombardment of resignations hit Student Senate like an avalanche Thursday night.

Tim Kukula, David Norris and Michele Meier each submitted letters of resignation for their positions as Student Senate chairpersons.

"The resignations have absolutely nothing to do with each other," Liz Ring, Senate vice chair, said.

Meier's resignation from her position as Parking and Campus Safety Committee chairperson took many senators by surprise.

Meier could not be reached for comment.

Philip Mudd, engineering senator, is part of the committee Meier resigned from. He said the semester had been a difficult one.

"Over the course of the semester and year, Michele Meier and several committee members have had different opinions on how the committee should work," Mudd said.

But there was no guessing about Norris' Elections Committee resignation.

"I quit because I had very strong philosophical problems with the election guidelines," Norris said.

"I was not going to limit election guideline spending."

Co-chairperson Chad Schneiter said he and Norris had different opinions in general. However, Norris said he will be finishing a final project before leaving.

"I will finish my project of designing a student-government home page on World Wide Web, because it is something that needs to be done," Norris said.

The decision to leave the Communications Committee wasn't as easy for Kukula.

Kukula's initial decision to resign occurred last December, but members of student government convinced him to give Senate another chance, he said.

"I really don't understand why it is was so urgent for me not to resign at that time," Kukula said.

He said the reasons for his resignation included demands from classes, internships and a different style of leadership.

"On a professional level, I am more radical than a lot of senators," he said. "If something needs to get done, I say if we have the power to do it, then let's get it done."

He said he thought things could get done faster in Senate, but that is not the students' fault.

He also said there are many student senators who put a lot of time into Senate, but the stress of time commitment and working with certain people within student government was more than he wanted to take on this semester.

"I didn't just say 'I'm pissed off and want to quit.' Instead, I weighed the consequences and felt that putting a new person in my place that would get along better with the people in student government would benefit Senate more than holding my position would," he said.

But Kukula said he hasn't totally given up thoughts of Senate.

"At this current time, it is not in my plans to return. But, I never say never."

■ Three committee chairs, Tim Kukula, David Norris and Michele Meier, resigned Thursday night.

■ The election guidelines bill passed.

■ Several elections committee meeting times were announced:
March 1 — Informational meeting from 4:30 to 6 p.m. in Union 204.
March 2 — Informational meeting from 7 to 8:30 p.m. in Union 209.
March 8 — Applications available in SGA office.
March 28 — Applications due at 4 p.m.

New guidelines pass

LISA ELLIOTT

Student Senate got another chance to pass the 1995 election guidelines last night.

After an hour and 25 minutes of debate and amendments, the elections guidelines were passed 43-7 with only three amendments to the guidelines introduced last week.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, presented the only amendment addressing the spending limits, which were the only part of the guidelines not approved by Student Body President Jeff Peterson.

LeDoux proposed an amendment allowing the candidates for Union Governing Board, Fine Arts Council and the Board of Student Publications to spend 100 percent of tuition on their campaigns.

"Union Governing Board, Fine Arts Council and the Board of Student Publications are campus-wide offices, so they should be able to spend as much as the student body president," LeDoux said.

The amendment passed by a vote of 29-14-1.

"I'm happy with how the regulations passed," Peterson said. "I think Senate dealt

Passage of election guidelines and the resignation of three committee chairpersons dominated the Student Senate meeting Thursday night.

Senate passed an amended version of election guidelines 43-7 after Jeff Peterson, student body president, vetoed the previous bill. The new campaign regulations include campaign spending limits, which were not included in the first bill.

Senate also accepted the resignations of three committee chairpersons.

Michele Meier, business senator, resigned her position as Parking and Campus Safety Committee chair. David Norris stepped down as Elections Committee co-chairperson. Tim Kukula gave up his position as communications chairperson.

Clayton Wheeler, Senate chair, is still trying to fill three positions in the graduate school after resignations at the beginning of the semester.

"I know of three people that have expressed interest in filling this position," Wheeler said. "I am trying to get in contact with the president of

Battle of the Bands

Six bands play in Aggieville bar for $400 prize

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

Amidst the Wednesday night clamour in a choking storm of generic cigarette smoke, there's only one thing that doesn't suffocate in the hungry congregation — the invincible thrashing, rocking and grooving of six bands seemingly oblivious to any strand of competion existing among them.

It was the Battle of the Bands.

Three local bands and three regional bands competed from 9 p.m. to after 1 a.m. at Snookie's Bar. It was the first night of two in which half a dozen bands would be competing for $400.

First up was a threesome from Columbia, Mo., known as "Wits End." Bassist Andy Francis, guitarist and vocalist Courtney J. Dothage and drummer John Walker hope to convey a source of positive originality. Their chemistry is reflected by a love of performing.

"We're just a bunch of individualists, and when individualists get together, you never know what's going to happen," Dothage said.

They were followed by "The Invisibles," a very "flailable" local band consisting of vocalist Ralph Reichert, Derek Macy on guitar, drummer Kendrick Beachy and Bill Hughs on bass.

They radiated an autonomous energy from the second they invaded the stage. Reichert's stalkingly seductive voice is haunted by the band's sort of innocent rage that could only be described as a ballistic orgasm on stage.

Their humor and restlessness seemed to be screaming that they wanted out of something. The crowd seemed to be ignited by their energy and a sarcastic intensity that was uncompromising throughout.

Equally intoxicating was "Pamper the Madman."

The band was made up of four Kansas City crooners who produced a raw and avenging sound.

Theresa Schloegel, the lead singer, who appeared as a bit of a twisted angel matriarch or a Raggedy Ann on heroin, was puppeteered by the spastic and melancholy vicious animals, bass guitarist Marshall Strong, guitarist Rob Wagner and drummer Chris Fuget.

Next, Billy Danger took the reins with more playful but scowling covers including Green Day, Violent Femmes and Gin Blossoms.

The Salina band is made up of guitarist and vocalist Aaron Householter, bass guitarist and Research projects go if lottery is voted out

COLLEGIAN STAFF
Collegian

K-State is at risk of losing millions of dollars on July 1 if the Kansas Lottery fails to tiptoe through the Kansas Legislature this spring.

"K-State depends on the lottery," Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said.

The lottery is projected to earn $156 million in net sales in 1996, and an estimated 90 percent is allocated for economic development programs that help fund K-State research.

But Oleen, chair of the reauthorization committee, said last time the lottery was to be reauthorized, the votes were sparse.

She said she doesn't expect votes in favor of the lottery to increase.

"What I am hearing in Topeka is that they don't want the lottery," Oleen said.

However, if the money doesn't come from lottery sales, there is no other way to fund programs like the research being done at K-State, she said.

"That money isn't in Topeka," Oleen said.

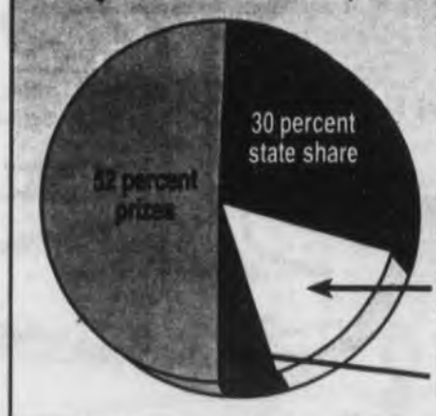
In fact, the statewide economic development that newly elected Gov. Bill Graves promised during his campaign largely depends on lottery dollars, Oleen said.

K-State, along with all the Kansas Board of Regents schools, participates in the economic development plan by providing centers of excellence.

The Value Added Center and the Advanced Manufacturing Institute are the two centers located at K-State.

These centers develop new products, test prototypes and often help new companies succeed.

Farhad Azadivar, director of the Advance Manufacturing Institute, said the center received $865,000 every fiscal year directly from Kansas Technology Enterprises Corporated. In turn, he said, K-Tech is fully funded by lottery earnings.



"If we didn't have those funds, we would have to close the institute," Azadivar said.

The research done at the institute employs faculty, students and full-time staff.

"As far as our University

▶ MANHATTAN HOSPITALS MAY MERGE TO REDUCE HEALTH-CARE COSTS

Memorial Hospital and the Saint Mary Hospital might be merged, the CEO of Saint Mary Hospital said.

"We are continuing to look at ways to work together and reduce the cost of health care for the community," said Mark Brown-Barnett, president of Saint Mary Hospital.

"One of the ways is to look at a potential merger," he said. "We could also have shared services and buy more high-technology equipment together."

Brown-Barnett said he knows of cities the size of Manhattan that have two hospitals and others that need only one medical facility.

"If we think that it's a situation where it makes sense to have one facility, we'll work toward that. But if we can have two facilities and still help keep costs down, we'll do it that way," Brown-Barnett said.

Brown-Barnett said that in the 1980s, a contract was drawn up between the two hospitals to designate Memorial, an 85-bed hospital, as the site for a maternity ward. The contract would have made Saint Mary, which has 105 beds, the location for emergency treatment.

"We did it for a while and then discontinued it because of a concern from the FTC about anti-trust," Brown-Barnett said. "The FTC never did file it, but the two hospitals decided it was in the best interest to do away with the contract."

Brown-Barnett said the two hospitals now have shared ownership of a $1.2-million magnetic resonance imager and an incinerator to burn waste. He said Saint Mary also has a contract to perform laundry services for Memorial Hospital.

He said the Federal Trade Commission doesn't have restrictions against the shared ownership of the MRI.

"It makes sense to have only one of a high-cost equipment in a community the size of Manhattan," Brown-Barnett said.

Mike Nunamaker, CEO of Memorial Hospital, said the reason the two hospitals originally started working together 2-1/2 years ago was rising health-care costs.

"Right now everyone is talking with everyone," Nunamaker said. "Our associations were put together to position ourselves for changes coming down the road in health care."

Brown-Barnett said a task force is being organized to devise a plan to outline how the two hospitals can have a better working relationship.

He said the 14-member task force will consist of representatives from both hospital boards, both owners and medical staff.

"They are going to start looking at the possibilities of what's out there for the two facilities," Brown-Barnett said. "The plan will probably take six to eight months. Add 12 months to that to work through the process."

Mike Nunamaker, CEO for Memorial Hospital, said until final plans are made, it's still unclear as to what will happen in the future.

"We have to see what would be gained for the community," Nunamaker said. "We don't know where we'll end up until we get further along."

▶ HOUSE APPROVES BALANCED-BUDGET AMENDMENT BY WIDE MARGIN

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a striking triumph for the new Republican majority, the House voted strong approval Thursday night for a balanced-budget amendment to the Constitution designed to eliminate chronic federal deficits.

The 300-132, bipartisan endorsement was 12 more than the two-thirds majority needed to send the measure to the Senate.

Supporters expressed confidence they would also prevail there, despite the likelihood of a protracted battle later this winter, and would ultimately send the measure to the states for a final ratification drive.

Loud cheers erupted in the chamber when Speaker Newt Gingrich, architect of last fall's GOP election sweep in the House, announced the results of a preliminary roll call that demonstrated sufficient support to pass the measure.

The vote came little more than three weeks after Republicans took control of the House and launched a 100-day effort to implement their conservative "Contract With America," with its promise of lower taxes and less government.

After the House approved the amendment, Gingrich called it a bipartisan, historic moment for the country and said newly empowered Republicans had kept their promise to the voters.

The White House reacted coolly. "We all want to see a balanced budget," said press spokesman Mike McCurry. "But the president would also like to see the details of how the House would propose to meet this new constitutional requirement." Clinton has no formal say in the amendment; it would go directly from Congress to the states.

Before the final vote, Democrats failed in an effort to force Republicans to unveil a detailed program of spending cuts and failed again in a politically enticing attempt to exempt Social Security from spending reductions in the future. Republicans insist they plan no Social Security cuts.

But the Democrats succeeded in thwarting a more severe amendment that would have required three-fifths majority votes in Congress to raise taxes.

The measure received the support of 228 of the House's 230 Republicans and 72 Democrats — more than a third of those voting. Among them was Rep. Charles Stenholm, D-Texas., a veteran of past legislative wars, who noted wryly that the Republican leadership was far more cooperative than the Democratic majority had been of budget-balancing efforts.

Two Republicans — first-termers Mark Souder and John Hostettler, both of Indiana — as well as 129 Democrats were opposed, as was the House's lone independent, Bernard Sanders of Vermont.

Showcase showdown

MARK LEFFINGWELL/Collegian

Audrey Deines, junior in human resource management, was a contestant on the TV game show "The Price is Right" in early January.

Student gets the price right, wins $6,200

REBECCA SCHULZ
Collegian

"Come on down. You're the next contestant on 'The Price is Right.'"

Audrey Deines, junior in human resource management, had the privilege of having her name called to be the next contestant on "The Price is Right." While in California for a family reunion on Jan. 5, Deines was able to be on the show.

"It's really interesting because we waited almost six hours to get on the show. You see all these different types of people and everybody kind of competing with everybody. Oh, you wonder if she'll get on," Deines said.

Deines, her sister and grandparents arrived at the show at 6 a.m. in hopes of making it into the audience. Two hours later, they were given tickets for the 1:15 p.m. show.

At noon, after waiting four hours, Deines said all hopeful contestants were lined up and interviewed. Ten people at a time were interviewed by the director and his assistant.

"'Hi, guys my name is Audrey Deines. I'm from a small town called Hoisington, Kansas, and I'm really just glad to be here,'" said Deines.

"I was loud, and I was energetic. They just say that if you're in a good mood, they'll pick you," she said.

Deines said she was more than a little surprised when the announcer called her name.

"I had two chances left. I just started screaming," she said.

The first items up for bid were two cameras. Deines said she bid $550, but a man who bid $575 won.

Deines' sister Kerri said she tried to help from the audience.

"I tried to yell what I thought the prices were," she said.

Deines said she only had one last chance to get on the stage.

"I was the last bidder. There were 18 telephones. Everyone was bidding $900 and $1,000 and $800. So everybody was hollering $1. So I bid $1, and I got up there," Deines said.

"I just couldn't believe she got up on stage," Kerri said.

Deines played the check game. The object of the game is to write a check so the total amount of the prize and check add up to between $5,000 and $6,000.

She said she asked Bob Barker, the host of "The Price is Right," to explain the game.

"I was just killing time because I was trying to think of how much to write my check for."

Deines wrote the check for $2,400, won the game and went on to the bonus round.

The object of the bonus round is to spin a wheel two times and get the sum of both spins as close to $1 without going over.

Deines said there were two other people in the bonus round in addition to her.

"I was last because I had the most prizes of the three."

The first man to spin won $1,000 by hitting the $1 mark. The next person to spin went over. Then it was Deines' turn.

"I think I got a 40, and then it was almost up to the 60, but it stopped right before. But everything is kind of a blur because you know everything goes so quick," she said.

Deines' total winnings on the show were $6,200.

After much repetition of her story, Deines's friends and family finally believed her.

As for the 18 telephones, Kerri said she will be getting two of the telephones.

"Well, everybody wants one, so merry Christmas and happy birthday, and I have a couple of weddings that I'm going to give them to. I'm going to see if I can take them back to Wal-Mart and get money for them," Deines said.

The show Deines appeared on will be aired on Feb. 13.

"I was loud, and I was energetic. They just say that if you're in a good mood, they'll pick you."

Task force addresses parking

AMY SIMON
Collegian

A parking solution may be near for K-State drivers.

After compiling student surveys last semester, the parking task force is taking the information and proceeding with a recommendation on parking to President Jon Wefald and his staff.

This recommendation is expected by Wednesday.

Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance and member of the parking task force, said several factors will be considered when making the decision.

The task force will consider survey results, comments made by students and faculty, and projected enrollment to arrive at a recommendation, Rawson said.

The committee's report to the president will include both long-term and short-term recommendations, said Jeff Peterson, student body president and member of the parking task force.

Short-term recommendations may include the restricted sale of parking permits and elimination of reserve stalls, Peterson said. These recommendations would be put into effect by next fall.

Long-term recommendations may involve building a parking garage or operating a shuttle service, Peterson said. These recommendations should be implemented within the next five years.

Peterson said he was pleased with the progress of the task force so far this semester.

"The issue is finally going to be addressed," Peterson said. "We are glad that we had the opportunity to help find a real solution to a real problem."

The parking task force has heard from several speakers about options for solving the parking problem on campus.

The task force met Monday morning to hear from representatives about a parking structure. The task force met again Wednesday with representatives of Eden Bright Company of Atlanta, a company that runs a shuttle service, said Peterson.

The parking task force also participated in a teleconference last week with the University of Missouri, Peterson said. The task force wanted to get some input from MU school officials, who operate a shuttle service and are building their fifth parking structure.

MEETING TIME
The parking task force will meet from 8:30 to 10:30 a.m. today in Anderson 116.

IN OUR OPINION

Removal of lottery will hurt Kansas universities

Both the Center and the Institute provide incentives for students educate in Kansas' universities to stay here.

Most of us probably don't think too much about the Kansas Lottery, except when the tickets catch our eye at Quik Cats and we occasionally give in to our get-rich-quick fantasies.

To some students, it means more than that.

The Value Added Center and the Advanced Manufacturing Institute at K-State employ more than 40 graduate students.

These two facilities and "centers of excellence" at the other regents universities develop new corporate programs and technologies for use in Kansas. They are wholly funded by proceeds from the Kansas Lottery. Without the support of this revenue source, both would be forced to close.

Although the voters approved the enacting of the lottery in 1986 by a majority of 64 percent, an act repealing the bill is currently before a reauthorization committee.

From this action it would seem to follow that economic growth is to be considered harmful. Both the Center and the Institute provide incentives for students educated in Kansas' universities to stay here.

Only seven states in the nation graduate more engineers than Kansas, but 42 states employ more of them. These centers provide the Kansas economy with a badly needed boost, not to mention lending K-State students invaluable career opportunities.

'Heterosexism' is what we all need a cure for

KEVYN JACOBS

GUEST COLUMN

I read an editorial in a conservative magazine awhile back, in which the columnist lamented being accused of homophobia.

He felt homophobia was an inaccurate description of himself. "A homophobe," the author said, "is someone who fears or hates homosexuals.

I neither fear nor hate homosexuals, so I must not be a homophobe. However, I do object strongly to homosexual activity on moral, ethical and religious grounds."

The author went on to say that homophobia is an irrational fear. "Our opposition to homosexuality is based on very rational and logical grounds," he said.

I have to agree with the author — he is correct in saying he is not guilty of homophobia.

He is guilty of heterosexism.

Heterosexism is a relatively new term in the ongoing evolution of our language.

Heterosexism is the belief that heterosexuality is better than homosexuality, that homosexual relationships are not as valid as heterosexual ones.

Heterosexism also refers to the institutional enforcement of this belief — that is, the everyday things that give "special rights" to heterosexuals but deny equal rights for homosexuals.

Here are a few examples of the privileges ("special rights") institutional heterosexism gives to heterosexuals:

■ Marriage rights. Heterosexuals are allowed to marry the person they love. Homosexual couples cannot.

Heterosexual couples are entitled to receive all of the benefits that the government and the private sector can give to married couples: Government recognition of the relationship, joint property rights, tax breaks, joint insurance, inheritance rights, power of attorney, hospital visitation rights, exemption from testifying against your spouse in court.

Heterosexual couples can walk down the street holding hands without fear of being beaten for it. Homosexual couples cannot, and if they are attacked, they are blamed for 'flaunting it' or 'bringing it on themselves.'

Homosexual couples don't get any of these, and when they demand them, they are accused of wanting "special rights."

In short, heterosexism says that a heterosexual pairing is a legitimate relationship, but a homosexual one isn't — homosexual pairings are "just for sex."

■ Custodial and adoption rights. A heterosexual couple can legally adopt a child. A homosexual couple cannot.

In fact, in many jurisdictions, heterosexist laws make being in a homosexual relationship grounds for having your children taken away from you "for their own good".

This happened recently to Sharon Bottoms, a mother in Virginia whose child was stolen away from her because a heterosexist judge didn't approve of her lesbian relationship.

Heterosexism tells people that "since heterosexual relationships are better, we need to keep children away from homosexuals. If you expose children to homosexuality, they will become homosexual themselves."

Of course, the evidence shows this is not true — most children raised in homosexual households end up being heterosexual.

■ Job security. Heterosexuals have the "special right" of knowing they won't be fired from their job because of who they love.

But guess what — heterosexism means that a person in a homosexual relationship can be fired for this at any time — and usually without legal recourse.

Most people don't realize that in Kansas, you can fire a homosexual just for being a homosexual. And there is nothing that person can do about it.

In addition to these institutional benefits granted to heterosexuals, there are a few social ones that I think should be mentioned:

■ Personal security. Heterosexual couples can walk down the street holding hands without fear of being beaten for it.

Homosexual couples cannot, and if they are attacked, they are blamed for "flaunting it" or "bringing it on themselves."

■ Inclusion. Heterosexism allows heterosexuals to see themselves represented in TV shows and movies, ads, magazines and entertainment.

Homosexuals are usually not presented in these media as being in a couple, much less as being in a legitimate relationship and part of society.

Homosexual relationships are invisible — and encouraged to stay that way by heterosexists.

This is the reason so many homosexuals feel the need to "come out" and proclaim their sexuality to the world — to destroy that invisibility that they feel forced into.

In other words, if heterosexism didn't make people uncomfortable about homosexuality, homosexuals wouldn't need gay pride parades and "in-your-face" queer visibility.

Being publicly let out lets other homosexuals know they are not alone in a heterosexist system.

These are all examples of how heterosexism affects heterosexuals and homosexuals in their daily lives.

They all give special privileges to heterosexuals.

They are all damaging to gay people.

And they are all hated by the people they hurt.

But to say these are all examples of homophobia would probably be inaccurate. They aren't homophobic — they are heterosexist.

Laws and rules against homosexuals may be very logical and sound, if you believe that homosexual relationships are inferior to heterosexual ones.

They're not necessarily guided by fear of homosexuals, but instead by the idea that it is better for someone to be in an opposite-gender relationship than a same-gender one, and therefore heterosexual relationships should be encouraged while homosexual ones are discouraged.

I have noticed a lot of mainstream use of the word 'homophobia' lately, and I think that some of the criticism leveled against its use is justified. The overuse of the word "homophobia" by many gay-rights advocates to describe anyone who opposes homosexual issues has led to an incorrect usage of the word.

In other words, if heterosexism didn't make people uncomfortable about homosexuality, homosexuals wouldn't need gay pride parades and 'in-your-face' queer visibility.

It is not accurate to call someone who opposes homosexuals a homophobe if, in fact, they sincerely believe that their opposition is based on logical reasoning instead of fear.

Perhaps it is time to start naming opposition to homosexuals for what it is, instead of what it isn't. Joe Six-Pack may be a homophobe because he fears what is new and unknown to a good ol' boy from Longford, where they never talked about homosexuals.

But you can be sure that someone like Pat Robertson or John Hart doesn't oppose homosexuals because of homophobia — they have thought the issue out and belive that they are supporting the correct position.

A position that is based on the notion that homosexual relationships are inferior to heterosexual ones — heterosexism.

Heterosexism is the position that we need to attack. Because no one should have the right to tell another person whom they are allowed to love.

▶ MULTICULTURALISM

Errors found in column

Dear editor,

Jeremy Stephens, in his article "Multiculturalism can't be taught; it must reach the heart and mind" which appeared in the Jan. 20 edition of the K-State Collegian, included some incorrect information about the Civil Rights Act of 1991.

He also reported some incorrect information about the construction company that was denied a contract because of the Act.

The Civil Rights Act of 1991 does not give preference to minority and women-owned businesses in the awarding of federal contracts.

Section 3 of the Act reads: The purposes of the act are —

1) to provide the appropriate remedies for intentional discrimination and unlawful harassment in the workplace.

2) to codify the concepts of "business necessity" and "job related" enunciated by the Supreme Court in Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971), and in other Supreme Court decisions prior to Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio, 490 U.S. 642 (1989).

3) to confirm the statutory authority and provide statutory guidelines for the adjudication of disparate impact suite under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e et seq.) and

4) to respond to recent decisions of the Supreme Court by expanding the scope of relevant civil rights statutes in order to provide adequate protection to victims of discrimination.

The Act is available for review in 214 Anderson Hall or in the Federal Documents section on the third floor of Farrell Library.

Mr. Stephens incorrectly reported the construction company that did not get the contract is located in Washington, D.C.

Actually, the company is an appellant case before the U.S. Supreme Court in Washington, D.C.

Christians should be tolerant

Dear editor,

I was practically crying on the way to class today. I was full of anger and pain. It wasn't because the air was too cold or because of a fight with a friend the night before. It was because of the message of hatred and intolerance that I read in John Hart's editorial in this morning's Collegian.

Mr. Hart implies that homosexuality is immoral. He implies that it is wrong to destroy the "taboo" associated with homosexuality. The only justification he has for this is the Bible, which some people do not accept as a collection of moral laws. Even some Christians believe that homosexuality is not a sin!

In writing this editorial, Mr. Hart has failed to listen to some of the other messages of the Bible. Jesus himself lived his life as a tolerant person. He accepted those who no one else in society dared to accept. Shouldn't Christians follow his example?

Although my only association with homosexuals has been talking and debating with them in several forums over the Internet, I do know that they are human beings.

We all must wake up in the morning and go to school or work. We all have friends and enemies. We all feel pain, fear, love and joy. Why is sexual orientation such a big deal? Unless you want to date a person, it should be irrelevant in day-to-day life. I am sick of all the intolerance I see every day. I am sick of seeing people determine others to be "worthy" or "unworthy" based on race, sex, religion, sexual orientation, clothing, major and/or social background. I am striving to teach tolerance to myself, and hopefully through my actions I will teach it to others.

"I always thought the Bible said, 'Judge not, lest ye be judged.'"

I try to accept all beliefs with only the exceptions of those which are intolerant of the beliefs and values of others. Why do human beings feel that we must fight against those who do not conform to outdated, ignorant societal rules? Why can't we accept others as individuals, each with a unique mind, each playing a different part in this thing we call "life"?

I always thought the Bible said, "Judge not, lest ye be judged." After reading Mr. Hart's editoral, it seems that I was mistaken.

▶ GRADUATION

New fee is unfair decision

Dear Editor,

I applaud your editorial in Tuesday's paper concerning the new $15 fee for graduation. Seldom am I in agreement with editorials, but in this case I most definitely am. The editorial board has certainly shown, by this course of action, that they will not be intimidated by prevailing factors which might exist. For this, you have my utmost respect.

I would like to direct the latter portions of my letter to Elizabeth Unger, vice provost of academic services and Technology. This is who the letter concerning the newly imposed graduation fee is from. It is not the concept of having a graduation fee that concerns me. I do admit I have to question the amount that we pay for the ceremonies going from zero to $15 all in one action. Why not make it incremental each year or so?

It comes as a terrible disappointment to me, that K-State would implement such a shabby, thrown-together-at-the-last-minute policy. I hope the University realizes the message they have conveyed: that this unacceptable quality of work is really acceptable here at KSU. I am sorry , but it is not acceptable by any standards.

New Smithsonian exhibit to feature buck-naked senator

Former Sen. David Boren of Oklahoma says he thought he was posing for a posture analysis when he was told to shed his clothes and get in front of the camera at Yale University more than 30 years ago.

Boren was just one of thousands of Ivy-League students who were photographed in the buff. The photos were taken for several decades as part of physical education classes at the university, then later used by a researcher examining the relationship between body shape and intelligence.

The Smithsonian Institution now has possession of many of the photos.

"All Americans dream that someday they might appear in the permanent record of the Smithsonian, but this is not what I had in mind," said Boren, who is now president of the University of Oklahoma.

"I have always advocated full disclosure by public officials, but this is really going too far," he said in a statement.

A recent New York Times report said that among those Ivy-Leaguers who would have been subject to the ritual were President Bush, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Diane Sawyer.

No, really!

Tired of eating salad with the wrong fork? Here's a class for you

At Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the home of the style-challenged "Techie Nerd," Wednesday's class list ranged from Avoiding Shyness to Ballroom Dancing. The professors included Miss Manners.

Her one-day "Charm School" at M.I.T., seemed to attract more attention than a debate over cold fusion at a school where Nobel scientists are the true stars and putting a fake cow on a 150-foot dome is considered good fun.

"I gave up sex for a year to finish my Ph.D., so I thought I'd go to Charm School to learn how to ask for a date," said Ross Lavinsky, 24, who was wearing a suit — not to look charming, but because he had just completed the oral defense of his dissertation.

Now in its third year, Charm School is part high-tech gag, part training in comportment. It was born out of Dean Travis Merritt's distaste for what he calls the "Institute Scuttle" — head down, no eye contact, feet shuffling close together.

This could be an excellent replacement for everybody's favorite class, DEN 450. A's could be given for table manners, dancing the foxtrot and sipping tea.

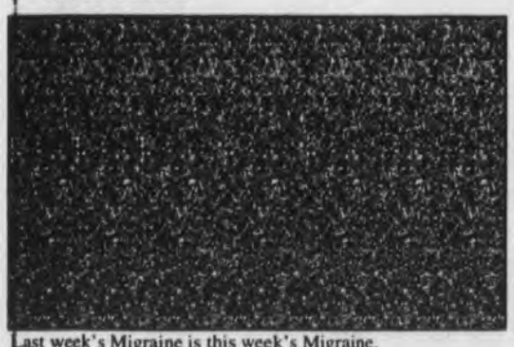
I am leaving you, Mark, and I'm taking Rocky with me!

Dogs are more like property than children and don't belong in a divorce case over custody and visitation rights, an appeals court ruled.

Since their divorce in July 1992, Ronald G. Bennett and Kathryn R. Rogers have been fighting over Roddy, a mutt who resembles a miniature Rottweiler.

A judge involved in their divorce in Jacksonville, Fla., awarded custody to Bennett, who has moved to southern Florida. But the judge also said Ms. Rogers, who moved to St. Louis, could take the dog every other month.

Bennett appealed, arguing that Roddy was a pre-marital asset belonging to him and wasn't subject to visitation rights.



The First District Court of Appeals in Tallahassee agreed this week, saying Florida law considers a dog personal property.

"Our courts are overwhelmed with the supervision of custody, visitation and support matters related to the protection of our children. We cannot undertake the same responsibility for animals," the court said.

Oh boy, wait until the whiners over at People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals hears about this one.

Snow Sports

When the snow falls, people head for the hills with sleds, inner tubes and cookie sheets

There might not be snow on the ground now, but K-State students' snow dreams may come true this weekend.

Snow is in the forecast for tonight or Saturday.

Dropping temperatures and snow flurries can be unwelcome to some people, but it's perfect weather for winter sports.

Gail Hartter, sophomore in speech pathology, said she has fond memories of past winters when her family would go ice skating, play hockey and drink hot chocolate. Hartter said she can also remember practicing figure eights and sledding on the frozen pond.

"On my family's farm we have several ponds, so when it gets cold enough we all go there to have fun. My whole family enjoys the time together," Hartter said. "The wonderful memories will last forever."

Although many students might remember sledding as a child, the activity can also be fun as a college student. Donna Durler, senior in elementary education, said CiCo Park is the perfect location.

> "You want enough snow that when you fall down it doesn't hurt. The fun part is running forward while looking back and falling into snowdrifts."
> JOANNA MCGRAW

"CiCo Park is a great place to go sledding because they are prepared for it," Durler said. "They even have gymnastic mats wrapped around the trees to that you don't get hurt."

Leslie Garmon, senior in architectural engineering, decided that two bowl games were enough on Jan. 2, so he went outside to enjoy the weather.

But the snowman he built on the east side of West Hall was not the typical snowman. This snowman was sitting in a chair watching the bowl games like many football fans were doing that day.

Garmon said it took him about three hours to build, and when it snows, he would like to do it again.

For members of the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity, a favorite snow activity is sliding down the back driveway on cookie sheets borrowed from the house kitchen, Casey Niemann, junior in agriculture business, said.

"We've lost a cookie sheet or two down the gutter drain at the bottom of the hill, but we're lucky we have a hill to slide down on," Niemann said.

Football also seems to be a favorite for many who enjoy snow activities. For Joanna McGraw, sophomore in animal science, it is a Christmas Day family tradition that began because many of her relatives played football.

McGraw said the rules her family plays by are not the same as in normal football games. Five downs are allowed. There are no extra points, and five seconds must pass before the quarterback can be rushed. Depending on the size of the field, the ball may be punted or placed two feet in front of the goal and worked back down the field.

"You want enough snow that when you fall down it doesn't hurt. The fun part is running forward while looking back and falling into snowdrifts," McGraw said.

Others learned how to play one-on-one football. Todd Stewart, senior in secondary education, has memories of playing with his little brother, even though he admits it is hard to play with only two people. They would hike the ball to one another, then toss the ball over the other's head. So actually, Stewart was passing to himself.

"I was bigger than my little brother and I was always throwing him in the ditch when I tackled him," Stewart said.

Stewart also enjoyed playing basketball in his front yard when snow was everywhere. He would dress in warm clothes and then go play with all of the neighborhood kids.

"It was pretty hard to do when you had so many clothes on you couldn't move," Stewart said.

A pickup or tractor that pulled a sled provided snow memories for Justin Salmans, senior in industrial engineering. Salmans and his friends tied a rope on both ends and stood up as if they were skiing. Sometimes they pulled an inner tube with four or five friends in it instead.

"We didn't have any stoplights or police officers. So sometimes it was five or six people being pulled down the street, but I don't think they do that any more," Salmans said.

Six- to eight-foot snow drifts are what Ted Glasco, senior in computer science, remembers surrounding the grain bins at his home. He built snow forts and tunnels in the drifts.

When it did snow, the snow usually came down sideways. The wide-open country, which didn't have trees to stop the wind, created semi-blizzard conditions. Glasco remembers being out of school for a week at a time because of the weather.

"It seems in recent years, there is a lot less snow," Laurie Peterson, freshman in mechanical engineering, said.

That has caused a problem making snowmen because when she starts rolling the snowball around, it gets grass and dirt in it, which can make the snowman look pretty shabby, she said.

There are a lot of fun things to do in the snow, but some people still haven't been able to fulfill their wildest fantasies.

"Someday I'm going to roll in the snow with my honey. That's the ultimate snow dream," said Mindi Woods, senior in biology/pre-medicine.

Columnist will show readers the stars

Hello.

My name is Christy Calloway, and I want to introduce you to a new column that may be added to the Collegian based on your response.

The column will be similar to the horoscope section written by Jaqulin Broyer in the Kansas City Star. The difference will be that I'll write only one planetary forecast per week and a special question/answer box for astrology.

I will answer one of your questions every week. The questions can be sent to the me at the Collegian in Kedzie 116.

To give you general background knowledge of my experience and expertise in the field of astrology, I have researched and experimented with it for more than seven years.

The last two years have been highly successful, and I have conducted research and investigation of many types. I've read numerous books and met with many professional astrologers.

I hope all my answers to your questions will be satisfactory. Your planetary forecast will be written completely unbiased and is not meant to have negative effects.

Thanks, and please send in any suggestions or comments that might be beneficial.

TODD FEEBACK/Collegian

Senior forward Stanley Hamilton defends an Iowa State player during K-State's 79-73 loss to the 12th-ranked Cyclones at Bramlage Coliseum. The Cats travel to Ames Saturday for the rematch. Tip-off time is 12:40 p.m. at Hilton Coliseum.

Cats to face ISU on road

COLLEGIAN STAFF
Collegian

When visiting teams step inside Iowa State's Hilton Coliseum, few escape with a win.

Kansas was the first Big Eight victim of the year, and unless the Wildcats can stop the nationally ranked Cyclones in Saturday's game, K-State could be the next team that falls to "Hilton Magic."

Iowa State has won 72 percent of its games played at Hilton Coliseum, and the Cyclones already hold a 10-0 home record this season. But playing outside the friendly confines of Hilton, Iowa State nearly lost a close one against the Cats during last Saturday's contest in Manhattan, slipping by with a 79-73 victory. That win ended the Cyclones' three-game losing streak in Bramlage Coliseum.

Cyclone senior Fred Hoiberg said after the game that he'd gained a lot of respect for the Cats.

"They're a good ball club," he said.

"They're probably the most athletic team in the Big Eight. Going to Kansas and losing by four — I'm not sure we could do that. We've got a lot of respect for Kansas State, and we're going to come out prepared on Saturday."

The Cats may be a little more prepared for their second meeting with the Cyclones after notching a much-needed 87-77 victory at home Wednesday night against the nationally ranked Oklahoma Sooners.

"We needed a win to keep our heads up," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "We played so hard, we needed to get a win."

K-State's Tyrone Davis agreed with Asbury.

"This game helps us in a lot of ways," he said.

"We know that if we just start finishing some of these games, we are going to win some of them according to the law of averages"

TOM ASBURY
Men's basketball coach

"It gets rid of some of the frustration of losing so many close games."

Those close games included their last three losses to three ranked conference teams by a total of just 16 points.

"If we would have lost this fifth one in a row, then it would have taken a lot out of us," K-State's Stanley Hamilton said.

"This game we had to win."

The Cats are hoping to fare better in Ames than they did in last year's Hilton outing on March 6.

But Coach Asbury said after Wednesday's game that he thinks the Cats can take a little more confidence to Ames with them.

"I was worried about it," he said.

"We've been talking about it all week. We know that if we just start finishing some of these games, we are going to win some of them according to the law of averages."

▶ TRACK AND FIELD

Tracksters to battle Mizzou and KU

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

The track team runs for Columbia, Mo., Saturday for its annual grudge match with Kansas and Missouri.

The MU/KU/KSU Triangular gets under way at 9 a.m. Saturday at the Hearnes Center in Columbia.

Gwen Wentland leads the charge after a stunning performance last Friday in the Wildcat Pentathlon.

Wentland broke her own world pentathlon high jump record with a leap of 6 feet 4-1/2 inches.

"She's so much stronger this season," Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"It's really no secret either, she's just been working hard."

Wentland will be competing in the long jump, triple jump and high jump this Saturday.

The K-State women have been impressive in other areas as well.

Belinda Hope is undefeated at 400 meters so far this season and will compete in the event again at Missouri.

"Belinda is running very, very well," Rovelto said.

"I think she's got an excellent chance of qualifying for the NCAA Championships later this season."

Hope was the Big Eight Conference runner-up in the event outdoors last season.

The men's squad, which has been strapped with nagging injuries so far this season, will finally be returning some athletes.

Ed Broxterman will compete for the first time since Dec. 9, when he suffered a ruptured appendix.

"He's been training for a while, and he looks fine," Rovelto said.

Broxterman's teammate Itai Margalit will also be competing in the meet.

Margalit captured first at the KSU Invitational with a height of 7'1".

The third member of the high-jumping trio is K-State linebacker Percell Gaskins.

He is still nursing a sore knee and will not compete. Rovelto said he is unsure when Gaskins will return.

Steve Duren's status is still unclear, Rovelto said. The long jumper/sprinter will wait until the day of the meet to decide whether or not to compete.

Duren set a provisionally qualifying mark of 25'3-1/2" at the Wildcat Invitational Dec. 14.

He has a slightly strained hamstring.

"His injury is not serious," Rovelto said. "We just don't want to rush things at this point."

The meet also marks the second straight week the team will compete against the Jayhawks.

Saturday, the Wildcat women's team outscored Kansas 180-152 en route to taking home first place in the KSU Invitational.

The men finished second behind the Jayhawks 138-95.

"It would have been impossible for the men to win this meet because we had too many guys who didn't compete," Rovelto said.

"I'm sure KU had people they didn't run, but we need to get some people back in competition."

FOOTBALL CLIPBOARD

▶ COLEMAN GOES TO SUPERBOWL

Former K-State football player Andre Coleman has gone from the Copper Bowl to the Super Bowl in one year.

Coleman is a rookie for the San Diego Chargers and will return kickoffs for the Chargers in Super Bowl XXIX against the San Francisco 49ers on Sunday.

Coleman, a third-round draft pick, made the college-to-pro transition by finishing second in the AFC in kickoff returns with a 26.4-yard average.

He also had two returns for touchdowns during his first NFL season, including one in the Chargers' win against the Pittsburgh Steelers in the final game of the season.

Kuregian makes her spring debut

Ahearn Field House is the place to be this weekend for three days of action-filled tennis.

The K-State tennis team will open up match play at 4 p.m. today against Oral Roberts University.

In this match, junior Karina Kuregian, K-State's top-ranked player, will see her first playing action of the spring season.

Kuregian, who is ranked No. 9 in the nation, according to the recent Rolex Collegiate Rankings, returns to the court after sitting out last weekend's match to conserve her number of matches under NCAA regulations.

Kuregian continues to test her physical condition after successful back surgery last spring. She returned in the fall to record an 11-2 season mark.

An injury could be a problem for one of K-State's leaders.

Senior Martine Shrubsole will be questionable for not only this weekend's matches but for most of the spring season with a back injury.

Shrubsole was diagnosed with a disk injury similar to the one Kuregian suffered last season.

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said Shrubsole will compete sparingly throughout the spring season based on the condition of her back.

The Wildcats will host Boise State on Saturday. In the latest Central Regional rankings, K-State was tied with Boise State and Utah for sixth.

Sunday, the Cats will host the Creighton Blue Jays. Both matches are scheduled to start at 10 a.m. in Ahearn.

K-State opened its spring season last Saturday at Ahearn with a 9-0 defeat of the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Bietau said he was pleased with what he saw after his team's first match.

"It was good for us just to get back on the court and play a match again," Bietau said.

"We've only been practicing two weeks, and our emphasis has been on conditioning. We haven't concentrated any on playing, so it was good to get the first match jitters out of the way and feel a little competition again."

After the winter break, the squad showed little sign of rust in the spring opener.

Sophomore Karen Nicholson handed Manju Subramanian a 6-2, 6-1 defeat in No. 1 singles.

Dinah Watson, a freshman from England, followed with an easy 6-1, 6-1 win over Chris Black in No. 2 singles.

In No. 3 singles, newcomer Chris Schulte posted a 6-1, 6-0 victory over Alia Iqbal. The Wildcats ended with walk-on Heidy Hoffman, in her first collegiate match, pulling out a 1-6, 6-3, 7-6 (2) win over Stacey Kuhn.

All three doubles teams had little trouble in their opening matches, giving up only five games during the day.

Bietau said this weekend's matches will be a bigger test for his team.

"It's too early to say how we are playing," Bietau said.

"We will play a lot more tennis and some better teams. Most of our players will get about six matches in this weekend, so that will be a better evaluation of how we're coming along."

K-State to visit CU and MU

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

K-State will take to the road this weekend in an attempt to reverse a three-game losing streak.

The Cats travel to Boulder today to take on the Colorado Buffaloes. Sunday, they will face the Missouri Tigers in Columbia.

Colorado, ranked No. 5 in the nation, will be the Cats' toughest opponent so far this season. Colorado's only losses this year came at the hands of Louisiana Tech and Tennessee.

"Colorado's game starts inside," said K-State coach Brian Agler.

"They've got six-foot-five center Isabelle Fijalkowski inside, so you definitely have to do a good job of guarding the post."

"We've played against a lot of good post players, but Colorado is so balanced. There are really no weaknesses," Agler said.

On the outside, Colorado is led by senior point guard Shelley Sheetz. Sheetz is an all-American and Naismith Award candidate who currently holds the Big Eight record for career three-point shots.

Agler said Sheetz shouldn't create the problems that Angela Aycock, the last all-American they faced, did.

"Shelley really isn't the go-to scorer that Angela is, so we shouldn't have the problem with fouls," Agler said.

Agler said another concern is the pressure defense the Buffaloes put on the ball.

"They play really good defense, really disciplined," Agler said.

"If we can execute on offense, sustain some offense, we can break them down defensively.

"But we need to be a little more patient offensively, break our opponent's defense down like they'll do to us."

Following the Colorado game, the Cats will fly to Columbia to take on the Missouri Tigers.

Missouri returns all-conference selection forward Erika Martin and Big Eight Tournament MVP forward Nikki Smith.

Super Bowl XXIX

Welcome end to NFC streak draws near

DEREK SIMMONS

Everything must end.

You know, like a song, the Roman Empire, the Great Flood, the Bee Gees, lazy summer days. And, well, streaks.

It's like this little winning string the NFC has managed in the last 10 Super Bowls. Just when you expect something to happen, like the San Francisco 49ers grounding the San Diego Chargers in Super Bowl XXIX, it won't.

Yes, yes, I know — the 49ers are favored by an overwhelming 19 points, have more weapons than three or four AFC (Alternate Football Conference) teams combined and are seeking their fifth Super Bowl trophy (more than any other team).

The 49ers should win. They've got the talent. They're the best team in the NFL. There isn't really any conceivable reason why they should lose. But that's why they will.

This is as good of time as any for the AFC to re-establish itself as a conference that really does exist, via the Chargers.

But the decade of deficiency isn't a San Diego thing. Heck, this is the Chargers' first trip. A clean slate, so to speak. No more Buffalo "we have to go out there and prove something" Bills.

Only a handful expected San Diego to make it. I thought they'd lose to Miami. Nope. I was sure they'd get slaughtered by a Super Bowl-worthy Pittsburgh team. Wrong.

The NFC string began with the 49ers' 38-16 romp against Miami in 1985. San Francisco is the one that started this mess — the least they could do is stop it.

San Diego will be the biggest underdog in Super Bowl history. Remember the previous team to have the honor of being picked a Super Bowl no-show? Well, they ended up winning.

The Baltimore Colts were 18-point favorites against the New York Jets in 1969. Jets quarterback Joe Namath guaranteed victory, and everyone thought he was loco. New York won 16-7.

That title game was in Miami. So is this one.

It seems Stan Humphries hasn't spent his media time wisely. He hasn't predicted anything. But I guess that's kind of like Babe

Talented team deserves more fan support

NICOLE POELL

Why does everyone hate the San Francisco 49ers?

OK, so maybe not everyone hates San Francisco, but I've noticed that around these parts, the 49ers are about as popular as, say, KU or former Wildcat quarterback Jason Smargiasso.

This disturbing trend first came to my attention while I was out with friends the night before the 49ers-Cowboys playoff game.

When a feature about San Francisco flashed on ESPN, one guy at my table started a near-brawl by yelling, in so many words, "Fork the 49ers," among some other colorful remarks.

Although there were a few San Francisco fans present who were willing to challenge this guy's sentiment, the majority of the bar patrons seemed to share his hatred for George Seifert's San Francisco Treat.

Now while I'm not a die-hard 49ers fan (Heck, I was even going for Switzer's Cowboys in the NFC championship game), I can't help but admire San Francisco's consistent quality and commitment to excellence.

I mean, do you even remember a time when the 49ers didn't put an outstanding product out on the field? I sure don't.

In fact, my first recollection of any 49ers team was the 1984 squad, which included such superstars as my heartthrob, Dwight Clark, along with Roger Craig, Jerry Rice and Joe Montana.

I had so much faith in that San Francisco squad that I bet some of my fifth-grade playmates — Mike, Ryan and Brian — three weeks' worth of my allowance on the 49ers before their Super Bowl showdown with Miami.

Although I won big after San Francisco's victory, my dad wouldn't let me collect my earnings.

But Mike, after seeing the tears in my eyes (and maybe because he was a little sweet on me), gave me a 49ers jersey and Joe Montana poster instead of the three dollars we'd wagered. From that point on, I've always held a special place in my heart for San Francisco.

Maybe that's why I get so defensive when people attack the 49ers. Why do they do it?

I believe one reason is because their favorite

▶ SUPER BOWL SUNDAY

Fans eager to party

Students stock up on food, prepare to huddle around TV

CORI CORNELISON
Collegian

Sports fanatics in Manhattan are gearing up by placing bets, inviting guests and making last-minute arrangements for Sunday.

All of this is in preparation for the big game — the Super Bowl.

Fried chicken, Red Dog beer, friends and a TV set are all part of K-State linebacker Percell Gaskins' two-day Super Bowl bash.

The plan is simple, Gaskins, junior in psychology, said.

"I'm going to watch the NFL game report, cheer for the 49ers, get brew and sit back with all of the fellows and watch the game," he said.

Gaskins said he's also going to watch the pre-game event on Saturday night to prepare him for Sunday.

Although Andre Coleman, a former K-State football player, is playing for the Chargers, Gaskins said he is rooting for the 49ers.

"Being realistic, I don't think the Chargers have a chance against San Francisco," he said.

Besides the big game, Gaskins said he is looking forward to seeing who wins in the Bud Bowl.

Stacy Strozier, senior in political science, said he agrees that the Chargers don't have a chance against the 49ers.

"San Francisco has always been my team," Strozier said. "As long as Jerry Rice is there, then that's my team."

Travis Livingston, junior in business, said he is crossing his fingers in the hope that the 49ers will fall short of a victory on Sunday.

"I hate the 49ers because they beat Dallas," he said.

If the Chargers hold Rice, they have a chance at winning, Livingston said.

Matt Basler, sophomore in public relations, said he agrees that Rice must be stopped in order for the Chargers to win.

Basler said he is rooting for the Chargers because they are in the AFC and Andre Coleman is playing.

"I think it's neat that Andre Coleman graduated from K-State, and while in his first year of playing professional football, he is Super-Bowl bound," he said.

Basler said in order to prepare for the game he is going to put on his orange bathrobe, line his room with candles and listen to "The Flintstones" theme song for two hours.

Placing bets is the way Luke Meier, sophomore in electronic journalism, is going to prepare for the game.

He said no one wants to bet directly on the game's winner because there is a 19-point spread, but he said there will be other bets made.

"We might have a pot of who scores the first touchdown or something like that," Meier said.

Sheri St. Clair, junior in nutrition and exercise science, said there won't be any betting at her house, but there definitely will be rivalry among her friends.

She said she hopes the Chargers win, but many of her friends are 49ers and Cowboy fans.

"I think anyone has a chance to win as long as they work hard," St. Clair said.

Carolyn Cormaci, senior in bakery science management, said she doesn't have definite plans yet for Sunday, but she definitely will watch the game.

"I'd like the 49ers to win," she said.

"Although I'd like Andre Coleman to do good."

While some people wouldn't miss Super Bowl Sunday for anything, Boyd Hall had scheduled a Hall Governing Board meeting during the latter part of the game.

It was canceled after members complained.

Some of the staff members were upset that the meeting was scheduled on Super Bowl Sunday, Jennifer Cole, sophomore in biology, said.

"It wasn't too big of a problem to reschedule the meeting," she said.

"They wanted to have fun, so I thought they should be able to."

Chargers want fast start

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — The Super Bowl begins at 6:18 p.m. EST Sunday, whether the San Diego Chargers are ready or not.

Notoriously slow starters, the Chargers say they must break that bad habit to beat the San Francisco 49ers. After all, it's hard to rally against a team that seems to score every time it has the ball.

"They have probably the most prolific offensive scoring machine that ever played the game," San Diego receiver Tony Martin said Wednesday. "They have far too much talent to fall behind. If you dig too big a hole for yourself, you will never get out of it."

The Chargers dug more holes this season than Beetle Bailey, falling behind in 15 of 18 games. They overcame deficits to win 10 times, including dramatic playoff victories against Miami and Pittsburgh.

That script seems likely to be rejected by the 49ers, who are 19-point favorites.

"I don't believe we can play catch-up against these guys," San Diego quarterback Stan Humphries said.

"We've got to stay close the whole game or get on top of them early. They have as good an offense as I've ever seen, and we can't expect to be down to them and keep them off the board while we're coming back," Humphries said.

While the Chargers probably will fail if they trail early, their task is complicated by San Francisco's knack for quick getaways:

- In the NFC championship game against Dallas, the 49ers led 21-0 early in the first quarter and won 38-28.
- In their other playoff game, against Chicago, the 49ers led 30-0 at halftime and won 44-15.
- In a December game against San Diego, the 49ers led 21-0 and won 38-15.

"We get a good start against most anybody," San Francisco tackle Steve Wallace said. "The defense sets the tone of the whole day. If they get off the field, the whole team is going to have a good game."

San Francisco this season scored a team-record 505 points, the fourth-highest total in NFL history. Player of the Year Steve Young set a league mark with his quarterback rating of 112.8, and perennial all-pro receiver Jerry Rice broke the league record for career touchdowns.

The 49ers aren't easy to stop, in the first quarter or any other time. They can ring up points faster than a pinball machine.

"I'm the only blemish on offense," rookie fullback William Floyd said. "Everybody else has been to the Pro Bowl. You have the best at every position on the same team."

In fact, Floyd — whose diversity gives the 49ers a new dimension — and guard Derrick Deese are the only offensive starters who have yet to earn Pro Bowl honors.

"I think to myself, I'm on the same team as Steve Young and Jerry Rice and John Taylor and Harris Barton. Damn!'" Floyd said.

"It's a Hall-of-Fame-type offense," Chargers defensive tackle Rueben Davis agreed.

Such firepower has oddsmakers predicting a blowout. Still, don't switch channels at halftime, even if the Chargers look as hapless as the Simpsons. San Diego has a tendency to save its best for last.

The tone was set in the season opener, when the Chargers trailed Denver 24-6 and won 37-34. They trailed Kansas City 13-0 and won 14-13. They trailed the Los Angeles Rams 14-3 and won 31-17.

"It demonstrates they have great deal of pride, confidence and inner strength," 49ers coach George Seifert said. "It's a 12th man as far as their club is concerned."

Pinched nerve can't slow NFL's Man of the Year

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Look for the fastest player on the field in Sunday's Super Bowl, and it'll be linebacker Junior Seau.

The emotional, fist-pumping leader of the San Diego Chargers is a big reason his team is playing for the NFL championship against the San Francisco 49ers.

Two weeks ago, the all-pro inside linebacker had the best performance of his five-year career in a 17-13 win over Pittsburgh. He played through the pain of a pinched nerve in his neck, spreading out his 16 tackles from the first play to the second-to-last.

He was the key to holding the NFL's best rushing team to 66 yards, and he was a part of the decisive goal-line stand.

"To go out there and repeat what I've done in the Pittsburgh Steeler game is going to be something that we'll definitely look at," Seau said on Thursday after picking up the NFL Man of the Year Award.

"This is a different team than Pittsburgh. Pittsburgh wanted to run and play smash-mouth, and we were up for a challenge, and we played well," he said.

The 49ers, seeking their fifth Super Bowl title, provide a different challenge.

"They mix it up very well," Seau said. "It's not just Steve Young. It's Jerry Rice; it's everybody. Young is really the leader, and you understand that. But whoever has the ball at any given time of the game is a big threat."

So is Seau. Against Pittsburgh, 12 of his tackles were solo. And Joe Robbie Stadium is where he set his career high of 19 tackles — 18 solo — in a 31-0 playoff loss to the Dolphins two seasons ago.

He matched that total this season in another defeat, 20-15 to the Denver Broncos. He had a career-best 155 tackles this season and 5-1/2 sacks after going sackless in 1993.

"You want to block this guy," 49ers tackle Steve Wallace said. "You see him all the time. He's running around making tackles, and nobody's blocking this guy. You can't get to him. He's too quick. He makes free tackles all the time."

The 250-pound Seau obviously doesn't make every play, but he's got great lateral pursuit and can chase down a ballcarrier if he overruns the play on a blitz.

Twice against the Steelers, he blitzed and overran the play, only to turn around and make the tackle after short gains.

"If you're assigned to block him, you've got to be better than you normally are," 49ers offensive coordinator Mike Shanahan said.

Seau has been playing with the pinched nerve since late November.

When the 49ers beat the Chargers 38-15 in San Diego on Dec. 11, Seau rarely used his left arm and struggled to wrap up ballcarriers.

He aggravated the injury against the Steelers and took himself out, but the Steelers called timeout, and Seau never missed a play.

"It was a great game physically and mentally," said 49ers running back Ricky Watters. "Not only did he shut out what was going on as far as the Terrible Towels waving and being in a hostile environment, but also you could tell he had a little pain.

"That was a very valiant effort, which meant he had to have a will and a desire to win that was so strong that it outdid his pain."

Watters said he expects Seau to play as intensely in the Super Bowl.

"But hopefully we'll have the ingredients necessary to counteract that," Watters said.

Seau said he has been playing the Super Bowl in his mind, and it's coming out pretty well.

"I can see the light at the end of the tunnel," he said.

The Chargers' status as 19-point underdogs in their first Super Bowl doesn't bother Seau.

"We've gotten here with hard work, and we believe in our team and our franchise," he said. "I'm looking forward to this game for many reasons. Not just because of the shoulder, not just because it's the Super Bowl, but there's a lot at stake here. It's part of history, and we definitely want to be part of it."

Stats say 49ers to win

teams can only dream of putting up the kinds of numbers that San Francisco boasts.

San Francisco has numbers such as No. 2 overall in the NFL in total offense, No. 4 in passing offense and No. 6 in rushing. They were also the highest-scoring team in the NFL this year with 505 points.

The 49ers aren't too shabby defensively, either, ranking eighth overall, No. 2 in rushing defense and No. 14 in pass defense. Their Big D also tied for the NFL lead in interceptions this season with 23.

Another reason for people's intense hatred for San Fran, I think, stems from disliking many of the 49ers' colorful players.

Probably the most colorful player of them all is Prime Time Deion Sanders, who sold his football services not to the highest bidder (New Orleans), but to the team he thought was capable of winning the Super Bowl — the 49ers.

Good call, Deion. While San Francisco owner Eddie DeBartolo Jr. did make a significant investment in Sanders, DeBartolo received impressive returns from Neon Deion. Those returns included six interceptions and three touchdowns during the regular season, along with NFL Defensive Player of the Year honors.

Although I personally don't care for Sanders' fashion sense, he can play the game. But Sanders isn't the only weapon the 49ers possess. They've got an entire arsenal that contains even more powerful guns than Sanders.

Big guns like quarterback Steve Young, the NFL player of the year, who threw for 35 touchdowns, almost 4,000 yards and just 10 interceptions during the regular season. Along the way, he set a new NFL quarterback-rating record of 112.8, beating a certain mark set by an aging QB who now resides in Kansas City.

They've also got Jerry Rice, who is quite possibly the best receiver ever to play the game. This season alone, Rice recorded 112 catches, 15 touchdowns and an NFL-best mark of 1,499 yards receiving.

With Rice hinting to reporters earlier in the week that this might be the last game of his career, look for an MVP-caliber performance from him Sunday afternoon.

So hear me now and believe me Sunday night, all of you San Francisco bashers.

This year's 49ers squad is probably the best one ever assembled in team history, and that's saying a lot.

Sure, I know it's tempting to root for the underdogs in this case, the San Diego Chargers. In fact, I'm a sucker for underdogs. I'm an Iowa State fan, if that tells you anything.

But underdog, schmunderdog. This year, I'm cheering for the most superior team in the NFL, the San Francisco 49ers.

With luck, underdogs could win game

Ruth calling his shot. It just wouldn't look as good as a repeat.

By now you might have guessed that I'm a Cowboys fan.

San Francisco's quest to capture the NFL championship game could be played against an MTV Rock 'n' Jock team on Planet Reebok as far as I'm concerned.

But I honestly believe San Diego has a chance. Besides, it's kind of fun rooting for a long shot.

San Diego will need a strong defense, led by Junior Seau, that can take a beating without taking the knock-out punch. The Chargers will need their best game of the year from Humphries. They'll need an even better game from Natrone Means. And, like all underdogs, they'll need friendly hops and plenty of luck.

Sounds impossible, huh? Not really.

San Diego was picked to finish at the bottom of the AFC West. Instead, they won the division at 11-5. The Chargers have already accomplished more than anyone expected. Does the phrase "Nothing to lose and everything to gain" sound familiar?

Another thing that irritates me about this 49ers team is overrated, overpaid, less-than-average Deion Sanders. He was named the NFL's defensive player of the year. When was the last time you saw him make an open-field tackle?

Seau was easily the league's defensive standout. Check the statistics. Seau's forgot about more tackles than Sanders has even attempted.

Defense to Sanders probably means what security will put up to keep crazed fans away from the field.

San Diego has made it to this point by making big plays at fateful times during games against better opponents. They just might do it again Sunday.

Some say the 49ers are playing so well right now there might not be anyone who can hold them back.

"They're not unbeatable. I don't think any team is unbeatable," Chargers linebacker David Griggs said.

That's right. No team is that good.

Investigating insects

Entomology department's research includes studying feeding patterns of stable flies, genetic makeup of wasps

JANICE GILLILAND
Collegian

A fly on the wall could be considered just another creepy-crawly annoyance to most students. But to the students and researchers of entomology, it is an area of study.

The K-State Department of Entomology is one of the nation's leaders in research and teaching in its field.

One significant area of research in the department is the behavior and survival of face and stable flies, Alberto Broce, a veterinary entomologist, said.

Broce said face flies are a common problem in homes — especially in attics.

As the attic gets warm from solar radiation, the flies become active. They then find a way into the living areas of the house, creating a problem, he said.

The problem with face flies isn't rampant on campus, Broce said.

"The only place that we're aware of having face-fly problems on campus is in Fairchild Hall," Broce said.

No one knows why these face flies continue to go back to the same buildings year after year, but that does make it difficult to control them, he said.

The department is looking for more places that have face-fly problems so they can study, research and learn to control them.

Broce is also studying the stable fly, which is infamous for causing problems for confined cattle operations such as feedlots and dairies.

Stable flies are not confined only to rural areas. They are also problems for the urban population, Broce said.

In a recent study, 12 percent of the stable flies in Manhattan, Topeka and Kansas City had human blood in them. This causes a significant concern to scientists, Broce said.

He is studying the feeding behavior of these flies.

Another area of research in entomology is insect genetics, said Srini Kambhampati, assistant professor of insect genetics.

"The genetic program researches insect evolution, using DNA as a tool to look at it," Kambhampati said.

> "Insect genetics are like a jigsaw puzzle. It doesn't make sense when you look at one piece at a time. It starts to make sense when you put everything together and look at the large picture."
> SRINI KAMBHAMPATI
> Assistant professor of insect genetics

The DNA is used to decode the history of an organism using the four amino acid bases of A, C, G and T. The purpose of the DNA decoding is to look at relationships among different insect groups.

The genetic researchers are also studying wasps as a biological control of aphids that destroy wheat. Wasps lay eggs inside the aphids, and the wasp larvae kill the aphids.

Wasps are being looked at as a form of biological control because of the controversy surrounding pesticides and the question of the effects on the environment, Kambhampati said.

"Wasps kill the aphids slower than pesticides, but they are better for the environment," he said.

Kambhampati also said more discoveries have been made in DNA evolution in the last 10 years than in the previous 50 years.

"Insect genetics are like a jigsaw puzzle. It doesn't make sense when you look at one piece at a time. It starts to make sense when you put everything together and look at the large picture," he said.

Biomechanics, the use of physical principles, physics and how structures work, is also an area in the study of insects.

Kate Loudon, assistant professor of entomology, is researching how an insect's antenna works.

"The insects use the antenna to find mates and food, watch out for danger and to follow trails," she said.

The flow patterns of antennae can be looked at using an electron microscope. This is done by a process called physical modeling, by which the rules for scaling can be understood.

The biomechanics area also researches the nervous system of insects, Loudon said.

"I eavesdrop on the nervous system and get a picture of it by putting wires in the antenna."

If research is not being done in the entomology laboratories at K-State, it is probably being done on experimental farms at Manhattan and branch experiment stations throughout the state.

The department supports graduate-student study and development with several graduate research projects, teaching and extension assistantships. The interdisciplinary undergraduate program was recently discontinued because of funding cutbacks in the department. However, this has not lowered the number of students in the classes.

"Enrollment in our classes, especially undergraduate service courses, is going up," Smith said.

The faculty will also be growing, said Mike Smith, head of the department of entomology. Five new entomologists from the federal government will become adjunct members of the faculty, Smith said.

"They were transferred here to the United States Grain Marketing Research Lab," he said.

Along with adding to the number of people involved, the department received three large grants in November totaling nearly half a million dollars.

Wildcat card makes phoning home cheaper

JANICE MELIA

AT&T and K-State Telecommunications are cooperating to offer long-distance phone service to students at a discount.

The new Wildcat Connection calling card is targeted at K-State students living off campus because most on-campus students are already using the services offered by Telecommunications, Fred Damkroger, director of Telecommunications, said.

However, the card can be used by all students, even after graduation, said Terry Roberts, account manager for AT&T College and University Solutions.

"The savings is the biggest thing. Everyone likes savings, and it can be used anywhere in the United States," Roberts said.

Damkroger said information about the new card was sent to all the students in Telecommunications' database of names. Any students who received the information can activate their new cards by simply calling the number given.

Roberts said one of the bonuses of the card is the low surcharge.

Most long-distance calling cards will charge 80 to 90 cents every time the card is used, but the Wildcat Connection is only 50 cents a call, Roberts said.

In addition, the Wildcat Connection will save you 10 percent off of the normal AT&T tariff rate, Roberts said.

"This is a very good deal," Damkroger said.

Roberts said the card charges no fees, does not require an application and has no minimum-use requirement. The applicant is only billed when the card is used.

Damkroger said he wanted to give the students at K-State a good deal that would identify them with K-State and that they could be proud of.

The card can be used for calling anywhere in the United States and overseas. However, students cannot use the card overseas to call the United States, Roberts said.

Damkroger said he was approached this summer by a vendor who had the idea of offering a calling card to students.

He liked the idea, so he wrote a proposal describing the characteristics and services he wanted to offer students.

Contracts for state universities must be arranged on the basis of the lowest bid, and AT&T won that bid, Damkroger said.

The card contains a credit limit of $150, but that may be lowered or increased by calling the AT&T College and University Solutions service center.

The Wildcat Connection does not require the user to give up any current calling card the student may have. If they wish to keep their current phone card, that is their own preference, Roberts said.

AT&T will receive a fee from Telecommunications for billings, promotions, customer service and other roles they will play.

"We are a contractor that renders bills and stuff like that," Roberts said.

Telecommunications will also make money in the process.

House passes bill to cut $110 million in taxes

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Conservative House Republicans and moderate GOP senators headed toward their first big confrontation Thursday after the House approved a bill that would cut sales taxes by up to $110 million.

The bill passed 86-37.

The vote sent it back to the Senate, which approved a much less expensive version last week.

Conservatives promised more efforts to cut taxes and were unimpressed with arguments from moderate Republicans and Democrats that the bill could lead to budget cuts, especially in education and social programs.

Of the 80 House Republicans, 58 voted in favor of the bill; 21 were against it.

Most of the GOP representatives who opposed it were from the party's less-conservative wing.

"I have noticed over a number of years that people support the status quo by calling it responsible," House Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, said. "I think it is irresponsible to stay with the status quo."

When the Senate approved the bill, it would have cost the state about $32 million annually.

It would only have eliminated the state's 2.5-percent sales taxes on utilities used by manufacturing plants and on labor services used in the construction of new buildings.

The bill still contains those tax cuts, but it also exempts remodeling services, car repair services and even the sale of Girl Scout cookies from the state's general 4.9-percent sales tax.

It also would expand a program that gives low-income Kansans a rebate on the sales taxes they pay on food.

The next step is for the Senate to consider the House's changes. It likely will reject them, forcing legislative leaders to appoint a conference committee to draft a compromise version of the bill.

Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village and chairwoman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee, has called the House's changes irresponsible.

Shallenburger said the House would reject the Senate's version.

"It will have to have some of our amendments on it," Shallenburger said.

Gov. Bill Graves supports the repeal of the energy and new construction taxes but said legislators should be cautious about cutting other taxes.

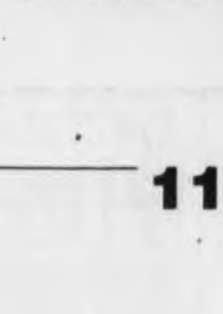
Dear Interested but Shy,

Sometimes you just have to bite the bullet. Try and put aside your fear and ask him to coffee. Keep it light and friendly until you get to know one another better and you are a little more sure of his feelings. I would be cautious though. Getting into a relationship with someone you work with may not be a wise idea. Take it really slow.



Good Luck,

▶ COLUMN

Quality art promoted by NEA

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Oh boy, the first column of the new year! So, what to complain about? There has to be something on this campus worth my unkind lashings.

Here goes: As an arts reviewer, I require the arts to survive. Without the arts, I do not exist (that could be good or bad, for some people).

Now, I'm not writing this column just to ensure my job, but more as a wake-up letter to all those "people" in Washington, D.C., (i.e. Nancy Kassebaum, Bob Dole and the rest of the bunch).

If you defund the National Endowment for the Arts, I will not vote for you ever, never, ever again.

What really upsets me is all these Republicans who got voted into office this past November preached how America voted them in as a mandate for change. We saw people like Newt "Listen-To-Me" Gingrich proudly announcing they have received the middle class' message. Supposedly, in this new era of good feelings, the Republicans were going to pay special attention to us.

Now, two months later, the Republicans have given us the proverbial slap-in-the-face, trying to destroy two things a lot of us cherish (sometimes unknowingly), the NEA and the much-discussed Corporation for Public Broadcasting, PBS.

PBS, with zero funds, will probably still go on, at least in the larger cities. Big Bird won't be out on the street, though some feathers will be ruffled.

I'd like to address only the NEA.

Republicans love griping about the thousands of dollars (mere pennies in the NEA budget) wasted on controversial art (read: one or two projects certain senators don't like). They love saying how NEA's $167.4 million budget drives America into debt (military and congressional projects don't count). (Sorry for all the parenthetical remarks.)

Well, it's controversial art that influences the rest of artistic America.

Without Cezanne's very controversial work (Cezanne was all but dismissed as an artist in his lifetime) in the late 1800s, Picasso would have never developed cubism in the early 1900s. One exists because of the other. You might say, well, gee, Russell, that's Picasso. I agree. The fact we even acknowledge Picasso 20 years after his death and more than 80 years after cubism is testament to the power of controversial art. Remember, we will long remember the important artists of the 1990s long after the 104th Congress has concluded.

Cut the hogwash, Senators, you know darn right most of the money the NEA grants goes to organizations like McCain Auditorium (by way of the Kansas Arts Commission), the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City and countless artists populating the prairie of Kansas. The amount given to less mainstream artists is extremely insubstantial as compared to the budget as a whole.

I'd hate to think the current conservative flavor in the beltway is going to decide artistically who and what we middle-classers want to see.

They still just don't get it.

'Ed Wood' an ironic, funny film

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

	Ratings:
★★★★ Ed Wood	★★★★ Must see ★★★ Worth a peek ★★ Good future rental ★ Bastardization of cinema

Tim Burton's well-crafted "Ed Wood," is a movie you will either love or hate.

Ed Wood is Burton's homage to the worst director to ever grace America with his vision. In the 1950s, Wood was the proud director and writer (yes, he even writes), of such revolting classics as "Plan 9 From Outer Space" and the semi-autobiographical, cross-dressing piece "Glen or Glenda."

Yes, you read right, folks, Wood also maintained a penchant for cross-dressing — particularly pink angora sweaters.

Plan 9 is actually considered by the movie industry to be the worst film ever made. Thanks to its horrid dialogue and kitchen-quality special effects, it's now a cult classic.

Wood created his films with pocket change, sucking money from anyone he could. The sets were amateurish. Some props were even stolen from Hollywood prop departments. On top of that, the actors performing Wood's trash are no better than the film. None of his films ever made money.

Burton delivers all of Wood's whacked personality in an engrossing black and white film. Burton, who has given us "Beetlejuice," "Edward Scissorhands" and the Batman movies, is in top form with Ed Wood. Burton has finally found an art film to showcase his mastery.

The film itself is ironic. It will definitely enter a pantheon of cult favorites, following in the shoes of director Ed Wood.

Who else could play the character of Ed Wood than Burton-favorite and Hollywood rebel, Johnny Depp. From the moment Depp starts talking, Ed Wood springs alive.

I don't know what is funnier, Wood yelling cut after each scene he shoots, only shooting it once no matter how bad it is, or Wood's self-discovery and eventual revealing of his joy of cross-dressing.

These cross-dressing scenes are fresh, funny stuff. Long live angora.

Depp is brilliant, but the definite standout in the movie is Martin Landau, playing Wood's B-actor and pal Bela Lugosi (the guy who played Dracula).

Lugosi, after tiring out the Dracula franchise, became a desperate heroine addict in need of work. Wood, a fan of Lugosi, signs him for a film, and a new friendship takes form.

Landau is superb, delivering his sappy, dramatic soliloquies in Wood's films with a campy veracity.

Burton was wise to choose Landau, a down-and-out actor himself, having only occasional success with such fare as the original "Mission: Impossible" and a few movie roles, notably "Crimes and Misdemeanors."

Landau recently picked up a Golden Globe for best supporting actor in a drama, an incontestable foreshadow to an Oscar nomination, if not an Oscar win.

'ED WOOD'

The Union Program Council presents "Ed Wood" at 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Friday and at 7 p.m. Saturday in Union Forum Hall. Tickets are $1.75.

Bill Murray gives an inspired performance as Bunny Breckinridge, Wood's transsexual, transvestite friend.

Sarah Jessica Parker plays Wood's very understanding wife. Can you blame her for her little quirks after having to live with a man who likes your clothes better than you do?

In a year with very few truly excellent films, Ed Wood stands out as a reminder that when a director tackles a subject he truly adores fervently, greatness follows. Wood wasn't a success at the box office, but neither were a lot of our good films.

Comedy covers gamut: nerds to wiener-dogs

JAMIE CONGROVE
Collegian

Nancy Norton asked an audience in Union Station last night if anyone was a nerd.

"If you are from a nerd family, you might be a nerd," Norton said as a part of Union Program Council's Comedy Invasion.

Norton described how she thought she and her family were nerdy.

"I even had a wiener-dog — how nerdy. I think a wiener-dog looks like an anorexic snake with legs. No, not anorexic, bulimic. The dog binges on Purina and then gags on a door stop," she said.

Union Station was filled with about 50 people who were ready to have a few laughs.

Norton described how when she was living in Hawaii, she wanted to be on the television show "Wheel of Fortune." She said an older lady told her she thought that Vanna White was an addict.

"What's she addicted to?" Norton said. "Hooked on phonics? What's she jonesing for — a vowel?"

The crowd roared.

Some students said they thought that some of her material was a little above what that crowd might be used to.

"A lot of students aren't accustomed to going to comedy shows, and because of that, the crowd wasn't as loose as an A&E crowd," Celeste Natarajan, graduate student in English, said.

Some of the material the crowd might not have been used to were Norton's references to being a lesbian. Norton said in her show that she thought that K-State students aren't used to homosexuality.

"K-State isn't into that lesbian thing," she said after she didn't get a very good crowd response from a joke.

"OK, I'm really a heterosexual. I'm just trying to fit into the college scene," she said.

Don Taylor said he enjoyed Norton, but the show might have been too worldly for Manhattan.

"It was a bit too broad," he said.

Natarajan said it seemed that Norton was holding back.

"I think she felt really constrained. She was giving a G-rated-type performance, and I don't think that was what she was used to," Natarajan said.

Storyteller leads hectic life

Instructor seeks 3rd term on school board

WADE ANDERSON
Collegian

Mary Nichols is a busy person.

She's a teacher, a student, a mother and a member of USD 383 school board.

She's not looking to make her life any easier after filing for another term on the school board.

Nichols, who teaches storytelling at K-State, is finishing her second term on the board.

"I want schools to fill in where families are missing out," Nichols said.

"I want to be a source of stability to the schools, the kids, the teachers and the taxpayers."

"There have been four superintendents in eight years. We need stability."

Nichols said she worked on getting air conditioning put in at Manhattan High School.

"I was a teacher when air conditioning was added to the Manhattan Middle School. That helped me see how beneficial air conditioning could be at the high school," she said.

Nichols has also worked at keeping summer school.

She said right now the funding for summer school comes from the general fund. There is no state help. She said she would like to see help from the state and is working on that.

Nichols said she believes her experience and thoroughness will be assets in the tough times ahead for education.

"Her strength as a student of school administration comes from her experience as a school board member. It's a unique quality that few students have," said G. Kent Stewart, professor of school administration.

Stewart is one of Nichols' professors.

"She's a good student and a good board member," Stewart said.

Nichols is doing an internship in which she plans to analyze testimony given at the Statehouse in Topeka.

"Because of my USD 383 school board governmental-relations networking, I can access many sources that can steer me in finding guidelines for grading testimony and ultimately produce suggestions for writing and delivering effective testimony," she said.

In addition to taking 12 hours toward a doctoral degree in educational administration and being on the school board, Nichols also teaches four classes of storytelling.

Ken Clark, junior in elementary education, has Nichols for storytelling.

"I think she enhances the district when she's on the board," Clark said.

"I want schools to fill in where families are missing out. I want to be a source of stability to the schools, the kids, the teachers and the taxpayers."

MARY NICHOLS
USD 383 school board member

Clark said Nichols keeps him interested in the class and makes storytelling a fun class. School activities take up most of Nichols' time. She said she wants it that way.

"I want to be in a place where I can pay back the education system for what they did for me," she said.

Channel 19 helps students review

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

Students enrolled in chemistry, economics and sociology can now review for exams without leaving the comfort of their homes.

Review sessions are being televised live on Channel 19 at the Educational Communications Center in Bob Dole Hall. Students can call in, ask questions and get answers all through interactive television.

"This technology is providing students with an opportunity they haven't had before," said Barbara Newhouse, associate director of academic programs. "If they can't get to a scheduled review session, they can watch it live or tape it and watch it later."

The review sessions are conducted in an electronic classroom that contains a desk area with an overhead camera, a chalkboard and seating for up to 18 students.

Students who attend the review can ask or respond to questions as though they were in a traditional classroom situation.

The phone is answered by a staff member, who writes the question on a card.

The card is taken into the classroom and given to the professor to answer.

"This is especially beneficial for students who are shy or quiet and who would not ordinarily ask a question in a large class," Newhouse said. "They can call in and ask a question without identifying themselves."

Michelle Ecklund, senior in pest science management and agricultural economics, calls in frequently with questions during the chemistry review sessions.

"I like the fact that I can just pick up the phone and call in to get my answers right away," she said. "Besides, it certainly beats holding my hand up for five minutes to ask a question in class."

Ecklund also tapes the review sessions in case she wants to review a topic later.

"If I'm not really sure I understand it, I can just stop the tape and rewind it to play the part over again," she said.

Maria Paukstelis, director of academic services for the chemistry department, began conducting televised chemistry review sessions every Monday evening last semester.

"I have always felt students in a course like chemistry do not have time to ask questions in class, so I began a session every Monday evening," she said.

"Sometimes I had 65 students, sometimes I had only four. Now that I have televised the sessions, we have around 180 students watching the broadcast," Paukstelis said.

Paukstelis said many students have told her they tape the sessions and watch them again.

Kansas City band takes home win vocalist Steve Young and drummer Kevin Rome. Their flailability seemed appreciated most by a tipsier crowd, and some disdain circulated because they were the only cover band, although they have a compact disc of all originals on their own record label, PKI Records.

Sufferbus, a popular local band, took the stage next with a more socially conscious message. Recently signed to Brave New Records out of New York, guitarist and vocalist Mitchell Leggs, bassist Brian Harris and drummer Ken Pingleton seek to challange those caught in the illusion of appearances.

Their music relates a combination of ex-girlfriend sentiments and a cursory type of social commentary, Leggs said.

The last of the bands and the one to take the money home was Power and Fear, also a Kansas City group. Vocalist Jesse Jackson explains how the band seeks to open the collective consciousness by addressing issues in a way that simplifies social problems to stop alienating people from getting involved by overwhelming them with information.

Drummer Lamar Little, shifted the sound by bringing on a percussionist funk fantasy that resembled the digs of Billy Goat on fast-forward. Equally animated because of guitarist Dan Starling and Jeff Schrader on bass.

Low attendance expected; Senate cancels retreat graduate senate to fill the vacancies."

Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, said filling the vacant positions will help to give equal representation to graduate students.

"Not only have the ideas of graduate students been underrepresented, but they are losing votes," Halinski said.

A Senate retreat scheduled for Saturday was canceled, Liz Ring, senate vice chair, said. Senators planned to get together that evening at Ahearn Field House to hear speakers and talk about goals for the semester.

About half of the senators had said they would not be able to come to retreat, Ring said. Kori Keeton, arts and sciences senator, had planned the spring retreat.

"I know we all have prior commitments, and I can understand some of the excuses," Ring said.

"I know the retreat was not required, but you have to remember your responsibility to work hard and do your best for the students."

Student Senate also approved four allocations at Thursday's meeting.

Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls was awarded $280 to upgrade the campus safety escort system. The money will be used to buy armbands for the new escorts.

The new escort service will be more efficient and more respectable than the old system, said Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president.

The new system, which begins Feb. 1, will combine the three escort services on campus into one system.

"The escort service will now be coordinated through the police, and they will be able to keep a record of the calls and send assistance when needed," he said. "I think it will add increased efficiency to the system."

Students wanting a campus escort can now call the K-State police dispatcher. The police will then notify the team of male and female escorts based out of the dorm closest to the area.

One of the escorts will carry a cellular phone, and the other will carry a beeper.

"I think that our campus is safe, and expanding the escort service will help us keep it that way," Finkeldei said.

Women's Union was given $865, and KSU Environmental Professionals received $406, both to attend conferences.

CLASSIFIED DIRECTORY

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Bar reopens after 10 years

JANICE SWICKARD
Collegian

Thirty-four years of tradition are returning to Manhattan. Mel's Tavern has reopened its doors and will have its grand opening this weekend.

"I said that I would reopen the bar after 10 years, and that's what I've done," Doug Long, owner of Mel's Tavern, said.

The bar was first opened as Jimmy's in 1951, at 113 S. Third St. Mel Brewer bought the bar in 1958 and renamed it Mel's Tavern. Brewer sold the bar to Long in 1974, but it was shut down in 1985 because of the mall construction project.

Long said he decided to reopen at a location close to the original. Mel's, located at 105 S. Third St., formerly the Fishbowl, will be a 3.2 bar, offering only beer.

"Everybody used to go to Mel's. It was their home away from home," Long said.

The bar has most of the original Mel's interior, including the old-fashioned waitress bar rails and the original bar from 1951. Jimmy Ross, the original owner, said the the bar was busy all the time.

"I hired a lot of college kids to work for me, and they brought a lot of kids from campus in here," Ross said. "This bar was nothing fancy. It was a poor man's bar for working class and students. It was a fine place to drink, socialize and play games."

Long described the recent atmosphere as fun, relaxed and crazy. The rustic interior, with its cherry-red juke-box and old phone booth, add a good-times feeling to the place, he said.

"There aren't a lot of bars in town that everyone can go to, but Mel's has that atmosphere that everyone just fits together," Long said.

Long said Mel's has a lot of history, and that is what sets this bar apart form the rest.

"People used to come here to catch up on news or to just relax after work," Long said. "Everyone from construction workers to suit-and-ties to students would come to Mel's, and it was just like a big family," Long said.

"There aren't a lot of bars like it," Rob O'Neill, Manhattan resident, said. "You can come in here in your work clothes and raise hell if you want to. You don't have to worry about anything. It's a really down-to-earth place."

O'Neill used to go to the original Mel's and said everyone really hated to see it go.

"It was a friendly town bar. They took a good bar out for that mall," O'Neill said.

Mel's will offer lunch and dinner and will keep the 18-ounce, fishbowl-sized beers. Weekly food and drink specials will be offered. The weekly food specials were what attracted Ross Davis, senior in secondary education, and Kevin Larsen, senior in chemical engineering.

"The prices were cheap, so we decided to try it out,"Larsen said.

"The tacos are good, and the fishbowls are cold," Davis said.

The grand opening this weekend will include giveaways such as T-shirts, sweatshirts and gift certificates. A grand prize will be given away tonight and on Saturday night.

Beer representatives from Old Milwaukee and Old Milwaukee Light will be there tonight, and representatives from Miller and Miller Lite will be there on Saturday night.

"I have a lot of K-State alumni calling to ask when Mel's is going to reopen," Long said. "And now it is finally back, so let the good times roll again."

K-State to receive royalty

"AT&T will pay a royalty to K-State based upon the amount generated. We are going to make money," Damkroger said.

Damkroger said the money also will benefit students. In the past, money from Telecommunications has been used to buy pagers for the campus escorts.

In the future, money may be used for two-way radios for the escorts, he said.

Because the project is new, Damkroger said he was not sure how successful the system will be.

"We are the first in the state of Kansas to try this, so we are on the leading edge," Damkroger said.

Response from students has been varied.

Jennifer Fitzgerald, freshman undecided, said she received the notice in the mail but didn't pay attention to it.

"I didn't really read it. I never got around to it. The only long distance I do is to my parents, and I call collect," Fitzgerald said.

Douglas Urban, senior in education, said he agreed.

"I very seldom find myself in a position where I need to use a phone card," Urban said.

Others said they just found the information hard to understand.

"I thought it was very confusing. I was trying to understand if the card would save me money. I wish they would have put in a little graph or something to explain it better," Hannah Marshall, sophomore in pre-nursing, said.

Janet Carr, junior in elementary education, said she decided to get her father's opinion.

"I sent the article to my dad, and I haven't heard anything from him. He has a better knowledge of what AT&T does because he knows the rates," Carr said.

Roberts said he thought the 10-percent discount off those rates would make the deal look good.

"We wanted to make the service look more attractive. Otherwise it looks like any other card," he said.

well with the inequity."

Greg Tadtman, arts and sciences senator, sponsored an amendment allowing candidates with written excuses to be excused from the mandatory meetings conducted by the Elections Committee prior to the election. The Elections Committee will be allowed to determine which excuses are legitimate.

"They take a risk by not coming," Tadtman said. "If they can't come, they can't come."

Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, supported the bill.

"I think that if people have legitimate reasons, the only person they're hurting is themselves," Halinski said.

All candidates receive a copy of the regulations when they turn in their applications to run, and they should all be able to read, she said.

"People just disregarded the mandatory meetings, and they got busted," Chad Schneiter, elections committee chairman, said.

Instead of having just one chance to attend the mandatory meeting, candidates will have two chances this year, Schneiter said.

"We made them different days and different times so everyone could come," he said.

The amendment passed by a voice vote.

"I just hope that people don't take advantage of it," Schneiter said.

Schneiter said the Elections Committee will review all the written excuses prior to the mandatory meetings and determine the legitimacy. Candidates whose excuses are determined to be not valid will be notified before the meetings, he said.

"We really feel the mandatory meetings will make the election go much smoother," Schneiter said.

The third amendment to pass was presented by Halinski.

She moved to add a section stating that if the Elections Committee is found at fault in accusing a candidate of violating the regulations, the committee must send the information to the Collegian to be published.

"If the violation is reported, then the apology should be reported," Halinski said.

The amendment would ensure that candidates who had been publicly accused and found innocent would be publicly cleared of all wrongdoing, Brent Wiedeman, agriculture senator, said.

"It's just like other elections where violations are splashed all over the place," Schneiter said.

The violation information will be released to the Collegian, he said. Schneiter said the committee didn't want to force the Collegian to cover the violations, but the committee didn't think there would be a problem with it.

He said he was pleased with the guidelines that were passed.

"The limits are good. I didn't really like having unlimited spending," he said.

Schneiter said he just wanted to give everyone a shot at being a fair presidential candidate.

The Elections Committee is planning more informative meetings for the candidates this spring. The committee will go through the guidelines and try to prevent problems from coming up during the election, Schneiter said.

"Anything we think may be a remote problem we're going to address at the mandatory meeting," he said.

The Elections Committee has been meeting for longer than any other election committee has been together, Schneiter said.

"We've been working on these for a whole semester," he said.

Tricia Nolfi, Senate adviser and coordinator of student activities, said she was disappointed with the disrespect shown to the Elections Committee by the senators.

"It's disappointing that they brought up things that weren't the issue," she said.

Faculty Representative Bill Muir said some of the proposed amendments were poppycock.

One amendment he characterized as poppycock was LeDoux's proposed amendment, which would have eliminated Senate's voice in the election process.

His second amendment eliminated all regulations set down by Senate and all reports required in the elections guidelines and gave the University administration control over the elections.

The only requirements candidates would have to meet were set down by the University Activities Board in the Sales, Solicitation and Advertising and Political Activity Guidelines.

"Student Senate cannot run its own elections," LeDoux said. "We can't uphold or enforce our regulations."

The amendment failed 11-26-2.

program is concerned, we will be hurt very bad, because most of the funds we get for research are for the economic development of the state," Azadivar said.

Oleen said the elimination of the lottery will have a direct effect on student jobs and the welfare of the state economy.

Janie Rutherford, K-Tech director of marketing, said there is a lot of misunderstanding on how lottery money is used.

"I think if more people understood that companies are being created, they would support the lottery," Rutherford said.

Oleen said she supports the lottery because of the research and economic development it funds. She said she knows the lottery is working with the support of the state's voters.

"One issue I think is critical is that it was on the ballot in 1986, and the people passed it with an overwhelming 64 percent," Oleen said.

In 1986, the people of Riley County voted in favor of the lottery by a margin higher than the state average, Oleen said.

"I am real reluctant to go back and take away what the people have decided," Oleen said.

Beating suspects arrested

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

Five people were arrested Wednesday in connection with two beatings that occurred in the area of City Park last week.

Michael S. Foster, Fort Riley, and Timothy L. Myers and Randy J. Allen, 1511 Leavenworth St. were arrested for one count aggravated robbery and one count aggravated battery each.

Shannon M. Moeller, also of 1511 Leavenworth St., was charged with two counts each of aggravated robbery and aggravated battery.

William Strickland, Fort Riley, was also arrested on one count aggravated robbery, aggravated battery and one count receiving stolen property. The suspects are being held in lieu of $15,000 bond.

The first beating occurred at 10:15 p.m. Jan. 22 in City Park. The second was within an hour of the first at Eigth and Laramie streets.

The police would not release the specifics of which individuals were involved in which crimes but said the incidents were related.

Chris Reeves, junior in history, was beaten on his way home from campus. He suffered a fractured skull and was taken to Stormont-Vail Medical Center in Topeka.

Ron Reeves, Chris' father, said Chris is still in a state of confusion, but he does remember the attack.

▶ K-STATE-SALINA

Secretary alleges sexual harassment

KIMBERLY HEFLING
Collegian

A K-State-Salina secretary is suing the University, including two administrators, for more than $3 million.

In the suit, Debra Kresky, a secretary for K-State-Salina's Department of Engineering, alleges she was sexually harassed by James Keating, head of engineering at K-State-Salina.

Kresky is also suing for two counts of retaliation and one count of emotional distress, as well as for punitive damages against Keating and Jack Henry, dean of the College of Technology.

For each of the four counts, Kresky is asking $500,000, as well as the same amount for punitive damages from both Keating and Henry. In addition, Kresky is suing for attorney fees and costs.

The original suit, which has since been amended, claims Keating sexually harassed Kresky by repeatedly asking about sexual activity between Kresky and her husband.

The amended complaint claims "these questions and comments created a hostile work environment, that had not existed before or during the plaintiff's nearly 15 years in this position, which was demeaning and abusive."

Kresky informed Keating on Dec. 5, 1993, that she was pregnant and was planning to return to her job after having her baby.

Following this conversation, according to the amended complaint, Keating repeatedly made comments concerning Kresky's plans to work after having the baby.

"James Keating's repeated comments about plaintiff's pregnancy and work plans constitute further sexual harassment in that they caused plaintiff to feel abused and impaired plaintiff's ability to perform her job by interacting professionally with James Keating and co-workers," the amended complaint stated.

In the answer to the amended complaint, the allegations of sexual harassment were denied by the University.

On Feb. 3, 1994, Kresky contacted Carmin Ross-Murray, director of employee relations in the Employee Relations Office at K-State, and complained of sexual harassment by Keating, according to the amended complaint.

As a result of this conversation, following instructions as defined in the K-State policy prohibiting sexual harassment, Danielle Dempsey, director of classified affirmative action, and Mike Renk, director of fiscal affairs in the College of Technology, met to discuss the complaint on March 10.

The policy states: "If a complaint is made to the responsible administrator, that individual will confer with the appropriate Affirmative Action Office staff member concerning the resolution of the complaint. Likewise, should the complaint be made to either Affirmative Action Office, the staff member will confer with the possible administrator."

Four days after the meeting with Dempsey and Renk, Keating presented a letter of insubordination to Kresky.

The letter is not a part of public record because it is a personnel matter.

In the suit, Kresky said she believes the letter was a response to the alleged sexual harassment she had reported to the University.

"This citation for insubordination and letter of warning were in retaliation for the complaint of sexual harassment, which the plaintiff had made and

HOW K-STATE DEFINES SEXUAL HARASSMENT

K-State's sexual harassment policy defines sexual harassment as any behavior which, through inappropriate sexual content or disparagement of members of one sex, interferes with an individual's work or learning environment.

To determine if alleged conduct constitutes sexual harassment, the entire context and pattern of behavior is examined. According to the policy, the most extreme form is an attempt to coerce an unwilling person into a sexual relationship by misusing an employment or educational relationship.

Any verbal or physical behavior constitutes sexual harassment if:

- A person is intimidated by the threat, overt or implicit, that any educational or employment decision may be affected by an unwillingness to tolerate or accept sexual attentions. Those decisions may involve grades, recommendations, evaluations and all decisions about the requirements, terms and conditions of employment learning.
- A person is required to tolerate or accept sexual attentions as a condition of employment or learning.
- The behavior creates an environment that is intimidating, hostile or offensive for members of one sex, and thus interferes with a person's ability to work or learn.
- Any educational or employment decision has been affected by a person's refusal to comply with or tolerate inappropriate sexual behavior.
- Any reprisals are taken for reporting or objecting to sexual harassment.

The policy also states that jokes, slurs, disparagements or insults directed at members of one sex interfere with work or learning and are therefore prohibited.

Campus offices seek solution to harassment

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

K-State is working to solve the problem of sexual harassment on campus through several offices.

Clyde Howard, director of unclassified affirmative action, said some incidents of harassment had occurred within the last year, but a complete list is not available yet.

"Without a compiled list, I recall two complaints that relate to sexual harassment," Howard said.

The last year of full statistics on sexual harassment in the University are from Oct. 1, 1991 to Sept. 30, 1992. Howard said during that year there were a total of 11 complaints filed.

"During that period, seven incidents were reported involving both undergraduate and graduate students, and four complaints filed by employees," he said.

The Women's Resource Center also dealt with harassment incidents during fall 1994.

FOR HELP

- Affirmative Action: Anderson 214, 532-6220
- Women's Resource Center: Holton 206, 532-6444
- Dean of Student Life: Holton 102, 532-6432

"I don't have an exact number, but I have had complaints come in from both students and faculty," Judy Davis, director of the center, said.

"Harassment is second only to physical security in numbers of requests we get for assistance," she said.

The center is just one of the places on campus that can help female students and employees work through harassment problems.

▶ TELEFUND

Telefund workers compete for prize

LINDA HARVEY
Collegian

Just for spending a couple of evenings on the phone, students can win a trip to Kansas City, a month of free cable service or a pair of movie tickets.

Students recruited from each of K-State's nine colleges will spend 20 calling sessions contacting alumni nationwide for "Free Willie — Telefund 1995."

"The scale and success of K-State's telephone program makes it unique," Gordon Dowell, Telefund director, said. "What's unusual is that we use volunteers — 1,400 students."

Other schools use automated dialing systems and pay their callers, Dowell said.

In its 16th year, the telefund has gained the reputation of being the world's largest all-volunteer telephone fund-raising campaign for higher education.

During the past 15 years, the telefund has raised $6.9 million that has gone toward scholarships and enhancements for K-State. Last year's telefund raised more than $805,000.

TELEFUND

To volunteer for the Telefund, students should contact their dean's office.

Even though the students who volunteer their time to K-State's telefund aren't paid, more than 100 area businesses and K-State alumni have contributed more than $10,000 in incentive prizes.

Among this year's bigger prizes is a Classic 1973 Plymouth Satellite. The car will be raffled in a drawing at the conclusion of Telefund, and the winner will be introduced during the men's basketball game on March 4.

Trips to Heartland Park in Topeka, a retreat in Manhattan and AT&T gift certificates also highlight a large list of prizes.

▶ SCHOLARSHIPS

Grads to leave cash legacy

CARRIE LININ
Collegian

A K-State senior class tradition has been revived thanks to the Student Foundation and K-State seniors.

The Student Foundation's Seniors of Legacy program was created by students to help fellow students obtain financial support for their college education.

Seniors of Legacy program has renewed the senior class tradition of giving back to the University, but instead of property, they wanted to do something more practical.

"Why not raise the money for scholarships instead of a gift to the University?" said Gregory Leet, director of K-State libraries and adviser for the Student Foundation.

In past years, senior classes have donated gifts including clocks, benches, light poles and other landmarks.

Since January 1994, the Seniors of Legacy program has been collecting money for scholarships.

"The graduating seniors collect and set up scholarships for next year's seniors," Leet said.

Leet said the idea of getting the seniors to give now begins the role of the alumni.

Efforts to get the word out about the program consisted of mailings to each senior describing the program in depth, an information booth in the K-State Union, telephone calls to seniors and the telefund.

Success proved to be a collection of $1,500 distributed to three recipients each receiving a $500 scholarship.

Applicants are required to have a 2.5 GPA and write an essay explaining what the applicant has contributed to K-State.

Volunteers have been calling and sending mailings to seniors this week asking for a donation to the fund-raising cause.

NEWS BRIEFS

▶ MANHATTAN, RILEY COUNTY ARGUE ABOUT KIMBALL AVENUE REPAIRS

Local governments are trying to decide who will get stuck with the bill for repairs to Kimball Avenue.

During the summer of 1994, the city of Manhattan annexed K-State, as well as segments of some roads that served the outer reaches of the University campus.

About three miles of county-maintained roads were annexed.

One of these roads was Kimball Avenue.

Riley County has been planning improvements to Kimball Avenue for two or three years, said Bruce McCallum, city of Manhattan director of public works.

Now there is some question as to whether the county will continue the planned improvements.

The county would like to use the money elsewhere in the county, Karen McCulloh, Riley County commissioner, said.

Riley County is losing some revenue from the city's annexation of the University because of the loss of sales-tax revenues, McCulloh said.

The county used to receive a sales tax of one-half a cent on every dollar of sales in the annexed area.

Now the county receives only one-fourth a cent on every dollar of sales because the area is now within the city limits, McCulloh said.

The county commissioners said they believe because of the tax loss, it should also lose some of the responsibility for maintaining the annexed roads, McCulloh said.

The county commission was never asked about any of the annexation, McCulloh said.

"We don't want to seem mad. We just want what's best for the county," she said.

The city wants the county to use federal grants it has planned to use for the improvements on Kimball Avenue, Helen Cooper, mayor of Manhattan, said.

The city will pay the 20-percent match for the federal funds and will reimburse the county for the cost of inspection, Cooper said.

The Manhattan city commission and Riley County board of commissioners had a joint meeting on Thursday.

"I feel that we resolved the issue in good part today," Edith Stunkel, city commissioner, said after the meeting.

The city commission would like to work out an agreement that would pave the way for future cooperation between the city and county governments, Stunkel said.

In the future, the city will pay the entire match and inspection fee, Stunkel said.

The county commission has not yet decided on the issue, though, McCulloh said.

Stunkel said another issue is the city's procedure when annexing roads.

Sometimes the city will annex the half of the road adjacent to newly annexed property, or sometimes it will annex property up to, but not including, a road.

▶ STRONGEST EARTHQUAKE IN 30 YEARS JOLTS PACIFIC NORTHWEST

SEATTLE (AP) — The strongest earthquake to hit Puget Sound in 30 years caused no serious damage or injuries but jolted memories that the Pacific Northwest is earthquake country.

Saturday night's 5.0 magnitude quake was felt as far north as Canada and as far south as Salem, Ore. It was centered 10 miles south of Seattle.

The quake, which struck at 7:11 p.m., shattered store windows, knocked groceries off shelves and cracked the walls of two aging brick fire stations in Tacoma, Wash.

But its main victims were nerves.

"It started shaking the whole trailer," said Scott Shabaz, who lives about 2-1/2 miles south of the epicenter. "I have a rude friend that comes by once in a while and likes to do that with his truck."

Jennifer Fitzgerald, a supermarket worker, said, "People were shaken up a lot."

"A lot of people haven't lived here long enough to experience any of the earthquakes," she said.

The tremor was the strongest to hit the Seattle area since a 6.5-magnitude earthquake struck April 29, 1965, injuring at least 31 people. In 1949, a 7.1-magnitude quake near Olympia killed eight people.

Saturday's quake, which lasted between 10 and 20 seconds, occurred close to the earth's surface within its crust, seismologists said.

"Shallow earthquakes pose a particular hazard because they're closer to the people and the homes," said Ruth Ludwin, a research scientist with the University of Washington seismology lab.

The state Department of Transportation will send crews Monday to inspect bridges and highways.

"We certainly wouldn't expect a lot of damage, but it is a reminder that we live in a seismic area," said Bill Steele, coordinator of the university's seismology lab.

▶ JUDGE SAYS COMMUNITY-BASED JUVENILE JUSTICE SYSTEM NEEDED

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Nearly a year after state lawmakers passed a juvenile anti-crime bill, Nebraskans are still figuring out how to provide the community-based services required by the legislation.

Juvenile Judge Kristine Cecava of Ogallala said Nebraska requires different services in different areas.

"This process needs to be community-based," Cecava said. "You go to Omaha or to Merriman and you say, 'If I were a kid in trouble here, where would I go?'"

Cecava was among dozens of judges, lawyers, law enforcement officials, treatment providers, parents and officials of state agencies who met for two days last week to develop a comprehensive juvenile justice system.

"Our goal should be, 'How can I serve this child's needs?' rather than, 'How can I not serve them and make somebody else do it?'" Cecava said Friday.

Most rural parts of the state lack services for the treatment or detention of youths, she said. Many judges lack local options for placing children.

Denis McCarville, executive director of the Uta Halee Girls Village in Omaha, was among those recommending the creation of Youth Service Centers. The centers would provide information, evaluation and initial treatment facilities in a "one-stop shop."

Such services now are scattered among courts, probation offices, corrections departments and other agencies. Many rural areas lack the services altogether.

Three pilot centers could be set up around the state as examples for other communities, McCarville said.

Karen Authier, director of family-based programs at the Boys Town care home near Omaha, spoke for another group recommending the state pay private or local agencies for some services it provides.

Jon Hill, director of the state's new Office of Juvenile Services, said Nebraska's plan involves changing the Youth Development Centers at Kearney and Geneva from their present role as "juvenile prisons" to treatment centers.

▶ CAMPUS SAFETY

Lights help night owls stroll safely

HEATHER BALLEW
Collegian

In an effort to promote a safer campus, free fliers and palm safety lights have been distributed by Student Senate, Consumer Relations Board and the president's cabinet.

"A lot of people feel a lot safer than they actually are on campus," Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, said.

Finkeldei said the palm safety lights have one side that is a flashlight and one side thatglows red.

If a student sees movement ahead when walking in the dark, they can shine the light on the movement to see what's ahead.

Ashley Weekly, Senate intern, said there are a lot of really dark places on campus at night, and the safety light will make her feel safer. She plans to keep the light in her backpack.

"If I feel uncomfortable or think someone is approaching me, I'll get it out," Weekly said.

The flier includes information to increase awareness when students are walking alone or at home.

Tricia Nolfi, coordinator of student activities, said the program was sponsored by Southwestern Bell, which provided the palm safety lights and funds to produce the fliers on safety.

Finkeldei said this was the first semester Southwestern Bell has sponsored a program of this nature at K-State, although the company sponsors similar programs on other campuses. Southwestern Bell will sponsor a similar program at K-State again in the fall 1995 semester.

Finkeldei said he hopes to expand the safety program every year and receive increased funds from the company.

The lights and fliers were originally distributed during fee payment at the Student Governing Association table in the K-State Union. Because there were so many lights and fliers left over, SGA is distributing the rest in different ways.

Some of the lights and fliers were taken to the residence halls to be distributed.

John Danos, director of Goodnow Hall, said he received 10 palm safety lights. He gave the lights to the students working on the hall's security task force to recognize them for their efforts.

Danos said he hopes the students on the security task force are carrying the flashlights and telling residents about their value.

Other safety lights were taken to the K-State police department.

Whenever a police officer sees a student walking alone on campus at night, they plan to remind the student to use the escort service and hand the student a free safety light.

Escorts will be handing out safety lights when walking with students at night.

Safety lights and fliers are also available in the SGA office in the Union and every Thursday at the SGA information table outside of the Stateroom cafeteria.

Vacant building to house arts events, civic theater

JANET GILLILAND

What was once a supermarket called the Dutchmaid Store will soon be the home of the Manhattan Arts Center.

"The development of the Arts Center was initiated by the Manhattan Civic Theatre, the Manhattan Arts Council and the city of Manhattan working together in partnership," said John Biggs, executive director of the Manhattan Arts Council.

The renovation started in July 1993.

The first construction included getting rid of dangerous items from the old Dutchmaid store so it would be safe.

"Our first goal was to make handicapped-accessible restrooms on the first floor, said Steve Galitzer, member of the Arts Center Board and the building manager.

"When completed, there will be a theater space used for performing arts events, music events and dance classes," Biggs said. "There will also be a gallery for visual arts, in addition to a classroom that is already completed in the professional ceramic studio located in the Arts Annex."

The theater will be called a blank room, where the stage and seating can be moved around for different events. It will seat 150-170 people.

Besides a theater, the center will also include art classes, such as pottery classes, open to anyone in the community. These will be in a separate building run by the Clay Coalition.

Biggs said Manhattan needs a community arts center available to citizens of all ages every day of the week so they can learn, study and teach.

Jim Hamilton, associate professor of philosophy and president of the Arts Center Board, said 50-55 percent of the area will be devoted to the theater and the theater support areas, while the rest will be available as gallery and office space for the Manhattan Arts Council.

There will also be educational classes for school children.

IN OUR OPINION

$50 is a steep price for a senior class legacy

One could assume the marketing executives know what they're doing, but the message seems to be that only serious donators need apply.

All across the nation, college campuses are littered with useful, semi-useful and stupid items donated by senior classes.

Although one can question the value of an eternal flame dedicated to Earnest P. Hornbacker VII (the first man to make a pig fly), it is hard to argue with the value of a good education.

This year's senior class plans to donate money to a scholarship fund instead of buying a tangible, possibly silly object.

This is a fine idea and should be commended.

The money goes to next year's seniors who will need financial assistance.

The flier that went to this year's seniors, however, may have caught a few of them by surprise.

The flier asked seniors to fork over $50 to the Student Foundation. This may seem to be taking things too far.

One could assume the marketing executives know what they're doing, but the message seems to be that only serious donators need apply.

Most charities ask you to sacrifice a pizza or a few long-distance phone calls.

To the average senior, $50 is one seriously fun weekend — something not too many are willing to part with.

The scholarship is a good plan, but let's hope the Student Foundation will take pity on our poor college checkbooks.

Most of us don't have $50 lying around.

TOLES

City needs student representation

KATHLEEN MASTIO

Editor's Note: The opinion expressed in this column is the opinion of the columnist and not necessarily the opinion of the Collegian or its editorial board.

Last year, K-State was annexed by the city of Manhattan. This now puts students in the position to vote in city-wide elections. For the first time since the annexation, there will be a student candidate.

Justin Kastner, junior in food science and industry, is running for city commission. Three city commissioners will be elected during the April 4 election. This is an opportunity that students may only have once. Students need to vote with force in both the primary Feb. 28 and in the election April 4. These two votes will determine how much representation students will have. By using Derby Dining Center as a polling place, voting will be easily accessible to students.

There isn't anyone more qualified to represent Manhattan than Justin Kastner. Kastner is a lifetime resident of Manhattan and a student at K-State. Kastner has an excellent perspective to help K-State and Manhattan.

Kastner has a small list of local items that need attention. He wants to prepare for the loss of Fort Riley, increase the number of alternative activities for high-school students and sell Manhattan, with the hope of keeping more graduates in Manhattan.

Kastner has planned to form a partnership between the city commission, the county commission, and the Manhattan School Board. This partnership would help provide options for high-school students. By having programs for teenagers, some of the problems facing them may be conquered.

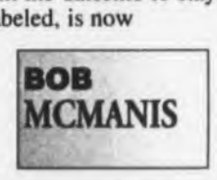
There are few chances for students to have such a profound influence on local policy and the manner in which their taxes will be spent.

Kastner wants to help new businesses establish themselves, while improving the existing infrastructure. During the last vote, citizens expressed the need for new businesses by approving a 1/2-cent sales tax increase. We should elect someone who is able to express the needs of K-State students.

Students can change their voter registration in the Student Governing Association office on the ground floor of the Union. Two cards will be provided, one to cancel a student's current registration and another to register them in Riley County. The process is free and takes about 10 minutes.

Students pay taxes, and it is time that we had a little representation in local government. Students could be a powerful voting force in Manhattan, if they turned out to vote. K-State students need to voice their interest in the future of Manhattan.

"Students have a stake in the game," Kastner said.



Kastner will be making appearances at various campus organizations. Union Program Council is also sponsoring a debate between the city commission candidates in the Union. This will be a good forum for students to become familiar with campaign issues and the candidates for city commission.

There are few chances for students to have such a profound influence on local policy and the manner in which their tax dollars are spent. It is time to make evident that students are willing to put forth the effort to change the system. While Kastner has a lot of community support, students can and will make a difference. The three top vote getters will receive positions on the city commission.

Students should change their voter registration to Riley County with the city commission election in mind. Students need to utilize their voting power. This is the best chance students have to represent their interests. Help K-State and Manhattan by voting for Justin Kastner on April 4. Students can make a difference, and it is time we started.

Generation X drinks variety of beverages

BOB MCMANIS

Coffee, tea, or espresso?

There are a lot of students out there not drinking coffee. Instead, many of us are drinking some other beverage to stimulate our brains.Many of us only want the caffeine to stay awake. Generation X, as we have been labeled, is now drinking anything but the common beverage of coffee in the morning.

Yes, we are the lost generation. We are the young adults who make marketing directors go crazy identifying our likes and our dislikes.

Yes, we are the lost generation. We are the young adults who make marketing directors go crazy identifying our likes and our dislikes.

We may view coffee as our parents' drink, or "the old folks' drink." More and more people are switching from coffee to tea or wanting the strong sensation of espresso. Whatever the case, espresso and coffee houses are becoming the newest social watering holes.

Coffee houses and cafés are springing up in many cities. I think it is a different step away from the bars, where we can take our first date in a new relationship or where we go to meet that someone. It's a place to just hang out, read a book or socialize.

Recently, J.J. Birden of the Kansas City Chiefs opened up his own coffee house in Kansas City. I bet most of the customers were drinking something other than ordinary coffee.

Sports fans may have even been a bit confused when they first stepped into his establishment. These are not just sports bars. Some businesses may specialize in some other food or beverage.

There are a variety of coffee shops in Manhattan to sit, relax and enjoy a warm beverage and a selection of bagels, sandwiches, salads and desserts.

Generation X seems to always be on the move. Travel is one thing we share in common. It seems we have traveled and will travel, more than our parents or our grandparents.

Once we have traveled a certain distance, we always wish to travel again to the same place or another new exploration.

In our travels we are exposed to new cultures, new habits and new social drinks.

Many of us who have been fortunate to travel to Europe (or otherwise abroad) know when it is time for tea. Some, like myself, have adapted to these socially accepted customs.

Is this why our generation loves spring breaks?Is the reasoning behind the break to get away from school, studies, work or it all? Maybe it's just to sip tea.

I never drank coffee, tea or an espresso on a normal basis. But after traveling to Europe, and drinking at a few cafés with some friends in Kansas, I adopted drinking Russian tea daily. Now I find myself only drinking tea a few times a week, usually in the morning hours. One interesting student I met abroad was of Chinese descent. He would drink his tea with just the right amount of honey mixed in. Many students and I thought this strange at first, and then we tried this combination for ourselves.

It was a new experience for me. I met a lot of people who would place an orange peel or some other fruit into their cup of tea. It adds a different taste to the drink. The trick to the honey is mixing the correct amount together with the tea.

Russian tea has a strong caffeine taste and aroma. The honey adds to the flavor and balances the bold taste. I encourage those of you that have never tried a cup of hot tea, espresso or cappuccino to give it a shot.

Especially during the winter months, these warm drinks can satisfy your taste buds and warm your stomach while giving you the chance to escape the cold weather. The aroma and taste of these drinks will arouse your senses, and the new environment will entice you.

Bob McManis is a graduate student in geography.

▶ PBS

Company needs funding

Dear editor,

I enjoyed reading the letters from Amy Brooks and Bill Smeed about PBS funding, although I believe Mr. Smeed's letter reflects a common lack of understanding about such funding.

He notes that CPB funding makes up only 14 percent of PBS' funding, and that such a small amount can be re-gained by "privatization" (i.e., commercialization) and increased contributor support. But CPB funding makes up only 14 percent of the public broadcasting SYSTEM funding, which includes both public radio and television.

At the individual station level, CPB funding makes up closer to 30 percent at most stations, and more than 50 percent in some cases (where population is less dense). The 14 percent figure is the average when all public radio and TV stations in the country and their various funding sources are totalled.

More than that, many of the programs are produced with station and/or CPB funding.

With the loss of that funding, the costs of those programs will rise, and stations will have less to spend on these more expensive programs. The domino effect cannot be overstated.

Mr. Smeed referred to Mr. Gingrich's example of asking for a raise, explaining that even an exorbitant raise is only a minor part of the overall company budget.

I suppose the correlation is that no amount is small if it's inappropriate. And that's the issue here — is public broadcasting relevant today?

The Corporation of Public Broadcasting was established in the mid-'60s to provide an outlet for a diversity of opinions, controversial topics, minority voices and international culture that was not commercially viable in the marketplace. The question is whether such diversity is still available to all Americans.

Mr. Smeed points out that the cable channels exist without government handouts (thanks to commercialization and cable subscription fees).

But nearly 40 percent of American homes do not have cable, either by choice, because it is unaffordable or because it simply is not available in their communities.

Sadly, Barney can't support public broadcasting, because PBS doesn't own Barney — it was a highly successful creation on video well before PBS began "renting" him for 30 minutes a day.

The point is that the CPB funding issue is not as cut-and-dried as it seems, or as Mr. Gingrich would have us believe. He would have you believe that the CPB funding issue is a monetary one (even though CPB funding amounts to less than two ten-thousandths of the federal budget) and a market one — but the matter is a political one at its heart.

Again, the question is not if CPB funding is significant, or if it reflects the views and values held by a majority of Americans, but rather, whether or not America's diverse faces and voices are represented in commercial broadcasting.

Many of us believe that America benefits from its diversity — some would allow you to receive those benefits only if you live in a major metropolitan area and can afford them.

▶ ABORTION

Babies deserve chance

Dear editor,

I am writing this letter in response to Lea Mayberry's letter "Women Deserve a Choice," which appeared in the Jan. 26 Collegian.

It may be true that women died from abortions before the Roe v. Wade decision of 1973.

However, there were "safe" methods of abortion in existence before its legislation.

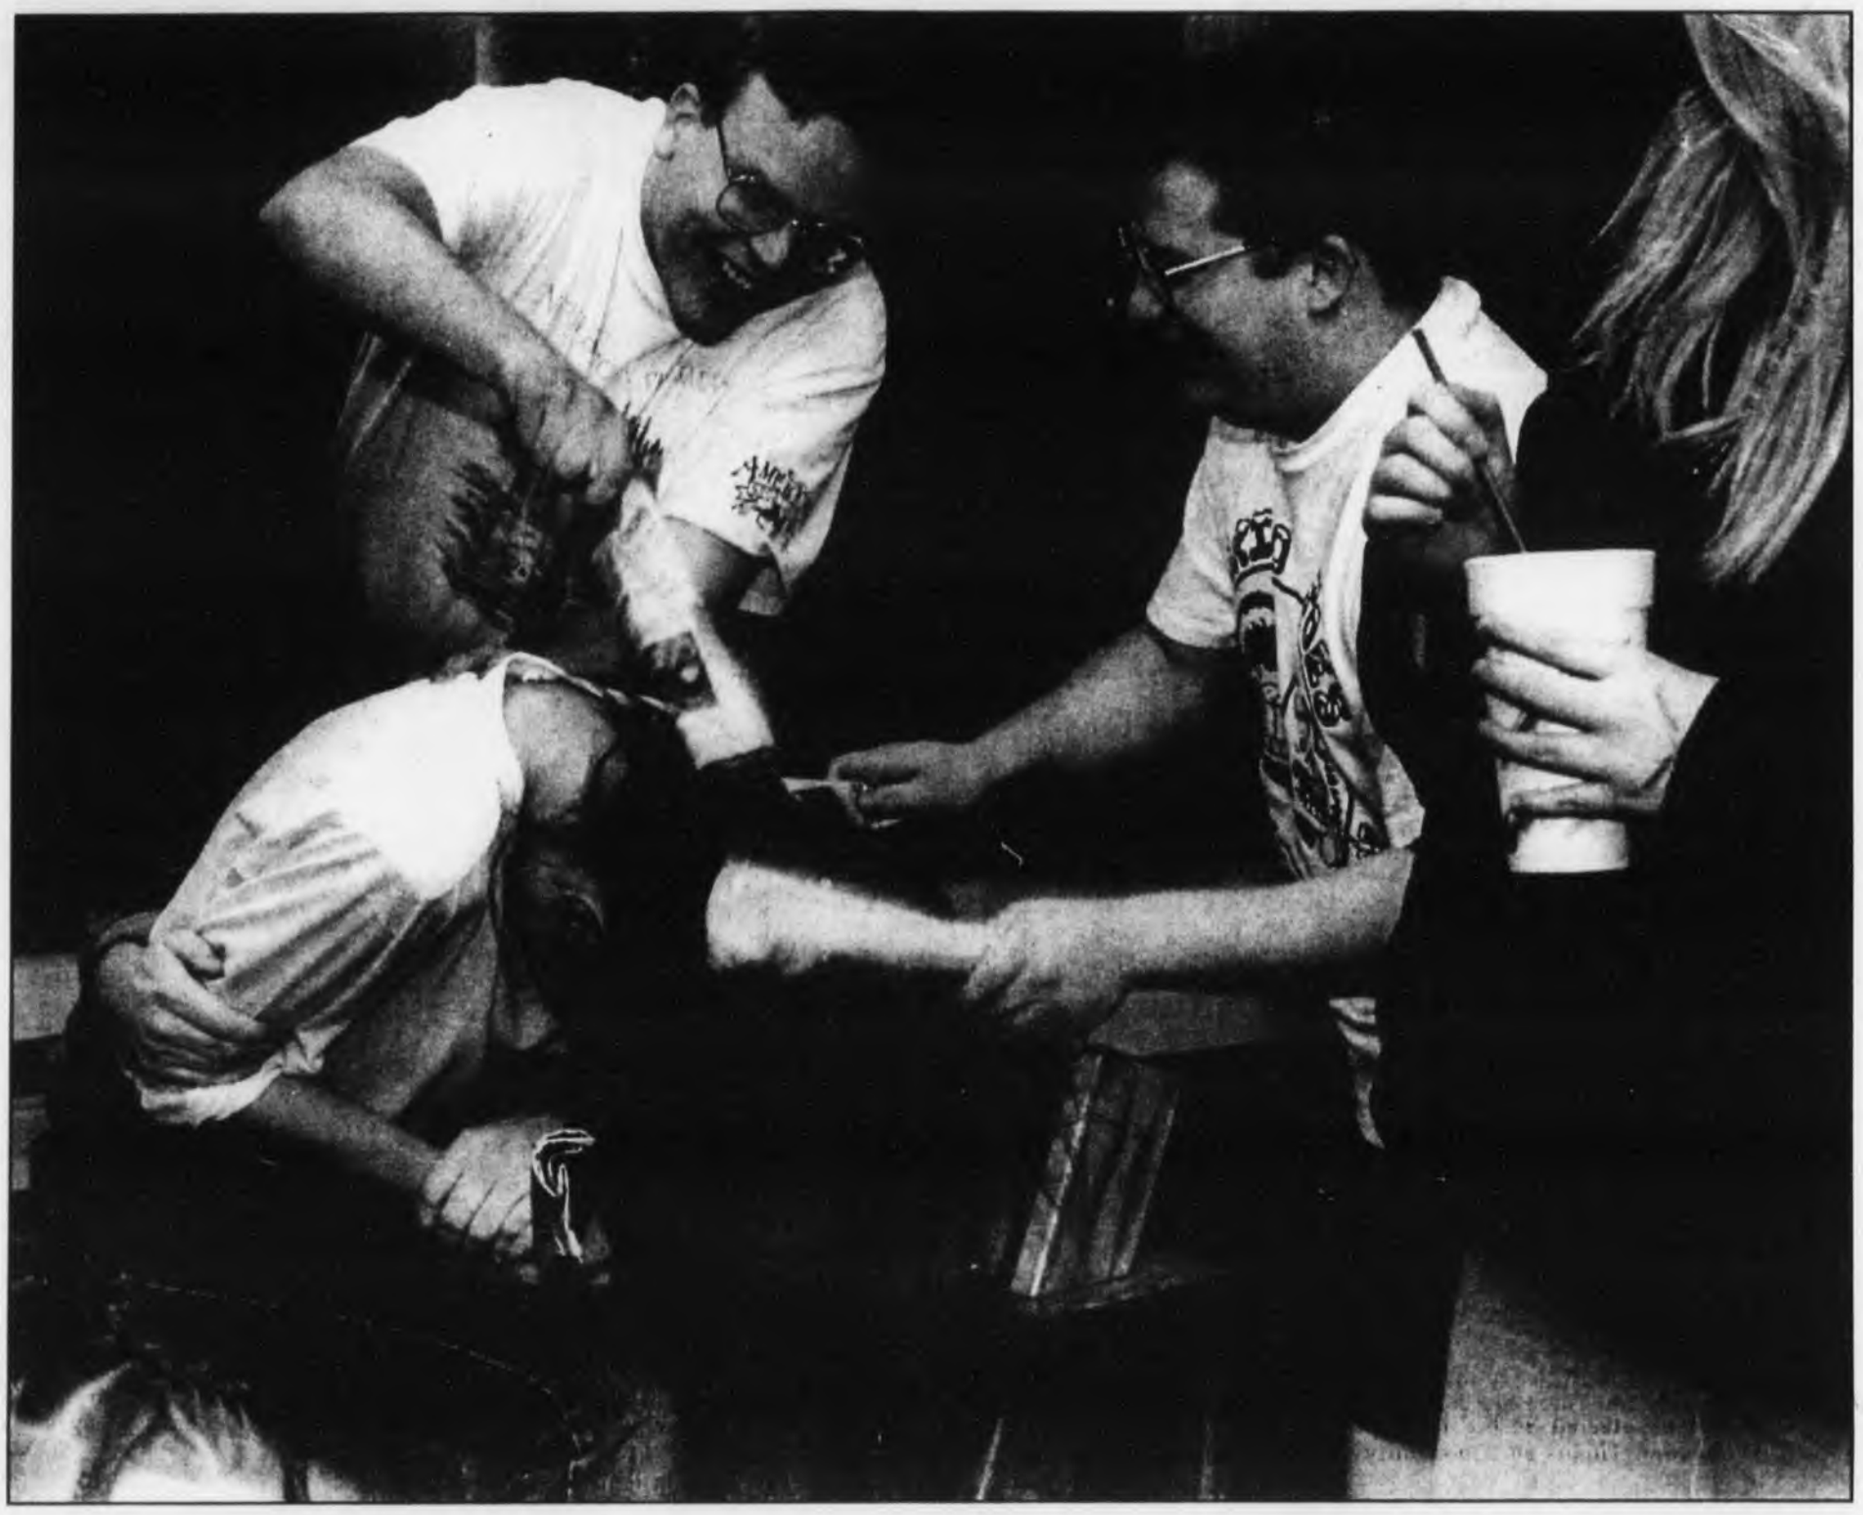
I am sure that more women have died from abortions since 1973, because more women are going to abortion clinics than ever had abortions before the 1973 decision.

Ms. Mayberry stated that "women were the key to the case of Roe v. Wade —it was about all women and women attorneys ..." Pro-Lifers recognize that this is a priority in the pro-abortion case.

However, those holding the pro-life position feel it is important to defend the rights of the victims of abortion, the children (otherwise known as babies or "fetuses") who are killed daily in abortion clinics.

Pro-abortion advocates seem to be speaking out of both sides of their mouths; they claim that their position will save women's lives and eliminate threats to their emotional and physical health.

Meanwhile, they ignore the threats to the life and health of the unborn children.



Legal abortion represents a threat to a human life that of the aborted baby, a possible threat to the life of the mother and a certain threat to the mother's ability to have children.

Check out the statistics — women who have had abortions are far more likely to have miscarriages and complications of pregnancy than those who have not had abortions.

Finally, Ms. Mayberry represented pro-life advocates as a "violent and verbal few."

Those who are violent, are few; most of us believe that all human life has a value and would find any form of murder from abortion to homicide immoral and distasteful.

Life in the LOBBY

Floor lobbies are the watering holes of residence halls — people hang out, gossip, study and waste time.

Amidst the chaos of Goodnow 5 lobby life, Michelle Thompson, freshman undecided, calmly braids the hair of Jess Collins, sophomore in chemical engineering.

Michelle Thompson braids Jess Collins' hair while the smooth sounds of John Berry illuminate the fifth-floor lobby of Goodnow Hall.

Thompson, freshman undecided, and Collins, sophomore in chemical engineering, are among the 14 lobby rats, as they jokingly like to call themselves, who are sprawled out all over the orangish, wooden couches. There are a few biology books open. But most people are engrossed in what seem like deep, heavy conversations.

"It's mostly gossip," James Chaney, junior in mechanical engineering, says. Chaney says he likes to hang out at least a few hours daily and catch up on all the latest.

"Lately we've been out here plotting revenge against people on the floor," Chris Weber, sophomore in engineering, says, laughing.

"It started a couple of weeks ago when one of the guys was going through some drawers in one of the girls' rooms and found a plaid bra," Chaney says, amidst a storm of giggles and snickers from the women.

"So to get revenge the other night, the girls followed him to his room and taped his door shut," Chaney says.

"This has been going on for a couple of weeks now," Weber says.

"I spend about five hours out here every day," Weber says, adding that most of his time in the lobby is occupied by studying. "You get desensitized to the noise after a while, " Weber says, intently staring at his Physics book.

More and more floor residents are showing up and plopping down on the floor. The tame conversation has turned into a bit of a party. Screams and loud laughs can be heard all the way down the hall.

A newspaper fight is keeping Heather Burr, freshman in business administration, and Chaney busy in the corner.

Heather Braden, resident assistant, comes out of her room. Even though her room is right next to the lobby, Braden says she doesn't get distracted by the noise and is good friends with the residents.

"They mostly socialize and play pitch, a card game, till two or three in the morning," Braden says.

A seemingly annoyed woman, Brenda Frey, comes out of her room and tells everyone to be quiet. The room gets quiet for a while, but soon the havoc returns.

"She always comes out, even before quiet hours, and gripes at us if she thinks we're making too much noise," Chaney says.

In the privacy of her room, Frey, senior in civil engineering, says, "I work at 5:30 in the morning, and I try to go to sleep by 10:30, which is before quiet hours."

"I've tried earlier to be nice and asked them to turn down the music, but sometimes I lose my temper and go out there and yell at them," Frey says. "If they could just go inside their rooms and shut the door so the noise doesn't echo down the hall, I'd be OK. Tonight is an especially bad night."

Rachel Hess, sophomore in nuclear engineering, says she spends anywhere from one to five hours in the lobby and is aware of several noise complaints from fourth floor lobby.

"Fourth floor likes to have slumber parties in their lobby, of all places," Hess says.

Residents of fourth floor such as Mike Oberst, freshman in political science, and James Fanning, freshman in architectural engineering, admit to these occasional slumber parties after a long night of watching movies in the lobby.

"We may have our little slumber parties, but it sounds like they bowl up there (fifth floor)," Fanning says. He is a member of the fourth-floor group, which is composed entirely of freshmen and designed to give freshman a way to get used to college life.

"If you want to get away from your studying, just come out here, and you'll never get it done," Alexandra Guzman, freshman in architecture, says.

"It doesn't interfere with my study time," Oberst interrupts, but proceeds to occassionally look up and make other comments on the topic at hand.

Guzman says she spends at least four to five hours in the lobby each day, and even though it does interfere with her study time, she says it is a great way to meet people.

The conversation takes a turn, and the 10 people in the lobby ponder on what they all have in common.

"Beer drinkin'," Oberst bursts out, and everyone laughs.

Whatever might have brought them together, the group says they are now inseparable.

"We're the closest floor. We watch movies together, have parties, go to Carlos O' Kelly's and Tuttle Creek," Kim Bruna, freshman undecided, says.

The group is even planning on going to Houston together over spring break.

"We'll all stay friends even after moving out of here," Bruna says as the group nods thoughtfully. "A lot of us have apartments together next year."

The sober moment doesn't last long, though, as the conversation turns to plans for the Super Bowl.

Cats hang tough but still lose to ISU

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

Ames, Iowa — When a TV reporter asked Tom Asbury for a quick, general comment about Saturday's game, Asbury had a quick, general response.

"Yeah, we lost."

Although it was a close, 87-79 road loss to a nationally ranked team, it was still a loss that left both Asbury and his team frustrated.

Iowa St. 87
K-State 79

"Basketball isn't about playing close," K-State forward Stanley Hamilton said.

"We're scaring everybody by playing close. We just need to get over the hump. We haven't accomplished anything until we get some w's."

Throughout the first half, however, the Cats looked as if they could earn a "w" at Iowa State's Hilton Coliseum for the first time in five years.

K-State got on the board early, jumping out to a five-point lead less than one minute into the game on a Tyrone Davis hook shot and Elliot Hatcher's three-pointer.

The Cats, who led by 10 at one point in the first half, stayed on top of the Cyclones until late in the period.

"We did a great job executing early," Asbury said.

"We got the ball inside."

But with less than four minutes remaining in the half, Cyclone senior Julius Michalik's six points put Iowa State ahead 45-39 at the buzzer.

It was yet another Cyclone senior, Loren Meyer, stepping up to start the second half.

After Iowa State's Fred Hoiberg nailed a 10-footer at the beginning of the period, Meyer took over, scoring all of Iowa State's next 12 points.

By the time Meyer topped off his performance with a dunk, the Cyclones' lead had grown to 10 with 15:00 remaining in the game.

"They did a great job getting the ball in to Meyer," Asbury said.

After Meyer was through, it was Hoiberg's turn to take over.

With a lay-in and two treys in a little more than three minutes, Hoiberg helped push the Cyclones' lead to 18, their largest of the game.

But with less than nine minutes left on the clock, K-State battled back.

The Cats' Belvis Noland got back into a groove, hitting 10 of his career-high 24 points in the final minutes.

"The leaner by Hoiberg was a huge play. No, back up. That was the game. We thought it might be a charge, but I guess not."

TOM ASBURY
K-State
Men's Basketball coach

Tyrone Davis' four-foot bank shot against Meyer with 1:36 left to play brought K-State back to within five.

That's when it happened, the play that Asbury said, was the game.

It happened when the Clones' Hoiberg drove to the basket with 10 seconds on the shot clock.

As Hoiberg made the layup, he drew a blocking foul from Tyrone Davis at the same time.

Hoiberg went on to make his free throw, putting Iowa State ahead by eight.

"The leaner by Hoiberg was a huge play," Asbury said. "

No, back up. That was the game. We thought it might be a charge, but I guess not. That was huge. Let's not quibble over semantics. The whole ball game's over on that one."

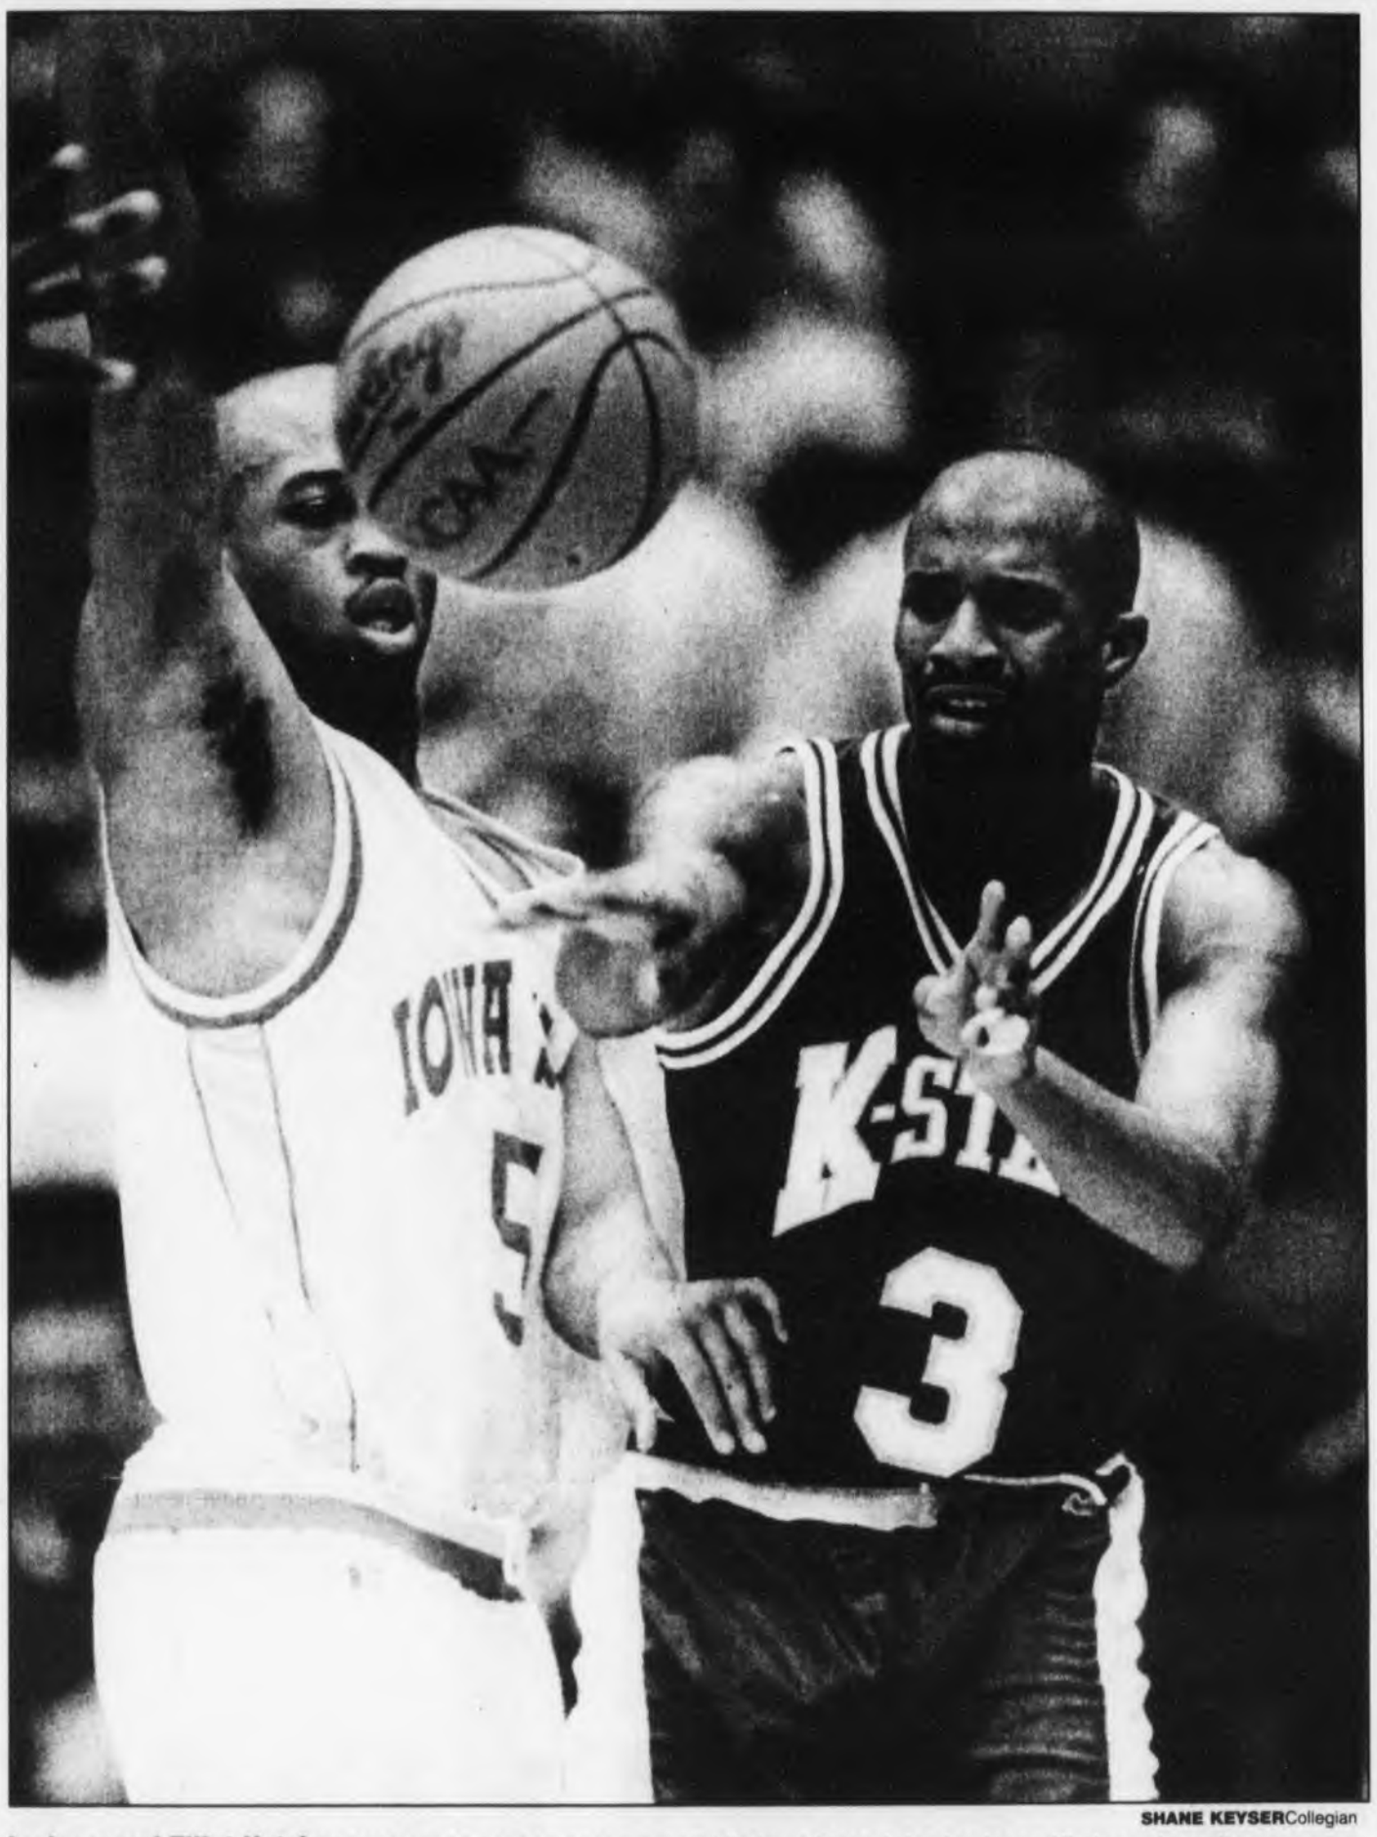
K-State's Noland agreed.

"We could have been right in the game without that play," Noland said.

"But I think that play was a charge. We should have gotten the ball."

But there was no changing the call.

Hatcher brought the Cats back to within seven with a three pointer from the right side and 25 seconds remaining, but it was too little, too late.



With the loss, K-State falls to 2-5 in the Big Eight, 11-8 overall. Iowa State improved to 3-1 in league play and 17-2 overall.

But Asbury said he isn't counting his team out at this point in the season.

"We can play with anybody, and we can beat anybody," he said.

"Now we just have to start doing it."

"This isn't a bad loss. A lot of people lose up here to these guys. We just need to win some games and be peaking when tournament time rolls around."

Netters go 2-1 during weekend

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

Three teams came to town over the weekend to face the K-State tennis team at Ahearn Field House.

Two of those teams went home disappointed, though, as the Wildcat squad finished the triple-header with a 2-1 mark.

K-State opened play Friday with a 7-2 win over Oral Roberts University.

Against Oral Roberts, Karen Nicholson claimed win No. 2 with a 6-3, 6-1 victory over Angela Cook.

In No. 2 singles, Dinah Watson posted a 6-0, 6-1 win over Rianne Louw.

Chris Schulte took the No. 3 singles matchup with a 6-3, 6-3 decision over Catherine Johnson.

Once again, the doubles teams swept play, dropping only 12 games during the day.

On Saturday, Boise State brought in the No. 6 ranking in the Central Region to tie with K-State.

Boise State proved to be too much in the match, taking a 6-3 victory over the Wildcats.

A bright spot for the Cats was the return of Karina Kuregian to the court.

Kuregian, the No. 9-ranked player in the country according to the recent Rolex Collegiate rankings, racked up her first win of the season with an easy 6-0, 6-1 victory over Maria Jose Capuano.

In doubles play, Kuregian combined with Martine Shrubsole, who had been questionable with a back injury, in a 7-5, 6-3 decision over the duo of Summer Redondo and Siiri Malm.

The team of Schulte and Nikki Lagerstrom topped Kim Vocker and Taryn Weir-Smith 6-3, 3-6, 6-3.

The triple-header ended on a high note for K-State as the team swept Creighton 9-0 on Sunday.

Kuregian, K-State's lone representative at the Rolex National Indoor Championships this week, warmed up for the event with an easy 6-1, 6-0 victory over Cheryl Meyer.

K-State head coach Steve Bietau said he witnessed some improvements on his team over the weekend.

"We certainly learned some things out there," Bietau said.

"We had some good performances this weekend.

"We had our share of just average performances. It was a pretty good effort, though."

Kuregian will leave Tuesday for national competition.

The event is scheduled for Feb. 2-5 in Dallas.

The Wildcats return to the court as a team in two weeks.

The Cats will travel to Provo, Utah, on Feb. 10 and bring a 3-1 mark into their match with Brigham Young.

The weekend road trip concludes with a stop in Salt Lake City and matches vs. Utah and Weber State.

Hawks end Huskies' unbeaten streak

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — When Connecticut finally lost, the second-ranked Huskies really lost.

Seventh-ranked Kansas rode an impressive first half Saturday to an 88-59 victory over Connecticut, which had been the last unbeaten team in Division I.

The loss, which snapped the Huskies' 15-game winning streak, also took the steam out of the weekend's debate about who should be No. 1. Top-ranked Massachusetts needed overtime to beat West Virginia on Friday night, and a victory by Connecticut over Kansas, the only team to beat the Minutemen, had many thinking that it could vault the Huskies into their first-ever No. 1 ranking.

Jerod Haase had 20 points to lead Kansas (15-2), which took command early with solid defense and outstanding three-point shooting.

It was Connecticut's worst loss since a 90-57 defeat by St. John's in 1991-92.

The victory was Kansas' 50th in Kemper Arena, about 30 minutes from its Lawrence campus, in 67 appearances.

49ers continue NFC win streak

■ The 49ers became the first team in Super Bowl history to score on their first three possessions. They led 21-7 after 16 minutes, 58 seconds.

■ Steve Young of the 49ers completed 24 of 36 passes for 325 yards and a record six touchdowns.

■ The NFC extended its Super Bowl winning streak over the AFC to 11 games.

■ Gale Gilbert has been on the last five teams to lose the Super Bowl — four with Buffalo and one with San Diego.

Andre Coleman, former K-State wide receiver, during the Kansas City Chiefs-San Diego Chargers game Nov. 13. Coleman scored a touchdown off a 98-yard kickoff return during the Super Bowl Sunday night.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Bill Walsh coached the San Francisco 49ers from 1979-88 and led them to three Super Bowl titles. He watched Sunday's game from a skybox at Joe Robbie Stadium and wrote this column for the Associated Press.

Miami — As everyone expected, the 49ers had too much skill, firepower and execution for a very determined San Diego team to overcome.

San Francisco was tremendous. They had the greatest quarterback since Joe Montana, the greatest receiver in the history of the game in Jerry Rice and plenty of other superstars.

San Diego, on the other hand, was an opportunistic team that got here without any real great players. The Chargers went up against a team that gave a tremendous, artistic effort.

I knew the 49ers would cover the point spread.

I knew the 49ers would score in the 40s and that San Diego wouldn't get much more than 20 points.

And San Diego was never really in it because of what happened at the beginning.

The game was really decided on the 49ers' first possession, when they scored an easy touchdown. That showed that San Diego couldn't stop San Francisco from picking up big chunks of yardage — and that's what San Francisco does best.

The Chargers simply didn't have the people or the experience. ... and maybe they didn't have the system they needed.

San Diego is like many of teams in the NFL other than Dallas and San Francisco.

It's a defensive-oriented system that can't stand up to Dallas' or San Francisco's firepower.

On offense, San Diego did not have the ability to move the ball in chunks as San Francisco does. That, of course, is related to having guys like Jerry Rice. ... It was too much to deal with.

At quarterback, Steve Young is a Hall-of-Fame player, while Stan Humphries is a good solid player. There's really no comparison.

You can take that comparison and spread it across the board, perhaps with the exception of Junior Seau.

He's a great linebacker with Hall-of-Fame potential, but he's doing his own thing too much out there and is out of position too much.

The 49ers' offensive line — run blocking and pass protection — was just outstanding.

As for Rice, he's the greatest receiver in NFL history. I don't think anyone will question that.

He has the power, quickness and stamina, and he's a great competitor. He played with a shoulder separation that had to be injected at halftime. That's the kind of competitor he is.

It was great to see Steve Young break through after living in the shadow of Joe Montana, the greatest quarterback ever.

Young's career will rival Montana's, but Joe has four titles, and Steve has one. Steve had some abortive years with Tampa Bay and the Los Angeles Express of the USFL, so he still has some ground to make up and will never equal Joe Montana.

But as for now, Steve is right there with Troy Aikman as the NFL's elite quarterbacks. Steve may be the best athlete playing football right now. He's a great football player and a great leader.

I give the Chargers credit for sticking it out. Some people might think they'll become a prominent team, but I'm not sure of that.

In this Super Bowl, they faced one of the greatest teams in NFL history.

The result speaks for itself.

Long jump wins meet for Cats

Final jump pushes K-State ahead of KU, MU in triangular meet

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

The long jump boosted K-State to a first-place finish in the MU/KU/KSU Triangular Saturday at Columbia, Mo.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said Marshall Grayson's final attempt in the long jump was the difference in the meet for the Wildcats.

K-State	254
KU	246

Grayson was in third place behind two Kansas jumpers before his final attempt. His jump of 23 feet 8-1/4 inches vaulted him into first place.

More importantly it created an eight-point turnaround for the team, which was the margin of victory. K-State beat Kansas 254-246. Missouri finished third with 197.

"At that time, the jump was very significant in putting us in first place," Rovelto said.

The team totals were calculated by combining both the men's and the women's points.

"It was a fun little meet," high jumper Ed Broxterman said.

"Everyone was cheering for everyone else. I think I wore myself out cheering for other people before I competed."

Broxterman jumped for the first time since rupturing his appendix on Dec. 9.

Broxterman cleared a provisionally qualifying height of 7'3-3/4" just hours before he had to be rushed to the emergency room.

"I was in pain while I was jumping, but I didn't really know what it was," Broxterman said.

"I just kept rubbing my stomach and felt better.

"After I was finished, I was talking to some friends in the stands, and they eventually had to carry me out of the building and take me home."

One day later Broxterman underwent surgery after the appendix ruptured.

Broxterman finished second in the high jump at Missouri with a height of 6'9-3/4".

"I feel like I have all my strength and conditioning back," Broxterman said.

"I'm not happy at all with the way I jumped."

Gwen Wentland and Wanita Dykstra continued to dominate in the high jump as they captured first and third in the event with jumps of 6'2" and 5'10" respectively.

Wentland went on to take second in the long jump behind teammate Jill Montgomery and first in the triple jump with a leap of 38'4".

However, Rovelto said he is most impressed with the running of Belinda Hope.

Hope gathered three first-place finishes in the 200 meters, 400 meters and the 1,600-meter relay.

"It isn't a surprise at all; she's looked strong for a long time," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said her times are comparable to Nicole Green's times at this point last season. Green finished third in the nation in the 400 at the NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships in June.

Bill Fields continued to display his consistently steady improvement by finishing second in the 200 meters, third in the 55 meter and anchoring the first-place 1,600-meter relay team.

Fields turned in a 48.7 split in the relay to lead the Cats.

"He's improved so much it's unbelievable," Rovelto said.

Fields, a senior, said he felt a sense of urgency at the end of last season and that sense is what has inspired him to train harder.

"After all the probation and everything we've had to put up with the past few years, we haven't really had a chance to get the job done," Fields said.

"All of the seniors realize now that we have a chance to get it done this year, and it's our last chance."

Cats lose 2 road games

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

K-State's slump continued this weekend as the Cats dropped road games to Colorado, 76-66, and Missouri, 70-60. K-State fell to 10-9, 2-5 in the Big Eight.

Ranked No. 5 in the nation, Colorado, 16-2, 6-0 in the Big Eight, pounded the ball inside against a smaller K-State team, allowing a bigger lineup to give them an early lead.

Though the Buffaloes jumped to a 17-point lead late in the first half, the Cats were able to close the gap to 39-27 at the break. And K-State opened up on fire in the second half, with big three-pointers by senior Shanele Stires and sophomore Missy Decker tying the game at 49 and again at 51.

But Colorado reserve guard Amy Palmer put an end to the Cats' run, nailing three three-point shots to secure the Buffalo lead for the duration.

"We made some bad decisions down the stretch," K-State coach Brian Agler said. "We're moving in a positive direction. We just need to keep trying to improve our game."

This was the first game without senior Shawnda Decamp, a preseason second-team all-Big Eight selection and K-State's second-leading scorer, who left the Wildcats Friday for personal reasons.

"She just decided she didn't want to play anymore," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

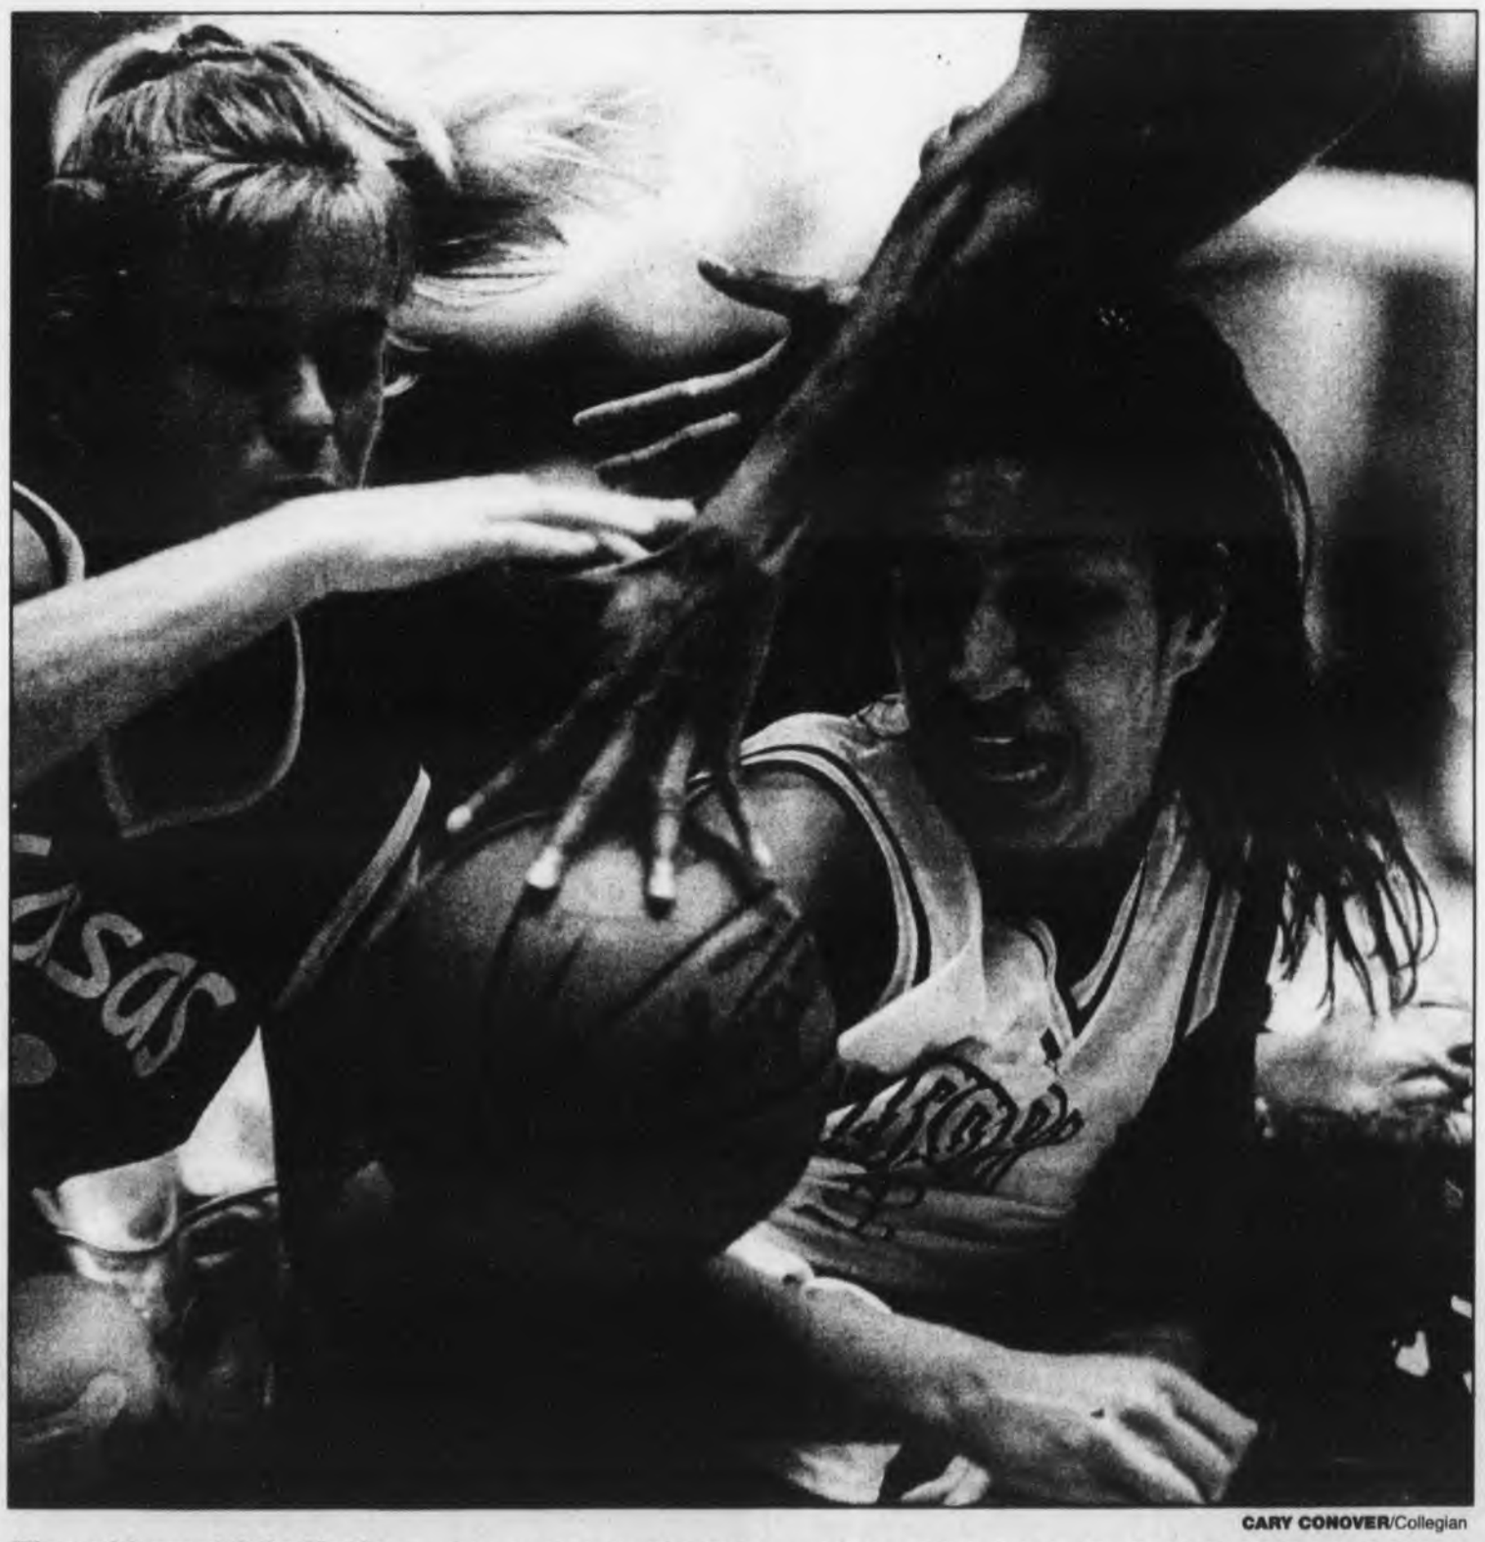
Though DeCamp averaged 14 points per game during the season, she was in a slump of late, scoring just 14 points in her last three games, including a career low of two against Oklahoma.

DeCamp leaves K-State with a career average of 17.3 points per game. She also holds all of the Wildcat records for three-point field goals made and attempted, including single-game (nine of 22 vs. Detroit Mercy on Nov. 29, 1993), season (91 of 255 during 1993-94) and career (135 of 382 during 1993-95).

Colorado coach Ceal Barry said she felt Decamp's absence did not affect the outcome of the game.

"Like all teams, someone feels they have to come in and take things over," Barry said. "And that's what happened."

Decker was that person, scoring 16 points on six-of-nine shooting, including four of seven from behind the arc. Stires paced the Cats with 22 points, and freshman Brit Jacobson added 10.



Isabelle Fijakowski, a 6-foot-5-inch center, led the Buffs with 22 points. Palmer contributed 14, and sophomore forward Erin Scholz added 13. All-America point guard Shelley Sheetz was held to just seven.

Free throws were the story in the first half as Missouri, 12-6, 3-4 in the Big Eight, downed the Cats. MU hit 15 of 16 first-half free throws to K-State's six of 11, taking a 33-27 lead into halftime.

"Our free-throw percentage sticks out," Agler said. "And we lack intensity defensively, so we foul people."

Missouri also held a significant rebounding margin, beating the Cats on the boards 48-33. "They're huge," Stires said. "They're huge, and they go to the boards hard."

Stires led all scorers with 29 points. Decker followed with 12, and Jacobson added 11.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Missouri forward Erika Martin scrambles for the ball with K-State guard Carlene Mitchell during the first half of K-State's 60-70 loss to Missouri Sunday afternoon in Columbia. Martin led the Tigers with 19 points.

When your friend wants your man

Write to Cassie:
116 Kedzie Hall
Manhattan, KS

Dear Cassandra,

My best friend is really driving me nuts. She's really pretty and uses it to pick up on every boyfriend I ever had. They're pretty good about ignoring her, but I feel nervous whenever she's alone with them or dances with them, or even talks to them. She's really thin and cute, while I'm neither.

It seems like she's "better" than me when she can make them look at her or talk to her more. Once they're distracted by her it ruins it for me; I'm ready to end the relationship.

What I really want is to meet the guy who won't find her attractive at all. Are there any guys out there who are good about overlooking their girlfriend's friends? That's what I really want.

Needing a new man

Dear needing a new man,

You don't need a new man — you need a new best friend. Only the truly rotten would fling themselves at a friend's boyfriend.

She's also got to be pretty insecure to be wanting your boyfriends — either you really intimidate her or you have really good taste.

Lose the friend, keep the men. But get her back good and hard first — steal her boyfriend's underwear and leave it lying on your floor. Even the thin and cute are known to sweat sometimes.

Cassie

Local tribe triumphant in band battle

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

Again, our desperate local music scene got its thirst teased Thursday night with the second competition for $400 in the Battle of the Bands at Snookie's Bar.

Ken Snook, owner of Snookie's, began the seance of what is the reluctant resurrection of live music in Manhattan, hoping to stretch local bands in with our regional allies and expose the regenerating music scene in Aggieville.

The games began with Outhouse, a Kansas City band composed of Bill Latas on guitar and vocals, Shawn Poores on drums and Brad Gaddy on bass.

They described themselves as a sort of a "playdough factory that spews ground beef, poppies with fangs." They are just good ol' boys using their music as an outlet, something soft creating something hard, Latas said.

Manhattan's Blind Fly consumed the stage next with a mesmerizing and intimate dive into a mystic paradox of a grinding solace and an anchoring rage. Vocalist and bassist Lance Woodriff, guitarist Mike Whalen and drummer Danny Watkins made up the local band.

The Blind Fly musicians, who were 'disciples' of the band Phish, seemed almost spellbound by their own tangled mantras, like extracts from the astral plane. Woodriff grooved like a stoned angel with a bass. Blind Fly's compact disc will be available at On The Wildside and Streetside Records sometime in February.

They were followed by a Colombia, Mo., band known as The Cause. Bass guitarist John McHale, drummer Mike Turallo and guitarist Ubi produced a bit of a patchwork sound that was unpredictable and deceivingly erratic.

Turallo said the trio just quit all their jobs one day and went out on the road.

"We're really serious about this," Turallo said. "We're willing to play every night, starve and beg for gas money if that's what it takes."

The next band to hit the stage was Flux, which was made up of Lawrence natives Dave Buller on guitar, Jim Rood on bass, Brian Foltz on drums and vocalist Matt Gunnin.

Flux's strategic groove incorporated technicalities the band picked up in a more classical training in college.

"A lot of bands clone other bands, and then other bands clone those bands, and eventually it becomes like incest," Buller said. "You end up with some retarded children."

Ten Thumb interrupted the coasting grind with an explosive possessiveness that was the climax of the night. Guitarist Marty Robertson took command with a penetrating current of a sort of sensual riot. With bassist Dan Lee and drummer King Crawford, the local band corrupted the crowd with a violent charm and infectious venom.

Finally, Spine, also a local tribe, captivated the congregation and walked away with $400. Turbulent and untouchable, guitarist Doug Miner, vocalist Andy Sample, drummer Alan Keithley and bassist Dave Boomer enchanted the mosh pit with a sinister hostility. If freight trains could harmonize, the rush would resonate with their defiant litany.

On being a part of the rebirth of the foreign concept of a live-music scene, Boomer said, "Once there was something, then there was nothing, now there's a little bit of something coming back to Manhattan."

"Places just aren't willing to pay for it, and nobody can afford to play here," he said.

Snook will arrange another Battle in April with more money and a better digital recording. He hopes this will validate local musicians and encourage patron support.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

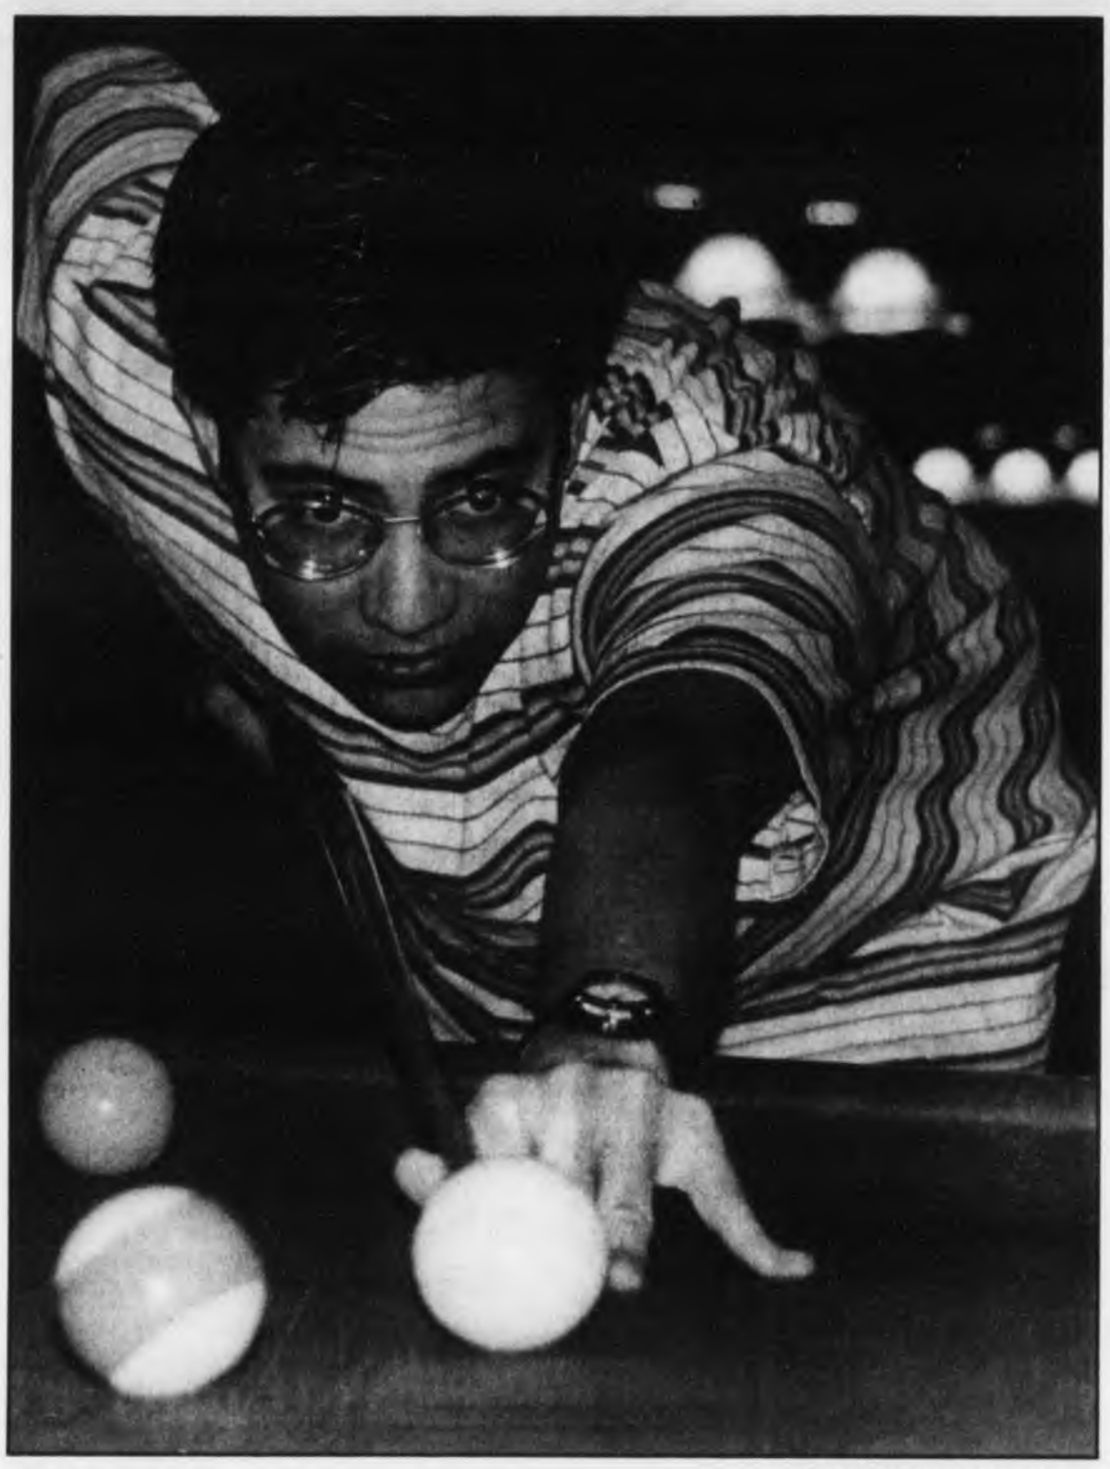
TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.



Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Motion to dismiss filed

which was communicated to K-State on March 12, 1994," the amended complaint stated.

In the answer to the amended complaint, K-State denied these allegations.

Before this time, Kresky had not received any type of disciplinary action at K-State.

A copy of the letter was sent to Dempsey and Renk.

Ross-Murray telephoned Kresky on May 19. She asked Kresky if she would consider moving to a different department to resolve the problem.

Kresky said she did not wish to move to another department and would consider such a move to be retaliatory, according to the amended suit.

The transfer did not involve a pay cut, Cheryl Strecker, assistant University attorney, said.

Kresky received a letter dated May 23, 1994, signed by Dempsey, Renk and Jerome Frieman, acting director of unclassified affirmative action at the time, stating they did not believe sexual harassment occurred.

The letter "stated their determination that the plaintiff's complaint to the Office of Affirmative Action did not allege facts which would constitute sexual harassment and stated their understanding that the plaintiff had agreed with that determination based on conversations they had had with the plaintiff," stated the answer to the amended complaint.

The amended complaint and answer disagree as to whether Kresky told Dempsey she understood the conclusion, but both the amended complaint and answer state that Kresky later told Dempsey the conclusion reached by the investigation was untrue.

Under K-State sexual harassment policy, Kresky did have the right to re-submit her complaint or report any problems that she felt were in response to her report of sexual harassment to an appropriate board within the University.

On June 16, Kresky received another letter of reprimand, this time from Henry concerning her actions from June 5 to June 14, according to the answer to the amended complaint.

"In his letter, Jack Henry falsely accused plaintiff, without any reasonable investigation, of using poor judgment and acting in a poor and unprofessional manner. Jack Henry then temporarily assigned plaintiff to a new job," according to the amended complaint.

K-State denied Henry had failed to reasonably investigate the matter and denied he had falsely accused Kresky, according to the answer to the amended complaint.

While on maternity leave Aug. 6, Kresky received a letter saying she would be moved to a new position upon her arrival back to work.

Kresky's suit claims this action was retaliatory.

Craig Altenhofen, Kresky's attorney, said the main issue in the suit is not so much the sexual harassment but how the University responded to the instances reported.

"She was moved, and not the person doing the harassing, and because she was moved, she was placed more in the eyes of the public, or in this case, the eyes of the faculty and her coworkers," Altenhofen said.

Strecker said the letter sent to Kresky from Henry was a result of conduct related to her employment.

"The letter of reprimand was not improper nor a violation of her rights, nor was it issued as a result of her filing a complaint," Strecker said.

Altenhofen said the sexual harassment portion of the suit is significant in that it prompted the complaint by Kresky that initially led to the lawsuit.

"The most troublesome aspect as far as the University is concerned is the response to the complaints and what was allowed," he said. "All employees are entitled to a good-faith complaint."

The K-State sexual harassment policy is not the problem, Altenhofen said.

"The policy, if handled correctly, is fine," he said.

Last week, in addition to filing an answer to the amended suit, the University filed a motion to dismiss.

"We're seeking to dismiss those parts of the complaint which fail to state a claim under the law or for which there's a jurisdictional defect," Strecker said.

Strecker said there are aspects in the case that have not been addressed.

"In an answer and a motion to dismiss, we've not come to the point in the case where we have the opportunity to explain the facts," Strecker said.

"It's just not at the procedural stage yet."

In addition to Strecker, Jennifer Kassebaum, senior assistant University attorney, is representing K-State.

Center helps complainants

Davis said the center also works with the Office of Affirmative Action and the dean of student life.

"I work as an advocate for the complainant," Davis said. "They can come to me, and I work for them to resolve the situation."

Howard said the number of reported cases of harassment does not indicate if a university has a problem or not.

"From what I've observed, K-State is no better or worse than other universities," Howard said. "I don't think it's better or worse by the number of cases, but it is how you deal with cases. I think that is the measure of a university's commitment.

"When I came here, I had a favorable perception that the University was willing to face these matters," he said.

A small number of complaints isn't necessarily a good sign, he said.

"What I look for is an environment that people can come forward in with their problems," Davis said. "I think K-State is better off than other universities. I don't know any other universities that have advocacy for complainants."

If a student, employee or faculty member has a complaint of harassment, they need to report it to the Office of Affirmative Action, the Women's Resource Center or the office of the dean of student life.

"We need to try minimize reoccurrence and encourage people to come forward," Howard said.

"The number of people who come forward proves that people believe the situation will be resolved."

education to students at risk," Hamilton said.

These programs are weekend and after-school programs.

"Arts and craft skills can help the kids relate and gain confidence in the math and social science skill areas," Hamilton said.

The center will provide space for them until they can get their own area. Funding for the center has been made possible through many sources. The city of Manhattan provided a $150,000 grant, and $40,000 came in grants from the Kansas Arts Commission.

"Additional funds have been attained from local patrons of the arts, both private and business. Many hundreds of hours of volunteer work have been donated to help save thousands of dollars on construction costs," Biggs said.

The anticipated date of completion could be anywhere from 30 months to three years. There will be a campaign in the late spring to help raise money to finish the center.

Biggs said there are many partners working for the development of the arts center, including Arts Center Corporation, Manhattan Arts Council, Manhattan Civic Theatre, Clay Coalition and Wonder Workshop Children's Museum.

The theater will be used for the first time Friday when the Manhattan Civic Theatre presents "A Dining Room."

"That's the amazing thing; He does remember the attack," Reeves said. "He said they drove up in a car, came up to him, and he didn't know what they wanted.

"Then they started hitting him, and they hit him and hit him and hit him."

Chris is now at the Kansas Rehabilitation Hospital, where he will undergo evaluations this week. He is expected to make a full recovery.

"All of his physical wounds and bruises are looking much better," Ron Reeves said.

Ron Reeves said he talked to the prosecuting attorney and there is no doubt the attackers will be put in jail.

Reeves said he was pleased with the way the Riley County Police Department handled the case.

"I'm in awe of the police department. They were like bulldogs on this case — hounding everybody until someone gave in, and they finally got them."

Class rules change

Speech class no longer graded by attendance only

CARRIE COX
Collegian

Speech 210, forensics participation, allows student senators to receive a grade for academic credit.

Now, Clayton Wheeler, Student Senate chair, said he has changed the way grades will be given.

"Before, everything was based on attendance, meaning if you show up, you get an A. In past semesters, everyone got an A because they met the requirements," Wheeler said.

Wheeler, who is responsible for assessing grades, said that restructuring the class is something he wanted to do last semester, but he never got around to doing it.

This semester's grading structure is based on attendance of Senate meetings, committee meetings, office hours and two group visitations, Wheeler said.

Twenty-five percent of the grade is attendance at Senate meetings and office hours; 25 percent is participation at committee meetings; and 50 percent is based on visitations.

Wheeler prepared a syllabus for senators enrolled in the class to let them know how they will be graded.

"They get three unexcused absences. If they have more than that, we'll impeach them," Wheeler said.

Tricia Nolfi, coordinator of student activities, said she thinks the restructuring is a step in the right direction.

"Right now, it's not a class in my opinion," Nolfi said. "Clayton has done his best to impose requirements. He's put his foot down, and said they should meet certain expectations."

New pill to help people stay sober

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

A new pill, taken once a day, may help recovering alcoholics stay sober.

According to the product announcement released by Du Pont Merck, the company that produces the drug, ReVia (naltrexone HCl) blocks the binding of opioids, which are neurotransmitters that are released in the brain while drinking.

Opioids binding to receptors in the brain are believed to cause the reaction that addicts a person to alcohol. The reaction is called a positive effect.

Manager of Public Affairs Laura Mastrangelo, said, "If you relapse during treatment, ReVia blocks these receptors so there can be no binding of the opioids and no positive effects."

ReVia is also supposed to reduce the craving for alcohol and increase the length of abstinence.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and drug education at University Counseling Services, said, "I've heard from doctors that it's effective for some, but not all. It is not to be taken as the cure. There is no hard evidence that it works."

Do students at K-State have a problem with alcohol dependency?

"Not many students here are alcoholics. There are a few recovering and a small percentage who need help. There are some who have problems with episodic or binge drinking," Arck said.

According to a voluntary, anonymous survey taken by K-State students, 94 percent of student body has had at least one drink during the past year. Forty-two percent of the respondents drink an average of one to three times a week.

Speaker rethinks Medicare

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Newt Gingrich called for the creation of a task force to rethink Medicare from the ground up as he laid out his health-care agenda in a speech Monday to the American Hospital Association.

"The current, highly centralized, bureaucratic structure, offering one menu for everybody in a monopolistic manner, is the opposite of how America works," Gingrich, R-Ga., said of Medicare. "And so we need to start from the senior citizens, with their help, thinking through how we get to a better Medicare system that actually works more effectively."

Gingrich said he would cull the task force from senior citizen groups, the hospital association and medical societies.

"We have to set up a truly revolutionary task force to think about the world without the Health Care Finance Administration," he said, evoking laughter and applause. HCFA is the federal agency that administers Medicare, the government's health-insurance program for the elderly.

"We are going to rethink Medicare from the ground up," Gingrich said. "It's not just a question of saying what's wrong with the current structure. It's a question of thinking through at the vision and strategy level what might be right about the replacement."

Martin Corry, director of federal affairs for the American Association of Retired Persons, said his group is ready to discuss the future of Medicare, but it's going to be difficult to have a fruitful dialogue if facing large cuts in Medicare's budget. Corry also called it premature to talk about abolishing HCFA.

"HCFA, for all the brickbats it takes, is pretty efficient," he said. "Any replacement administrative structure must be at least as good."

After the speech, Gingrich told reporters he is not advocating abolishing Medicare or even turning it over to the states.

"I want to keep Medicare. I want to keep the goals of Medicare," he said. "But I want to transform it to give senior citizens choices, to give them a range of options,

Bicknell recommended by committee

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Senate Education Committee recommended Monday that Pittsburg businessman Gene Bicknell be confirmed as a member of the Kansas Board of Regents.

However, three Republicans on the committee voted against the motion to recommend confirmation; a fourth abstained from voting; and rumors persisted that his appointment by former Gov. Joan Finney is in jeopardy.

The reason is Bicknell, a Republican, endorsed Democrat Jim Slattery for governor over Bill Graves in the 1994 governor's race after Bicknell lost the GOP nomination to Graves in the primary election. It was the second time Bicknell has tried unsuccessfully for the GOP nomination.

No one spoke against the motion to recommend confirmation, but the silence of the three Republicans who voted against the motion and the one who did not vote was ominous for Bicknell.

Voting against confirmation were Sens. Audrey Langworthy of Prairie Village, chairwoman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee; David Corbin of Towanda, chairman of the Agriculture Committee; and Lana Oleen of Manhattan, chairwoman of the Federal and State Affairs Committee.

Sen. Tim Emert of Independence, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, did not vote.

Sen. Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, who was Bicknell's lieutenant governor running mate, made the motion to recommend confirmation, and Sen. Doug Walker, D-Osawatomie, seconded the motion.

Only Republicans voting for Bicknell were Lawrence and Sen. Nancey Harrington of Clearwater.

Committee Chairman Dave Kerr of Hutchinson, also a Republican, did not vote. As a rule, committee chairmen do not vote unless their votes are needed to break ties.

A significant year in the history of the United States and in African American history was 1895.

Freeman Davis, adviser of the national Black Pan-Hellenic Council, said that was the year Fredrick Douglass died, W.E.B. DuBois became the first person of African descent to receive a Ph.D. from Harvard, and Booker T. Washington delivered his famous "Atlanta" speech.

These three historical and influential figures tie the theme of Black History Month together: "Reflections of 1895: Douglass, DuBois and Washington."

Black History Month begins Wednesday and ends Feb. 28.

"The goal of Black History Month is to bring all African American organizations on campus together," said Jawwad Abdulhaqq, sophomore in political science and president of Black Student Union.

Abdulhaqq said there are many events planned to help in the celebration of black history and heritage.

A videoconference, "Beyond the Dream VII: The Vanishing Black Male, Saving Our Sons," is scheduled to begin at noon Wednesday in the Bluemont Hall Media Center.

During the videoconference, prominent African Americans will discuss promoting a positive image of African American males and how to reduce violence and economic disparity among that group, Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs, said.

Panel members scheduled include Julianne Malveaux, journalist and columnist; the Rev. Al Sharpton, political activist; and Spencer Holland, president of Project 2000 Inc.

Marilyn Kern-Foxworth, associate professor of journalism at Texas A&M University, will give opening remarks at the kickoff luncheon. The luncheon will

▶ KANSAS SENATE STALLS HOUSE BILL BECAUSE OF TAX AMENDMENTS

TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate on Monday rejected House amendments to a tax-cut bill, sending the measure to a joint conference committee.

The bill started out as the Senate's effort to repeal two 2.5-percent sales taxes on labor services for new construction and on utilities used by factories.

But the House loaded the bill up with additional tax breaks, including amendments to remove the sales tax from remodeling and car-repair services.

House members also increased the rebate low-income families receive for the sales taxes they pay on food and exempted Girl Scout cookies.

The Senate's action came on a voice vote. Senate and House negotiators will attempt to work out a compromise version.

Appointed to the committee were Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, chairwoman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee; Sen. David Corbin, R-Towanda, the committee's vice chairman, and Sen. Phil Martin, D-Pittsburg, its ranking minority party member.

The House's members have yet to be appointed.

So far this session, the bill has become the focal point of legislators' efforts to cut taxes, which many see as a mandate from the Nov. 8 election. Six bills to reduce motor vehicle taxes also have been introduced.

It appeared the tax-repeal bill was going to slide through the Legislature and get to Gov. Bill Graves' desk early until the House amended the measure. The House amendments make quick passage of the measure unlikely.

"I was disappointed we could not get this issue behind us," Langworthy said. "It seemed like an issue we could have gotten out of the way."

The Senate wanted to repeal only the energy and new construction taxes. Its version of the bill cost the state treasury about $31 million annually.

Senate Republicans beat back two attempts by Democrats to amend the measure that would repeal the state's 4.9-percent tax on remodeling services.

The House, however, amended the bill to repeal the tax on remodeling houses and businesses, which comes to $26 million.

The repeal of the vehicle-repair services sales tax would cost between $30 million and $50 million.

All in all, the House amendments increased the cuts in the measure to as much as $110 million.

"It's an enthusiastic wish list," Langworthy said. "We just have to see where we can find the money."

Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, said the House is serious about cutting taxes.

"I don't anticipate the House moving from its position," Kline said. "Essentially, I have to see what the Senate presents us. They're going to have to come up with something."

▶ GRASSROOTS GROUPS JOIN TO FIGHT FEDERAL UNFUNDED MANDATES

TOPEKA (AP) — Two groups joined the fight against unfunded mandates.

United We Stand and the 10th Amendment Society asked the House Federal and State Affairs Committee Monday to stop what they called the tyranny of the federal government.

"Some people believe it's already too late, that federal usurpations have turned once-sovereign states into colonies, and a once free and proud people into villains and serfs of a feudal government," said John A. Michael, a member of United We Stand America of Kansas.

United We Stand is the political group best known for its association with independent candidate Ross Perot's 1992 presidential campaign.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, encouraged the committee to support a concurrent resolution asking Congress to stop imposing unfunded mandates on states beyond the scope of the 10th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The 10th Amendment grants states and the people powers not delegated to the federal government. If adopted, copies of the resolution would be sent to congressional leaders, the president and other state governments.

U.S. Sens. Nancy Kassebaum and Bob Dole support federal legislation that would sharply limit Congress' ability to impose mandates on the states. The bill has passed the Senate.

A bill in the Senate Local Government Committee would limit the state's ability to impose unfunded mandates on local units of government.

But Rep. Steve Lloyd, R-Clay Center, asked how the House resolution would affect civil-rights and environmental mandates. He reminded the committee that abolishing slavery was an unpopular mandate with many states.

Rep. Kenneth King, R-Leon, a supporter of the resolution, said the democratic process would distinguish between necessary and unnecessary mandates.

When Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, wondered whether states could be trusted with increased powers, King said state government was closer to the people and knew what was best for its constituents.

For Harold Stocking, a member of the committee to Restore the Constitution and co-chairman of the 10th Amendment Society, the question was whether the federal government could be trusted.

"Tens of thousands of Americans are forming armed militia units to protect their homes and loved ones from those warriors of the dark side who seek to enslave them into their evil empire," Stocking said.

Rep. Sabrina Standifer, D-Wichita, said the 10th Amendment Society supports ending mandates such as the Clean Water Act and the Americans With Disabilities Act, both of which she supports.

Glasscock said he had received information from the two groups advocating states' rights, but they did not help draft the resolution.

But Rep. Jene Vickrey said he thought the two groups were not as on the fringe as some thought. He thought they voiced the opinions of many Americans fed up with a growing federal government.

There were no opponents to the resolution.

Mortar Board sponsors high-school decathlon

LINDA HARVEY
Collegian

Students from more than 20 Kansas high schools gave up their weekend to compete in the K-State-sponsored Kansas Academic Decathlon.

Organized by the K-State chapter of Mortar Board Senior Honorary, the decathlon brought together students of varying grade levels to compete for the title of state champ. Students competed only against those of the same academic grade level.

For the third consecutive year, Shawnee Mission East High School was named state champion. The team will go on to represent Kansas at the U.S. Academic Decathlon in New Jersey.

Ten events made up the competition, including written tests, essay, speech and interview sections. Test topics ranged from math to social studies.

"The hardest part was sitting in the same chair for five hours during the written tests," Mitch Jones, a junior at Bonner Springs High School, said.

Students also competed in Super Quiz at the end of the written competition. Most of the questions generated around the themes of genetics and health-related issues.

"The overall theme was especially hard," Jake Bukaty, senior from Bonner Springs High School, said.

Teams were also required to present a spirit cheer at the end of the Super Quiz.

"It broke the stereotype of the typical high-academic student," Benita Holder, Bonner Springs and Bishop Ward High School coach, said. "These kids weren't quiet."

For Shawnee Mission North High School, this was their first year in the competition. The team specifically had the intention of coming back from the competition closer than when they arrived.

"We came as a team, but we left as a family," Chris Cottini, junior and team captain for Shawnee Mission North's squad, said.

Though there have been National Academic Decathlon competitions since 1968, this is only Kansas' and K-State's fourth year being host to a statewide contest.

Jenni Meek, senior in journalism and mass communications and chairwoman for the event, said Pat Bosco, vice president for Institutional Advancement, asked her to set up the decathlon.

"Pat Bosco approached me in March last year and asked me about taking it on," Meek said. "I felt like it was a great opportunity for K-State. I want to do anything I can to promote K-State, so that's why I volunteered to do this."

Altogether, 35 members of Mortar Board helped in the coordination of the decathlon. Ten committees were set up and have spent the last nine months preparing for this event.

Members of the Chimes Junior Honorary assisted Mortar Board by acting as proctors and time keepers during the weekend event.

Other than having to pull a student out of a written test due to a death in their family, Meek said that the decathlon was an amazing success.

"It really did go according to plan. I can't think of any major problems," Meek said.

"I think everyone left with a good feeling. Mortar Board put in 110 percent, gave up personal time, and it all came together this weekend."

Originally a senior women's honorary, Mortar Board now selects women and men during the spring of their junior year who are ranked in the upper 35 percent of their class.

Waiting to buy may not save you money later

WADE ANDERSON
Collegian

It might be easier to forecast daily changes in the New York Stock Exchange than to know when it's the best time to buy a computer.

Tom Maier, computer buyer for the K-State Union Bookstore, said the biggest question people ask when buying a computer is whether to wait or buy now.

Maier said people will likely need to buy a computer about every four years.

"They're suggesting people determine their needs for the next two or three years," Maier said.

He said to look at buying a computer the same way you buy a car.

"Computer technology is always changing," said Jennifer Spencer, Union Bookstore computer sales associate.

The longer you wait for the prices of pentium computers and Power PCs to drop, the older their technology gets, Spencer said.

The deciding factor in buying a computer should be if you want one, she said.

Spencer said the main reason students at K-State buy computers is for their convenience.

"It's more convenient to have a computer at home instead of having to go to one of the labs," Spencer said.

There are several different places and ways to buy a computer. Mail ordering is the most common.

Maier said he estimates that there are about 10 times more mail orders than local sales, except for Apple computers.

Mail-order companies' names include everything from Acer to Zeos. Gateway and Dell are also common names in the computer mail-order business.

"Gateway is rated A across the board," said Marc Nuessen, junior in computer engineering, referring to a report in a recent computer magazine.

Nuessen is also a programmer for the Center for Faculty Evaluation and Developing.

Nuessen and Spencer both offered advice about buying a computer.

Nuessen, who purchased a computer 1-1/2 months ago for $6,5000 after state discounts for his department, said to look for the technical support that is offered and look through computer magazines for things like reliability rating.

> "It's more convenient to have a computer at home instead of having to go to one of the labs."
> JENNIFER SPENCER
> Union Bookstore computer sales associate

Spencer said you need to look at what the computer is going to be used for, its expansion capabilities and its price.

Both Nuessen and Spencer said one should take about two weeks in deciding what computer to buy.

Troy Wilson, service technician for Flint Hills Computers, said the Acer 486 DX2 was their most popular system.

Flint Hills Computers prices the Acer 486 at $1,429.

Spencer said she would most likely buy a Macintosh because she thought they were easier to use overall.

She said the Power PC Performa 6115 is one of the Union Bookstore's most popular machines.

The 6115 is regularly priced at $2,599 in the Union Bookstore.

Maier said he's seeing more companies offer computer packages. The IBM Aptiva is an example of this.

"The computer itself is bundled with a monitor, keyboard, modem and preloaded software," he said.

He also said Apple, Compaq, Hewlett-Packard and Packard-Bell offer bundled packages.

If given $2,500 to replace his old 386 computer he bought in 1993, Nuessen said he would buy a 75 MHz pentium with a 15-inch super VGA monitor and a sound card. It would have a double-spin CD-ROM and 16 MB of RAM. A 420 hard drive would top his purchase off.

When asked what was the one thing he would not part with, he said the pentium.

"A pentium is so much faster than the DX4. It's insane," Nuessen said.

IN OUR OPINION

Getting class credit means doing more than the job

To get the extra benefit of class credit, senators need to do more than they were originally elected for.

People who meet all the requirements for a class deserve an A.

But what about extracurricular activities?

Take into consideration the one-hour credit student senators can earn for a term in Student Senate.

The optional class credit is based on 25-percent attendance, 25-percent committee participation and 50-percent visitations.

Senate deserves a thumbs-up for changing the requirements, which was once based 100 percent on attendance. It's good that has changed.

But senators are still earning credit for simply doing their jobs.

What would be more fair is if the senators had to do more than their job in order to earn the credit for Senate.

We suggest senators who want the hour of credit write a certain number of letters to constituents in their college, visit the Kansas Legislature for a day or spend a specified amount of time with a Senate mentor.

To get the extra benefit of class credit, senators do need to do more than they were originally elected for.

But if not, we'd bet that Union Program Council chairpersons, residence hall board members and some other campus leaders would like to cut a deal with the speech department.

Stop potential closing of Head Start

SHANE KEYSER

GUEST COLUMN

If an education program existed that helped parents become better parents and increased the chance of a child's academic success, a person might think that it would be a good thing and a long time in coming.

I have news for you: A program like this does exist. Believe it or not, we, as taxpayers, help fund it. However, it may not be around next year.

Allow me to explain.

The program is Head Start. It was started in the mid-1960s by a group of people concerned with children's education.

In fact, in spring 1966, a group of parents, teachers, and children from Mississippi traveled to Washington, D.C., and held class in front of Congress. All of the senators and representatives present witnessed a group of children ages 3 to 5 singing and learning together.

That group made a difference. It allowed Head Start to continue.

But that was 30 years ago. Now Uncle Bob and his friends up in Washington, D.C., are looking to completely restructure the way Head Start functions.

What Congress wants to do is channel the funds by means of more Block Grants through the states' governments. Making Head Start funds take the form of Block Grants would allow the state bureaucracies to grow and in the long run use more money.

Basically, it would put Head Start in the same category as day care — but Head Start is anything but a day care. The funds budgeted for Head Start go to help underprivileged preschool-age children get, just like the name says, a head start.

It is a program that will lay the groundwork for teaching a child to read, play and cooperate with other children. It is a place where children learn how to take better care of themselves.

Head Start also helps parents. Through various workshops, parents can learn how to read to their children. It tells parents how important reading is to their kids and their futures. Head Start also lets parents know where they can go to get help.

What a concept!

OK, yeah, so what. A bunch of snot-nosed toddlers are learning to read at our expense. Good riddance, you might say. Why should I care?

I had the same attitude once upon a time. I thought that everyone on public assistance was a leech. I thought that people on welfare were the scum of the earth.

I never thought in my lifetime that I or my family would be so low that we would wind up receiving any kind of governmental assistance.

I had it all figured out, until one day in my happy life I found out I was going to be someone's Daddy.

Before anyone jumps to any conclusions (provided you haven't already) let me set the record straight.

I had a condom with spermicide. She had a spermicide. We thought we were safe. We were both surprised and shocked.

We both had promising futures. All of the sudden, we were faced with a lot of difficult, life-changing choices to make.

We decided to get married, have the baby and continue on with our educations. At the time, I was a freshman at a community college, and she was just graduating from high school.

Both of our parents were and still are very supportive. But support doesn't put food on the table or pay the doctor bills..

For a long time, I wrestled with the idea of going on WIC and Food Stamps. I hated the thought of being a welfare family.

I yelled and cried a lot every time the idea was suggested, but finally came to face the hard reality that we would not be able to survive without it.

Walking into the SRS office for the first time was one of the toughest things my wife and I had to do.

We both had to deal with a great loss of pride and self-respect.

Since that time, I have learned and grown in leaps and bounds.

I have come to realize what programs like Head Start are all about. I have experienced it firsthand.

It is really easy at the end of a long stressful day to plug a cartoon in the VCR instead of taking a little time out to read or play with our son. But you wouldn't believe the difference it makes in all of our lives.

I have watched my little boy go from struggling through his ABCs and 1-2-3s to spelling his name, recognizing words, writing his first and last name and doing simple mathematics in just a year and a half.

There are a lot of people like KimBerly and myself in and around K-State.

Odds are some of them are in your classes or volunteer themselves at Head Start.

I know that KimBerly and I could not have done as good of a job preparing our son for his education on our own without Head Start.

We were lucky enough to receive a lot of support and encouragement from the people inside a little brick building out on Kimball Avenue.

You should drive by and take a look and witness the little miracles that happen there every day.

It's just about a block away from the football and basketball stadiums.

In fact, they love visitors out there. If you show up more than once, you will find a whole bunch of happy little faces willing to take time out of their day to show you around the classroom and share their lunch.

Pretty cool, huh?

Now let me remind you of some folks up in Washington who are wanting to change all of this because they think that their constituents think that it is too much of a financial burden.

What we need to do is tell them that it is not. We need to tell them that kids need a chance to learn.

And all it would take would be a phone call, or even better yet, a few pieces of paper, a pen, an envelope and 32 cents.

There is a catch. All the letter-writing and phone-calling needs to happen within the next week.

President Clinton is getting ready to announce his budget, and Congress is getting ready to vote on it.

Your letter could be the one that makes the difference.

You could save a 30-year program that makes a difference.

Hitting the bottle solves nothing

ERIN MANSUR-SMITH

What may seem like just a way to "loosen up" in a party might be the first step in a road you'll have to stumble down the rest of your life.

I am sorry to say that I got into a fight on Friday night. It was with a nemesis I have had for a long time and have clashed with often and violently over the past six years.

It was stupid of me. I've almost always managed to avoid a direct confrontation between us in the past, using a bit of wit and sometimes just brute strength to fend him off.

But this time I wasn't so lucky. I wasn't so smart.

My "opponent" was a pint of Southern Comfort. I downed a whole bottle in a little more than an hour. Straight.

When I started drinking from that bottle, I didn't just lose one battle. I lost a six-year war.

I haven't been that drunk since I was a freshman, back in the days when my three best friends were named Jack, Johnnie and Jim, and the hairy-lipped commode was my altar of choice. Some of you might know what I am talking about. You might remember similar times and circumstances. (For some of you, they might have been yesterday.)

For me, those were the days when drinking was the way to make friends and to ease the loneliness and anxiety of being a new student (or being an old student).

Of course, it was also the way to celebrate everything from getting an A on an exam to the anniversary of the making of toilet paper.

I thought drinking made me strong. Chronically shy and frequently claustrophobic at the smallest party, it made me feel attractive and grown-up. I thought it made me a good student and a better friend. What it really made me was the best of alcoholics.

According to a Gallup poll, 80 percent of college graduates say they have consumed an alcoholic beverage in their lives. In an independent and anonymous survey on alcohol consumption done here at K-State, 32 percent of 400 students said they had anywhere from one to three drinks weekly.

Now, not all of the people who participated in this survey have drinking problems. But this is a hard disease to get hard facts and figures on, because it relies so much on people doing a serious self-diagnosis of both their lifestyle and their greatest insecurities. Climbing Mount Fuji might appear easier in comparison.

Still, everyone should take a good look at themselves and their drinking habits. Although alcoholism may have dropped off in the news and as a worldwide concern, it is still as prevalent today as is was in the past. It is still a drug and is still extremely habit-forming.

Look at why you drink, who you drink with when you do it. What makes an alcoholic is not just a physical addiction to the drug. That is only a fraction of it.

What makes an alcoholic is behavior. It is turning to drink as a solution to problems or as a crutch to deal with them.

What may seem like just a way to "loosen up" in a party might be the first step in a road you'll have to stumble down for the rest of your life.

Most of us know alcoholics aren't bums on the streets or burned-out executives and disintegrating artists. But it may be damned near impossible for us to see ourselves, our roommates or our friends as being addicted to something like beer.

They are. And they aren't just students, they are also our professors and our custodians and our librarians.

We need to watch out for each other. We need to watch ourselves.

I don't know why I started drinking on Friday. I won't insult your intelligence and my own by saying that it "just happened." When you have been trying to be sober for more than six years, "just happened" doesn't.

And I can't promise I won't ever do it again. I can begin climbing the mountain all over again.

▶ MULTICULTURALISM

Columnist needs open mind

Dear editor,

The Collegian not only is a better paper this semester, but it has one more reader: me. This is mainly because of the discussion of multiculturalism you have boldly dived into — a courageous thing. Thank you.

Next, I'd like to take some time and barf. I'm hurling all over John Hart's interpretation of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s "dream" from Jan. 19. Dr. King wanted a loving society, not a monocultural one. If Hart has ever grown as a person, he would understand that the more points of view a person has, the greater understanding one has. This idea is what creates great societies (but in my lifetime, I have only seen it create great individuals).

But Hart wrote a column about how this idea isn't right, and that is why I have to vomit. I get sick when I read that there should be an elite set of morals and values. It turns my stomach to think of only one right way to do things.

Dr. King starts out part of his "I Have a Dream" speech by remembering Abraham Lincoln and his Emancipation Proclamation. President Lincoln didn't think that slavery was the "one" right thing to do, so he revolted and changed the law, both on paper and in many people's minds. People are dying in Chechnya because Chechens don't want to live under the "one" right way of Boris Yeltsin. The Middle East has had conflict since the Crusades because of a lack of multicultural thoughts. (Dr. King called this hardmindedness.) The Arabs are right! No, the Palestinians! Hey, you're wrong — we'll kill you! Ad nauseam.

The lack of other cultures' knowledge does not stop at different religions or countries; it stops at individuals. Every person is different, and understanding a person is what Dr. King helped me learn about love.

Love is not a vague, romantic thing. It is what results in the knowledge, understanding and experience of other cultures.

This idea is definitely on the keychain of life, if there ever is one.

Mr. Hart is wrong to separate spiritual and intellectual issues. That is like trying to find the border between green and blue, or the mind and the body. Whatever the contrasts, they are beautifully combined. Imagine the color of our school, purple. Purple is its own color because of the combination of red and blue, not a piece of red and a piece of blue. All of these binary contrasts have infinite possibilities on each side. These variations create a balance.

By balancing information on cultures, ignorance disappears, and understanding results.

▶ PARKING

Survey was pointless

Dear editor,

I'd like a chance to respond to a few things mentioned about parking in the Jan. 18 edition of the Collegian.

First, the Collegian Editorial Board basically said that we as students dropped the ball by not returning all of the parking surveys.

I never got one.

I had nothing to do with choosing the people who did get them. Obviously, not all of the people that were selected were interested in representing the student body.

I'm glad to see that two months were wasted in the process. That just reaffirms my confidence in the powers-that-be on campus. Just out of curiosity, has anyone ever heard of a campus vote? That would have been a little more representative. It also wouldn't have wasted two perfectly good months.

Sure there are probably some associated expenses, but I'm sure the surveys had plenty of associated costs (printing, stamps, compilation, etc.).

On that note, what is this about disregarding the results as not being valid? There wasn't a clear enough majority? Could someone please define majority for those of us who still think that it's the highest number out of a group of numbers that are being compared?

"In summary, we don't have a serious parking problem, just seriously lazy people."
SHAWN HARRIS
junior electrical engineering

I guess this shouldn't come as a surprise.

The trend over the past few years has been to ask the student body for input and then blatantly disregard our opinions.

Does anybody remember the vote to remodel the Union? How about the second vote for the Rec Complex expansion? The first results were valid.

Did everybody get a chance to vote for governor this year? A few of you didn't notice the election? Maybe we should call Gov. Graves and see if we can throw that election out and have another one.

The Collegian Editorial Board also made a comment about "all the griping going on. ..." Did anybody stop to think that maybe the people who didn't return the surveys just don't think this issue is worth their time because it's not really that big of a problem? I don't see the problem. I can drive into campus any day of the week at any time I want and find a parking spot. I've been doing it for a few years now.

I do have to walk a little to get to class sometimes, but walking usually takes me less time than the people who sit in their cars for an eternity waiting for a spot a few feet closer to class.

In summary, we don't have a serious parking problem, just seriously lazy people.

Student Senate and K-State administration, if you don't care about our opinions, then don't ask.

If you do ask, though, try listening next time.

This is a blanket statement, not just for the occasions when our opinions conveniently coincide with yours.

Cats still have a chance to make the big dance

The Big Eight Conference isn't exactly welcoming first-year coach Tom Asbury with open arms.

The conference has extended a warm greeting in the form of five losses, two wins and a seventh-place standing at the midway point of the season.

Asbury's first K-State team is young and inexperienced. That much is visible.

Couple the youth with a talent-heavy, seasoned league, and you have Asbury and the Wildcats on the bottom looking up. No big surprise.

But, hey, considering the Cats' last five conference foes have all carried a top-25 ranking, things aren't as dismal as they may appear. K-State even beat one of those five — No. 25 Oklahoma — by 10 points.

As if it hasn't been strenuous enough, K-State will play No. 16 Missouri at home next and then No. 24 Oklahoma at Norman — seven straight ranked teams.

In the four losses — at Missouri, at Kansas and both home and away against Iowa State — K-State was a near-winner. The Cats lost all four by a total of 24 points, the worst being an 87-79 loss at No. 11 Iowa State.

So, what's the problem? Why can't K-State show the tenacity and poise to win the close ball games?

It starts with the Fountain of Youth.

The Wildcats had four of their 11 players play in Bramlage Coliseum for the first time this year — two community college transfers and two freshman.

All but two of the seven that returned — seniors Demond Davis and Belvis Noland — played less than 12 minutes a game in the conference last season.

Another sign of a young team is its home and away record.

K-State sports a 2-1 league record in the friendly confines of Bramlage Coliseum, while losing all four on the road.

"We're a young team, and we're going to get bit," said point guard Elliot Hatcher, one of the rookies for the Wildcats.

Basically, Asbury was handed a group of pups who were pushed into a lot of overgrown, foaming-at-the-mouth pit bulls and told "good luck."

Gee, thanks.

But K-State, though on the losing end of most league games, has been holding its ground.

The naivete of these new kids in the Big Eight took a backseat when the Wildcats easily defeated the Sooners, 87-77. K-State shot 55.8 percent from the floor and missed just seven of 32 free throws en route to its second league win.

And the Wildcats were on their way to a victory at Hilton Coliseum, up by 10 in the first half against the Cyclones, until inexperience surfaced again.

Iowa State's veteran senior trio — Fred Hoiberg, Loren Meyer and Julius Michalik — combined for almost 75 percent of the Cyclone's scoring.

Once again, experience prevailed.

"We can play with anybody, and we can beat anybody," Asbury said. "Now, we just have to start doing it."

OK. So far, we have established that the Wildcats are talented but young. The question is, can K-State mature enough to make anything happen at the end of the season?

"We all know we're a good team," Hatcher said after the win against Oklahoma. "We can play with anybody. Everybody's talking about going to the tournament.

"Not the NIT, the NCAA Tournament. They know we have the talent. It's just doing it."

There is only one way the Wildcats will land in the 64-team field in March: win the Big Eight Tournament.

The Wildcats' remaining schedule — Missouri, at Oklahoma, at Colorado, Kansas, at Oklahoma State, Nebraska and Colorado — will produce a final league record of 5-9, with losses at Oklahoma, Oklahoma State, Colorado and at home to Kansas.

Because of its youth and abundant experience elsewhere in the conference, K-State probably won't win on the road this season. The Jayhawks will win at Bramlage because they've never lost here and they're a final-four team.

If the above scenario unfolds, the Wildcats would own a 16-17 record before the Big Eight Tournament in Kansas City, Mo.

The Cats' last trip to the NCAA Tournament was in 1993. That year, they advanced to the finals of the Big Eight Tournament by beating Nebraska (a team they split with in the regular season) and Kansas (a team that beat them twice in the regular season).

Playing seven ranked teams back, to back, to back, to back, to back, to back, to back will force this group of Wildcats to grow up in a hurry, especially if they continue to play in close games.

"That is a very resilient group," Iowa State coach Tim Floyd said of K-State.

And with the arrival of the Big Eight Tournament might come the arrival of a Wildcat team ready to bite back.

▶ COACHES

Cats' effort gains them respect

TODD STEWART
Collegian

After a split last week against ranked teams, K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury said he is pleased with his team's play.

"I thought we played extremely well against Oklahoma," Asbury said. "Probably as well as our team can play."

Asbury said he thinks the good play of late is a direct result of effort.

"They've been giving me all they've got," he said.

Iowa State coach Tim Floyd said he was also impressed by the Wildcats, who lost to his Cyclones 87-79 Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

"We had a real hard time stopping K-State," Floyd said.

Floyd said his team refused to overlook the Cats, even after defeating them on their home court.

"The K-State game we expected the worse because we felt we were very fortunate in Manhattan," Floyd said.

Up next for the 11-8 Cats are the Missouri Tigers, who played Iowa State Monday night on national television. National television and the Big Eight Conference are becoming almost synonymous.

On Saturday the Big Eight front-runner Kansas Jayhawks stunned lone Division I unbeaten Connecticut 88-59 at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

"I thought it was a heck of an effort," Kansas coach Roy Williams said, signaling out his point guard Jacque Vaughn's ability to break the UConn press as a key factor in the game. "I thought Jacque was sensational against it."

Williams also said his team caught UConn at the right time, a time when they just didn't play well.

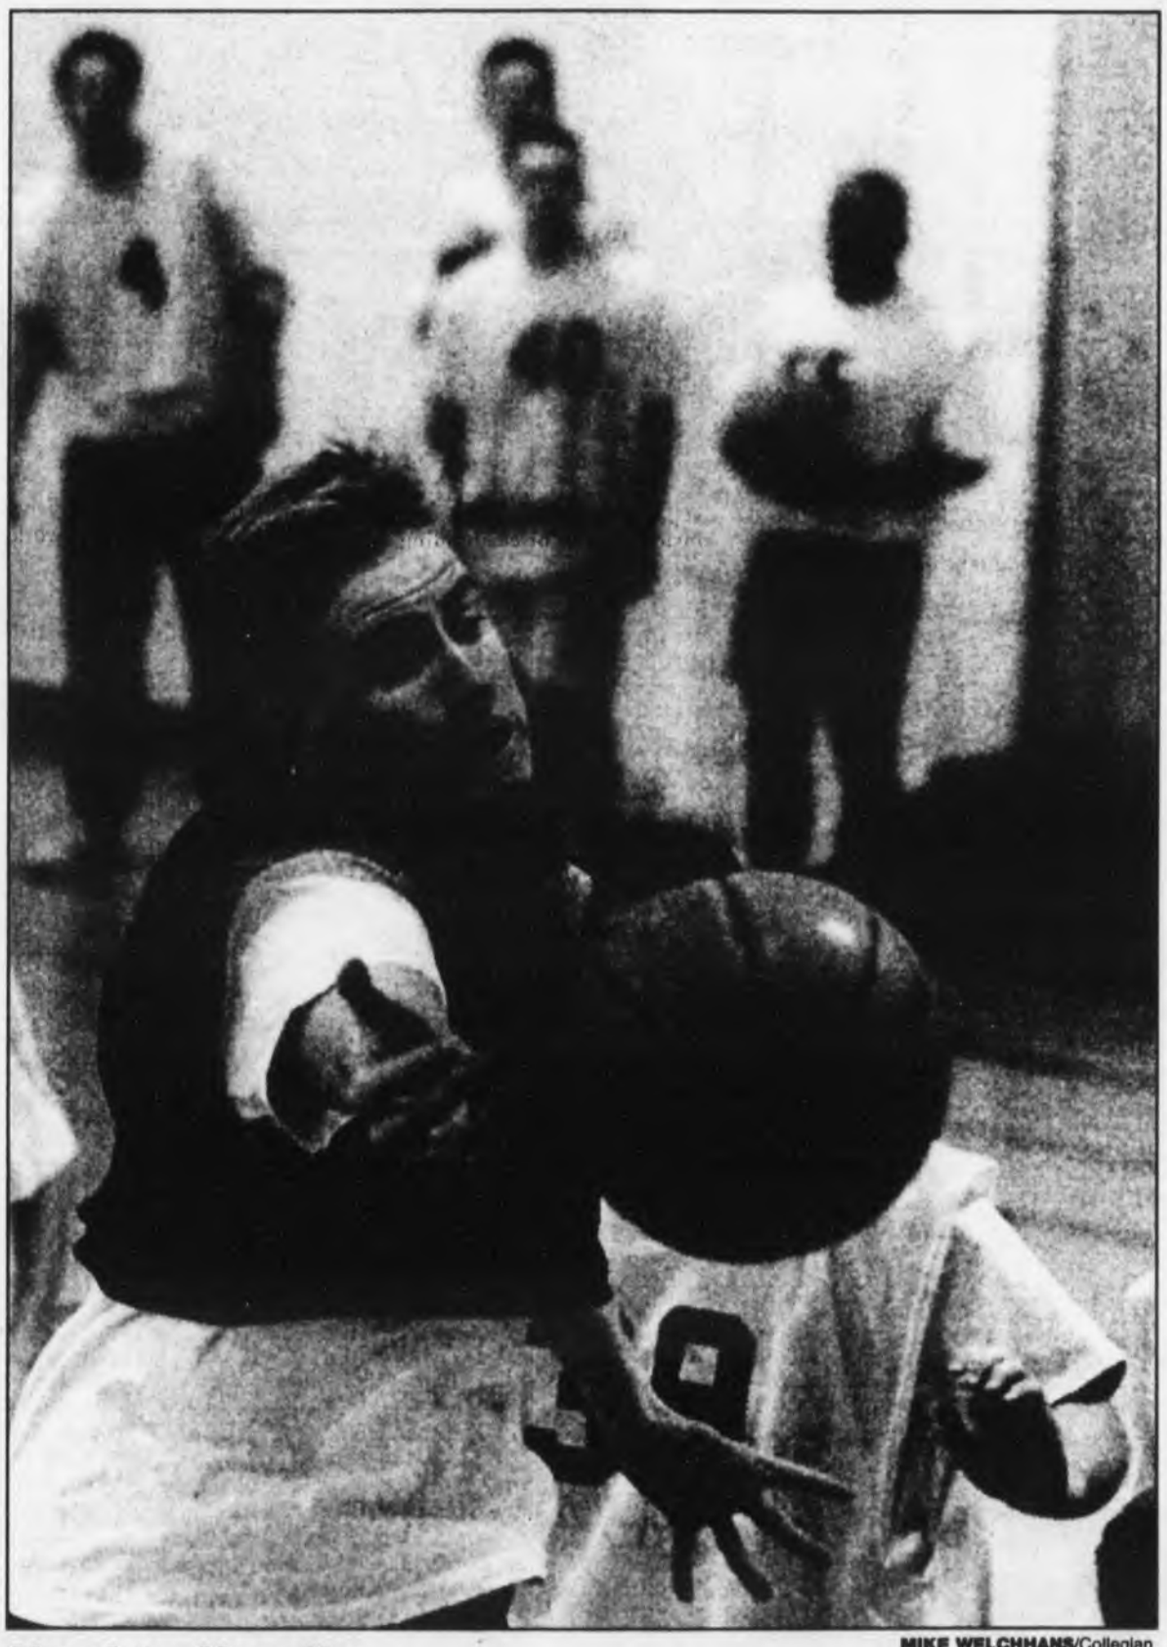
"It's very similar to the Indiana game," he said, referring to his team's early season loss in Bloomington, Ind. "Indiana played well, and we didn't."

The 15-2 Jayhawks suit up Tuesday in Lawrence against the 10-5 Colorado Buffaloes.

As for the Cats, they have a week layoff between games, with Missouri coming to town this Saturday for an afternoon rematch of the Jan. 14 game, which saw the Cats shoot a miserable 17.1 percent from the field in the first half yet still almost pull out a win in the second half.

For now, Asbury said he is going to concentrate on getting his team to play to the best of its ability.

"It doesn't matter how the other team plays if you're not playing well," he said.



Playing extremely well for the Cats lately is junior Tyrone Davis, who Asbury said is back into shape after a year out of basketball.

"He's shaken off the residue of inactivity."

Inactivity is something junior Brian Gavin and sophomore Kevin Lewis can relate to. Gavin and Lewis, both starters early in the season, have seen their playing time diminished.

Asbury, who will play 10 guys on any given night, said not to count them out for the rest of the season.

"They can be resurrected very quickly by a couple of good performances."

Haase, Meyer awarded

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas sophomore Jerod Haase and Iowa State senior Loren Meyer have been chosen to share Big Eight player of the week honors.

Haase scored 20 points Saturday against then-No. 2 Connecticut in the Jayhawks' 88-59 upset victory. Against Nebraska, Haase had a career-high 25 points, including seven three-point goals, in the Jayhawks' 84-67 victory.

For the week, Haase shot 52 percent from the field and 67 percent from the free-throw line.

Meyer led Cyclone victories over Northern Iowa, 81-62, and K-State, 87-79, last week. He averaged 23 points and 68 percent shooting from the field. He also had 16 rebounds for the week and hit 12 of 16 free throws.

Rugby: It's more than a game

JASON TYLER
Collegian

The K-State/Fort Riley Rugby team is getting ready to kick off its 1995 season. The first official practice will be at 4:30 p.m. today at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The season runs from Jan. 27 through May 6.

"We're looking for all kinds of people to come out and play," Mark Fleury, senior in chemical engineering, said.

Fleury said he is really looking forward to seeing new faces on the field.

"Even if you don't know anything about rugby, I still encourage anyone to come out and get involved. We get people of all kinds. Most of the players are old high-school jocks looking for some relaxing, full-contact competition," he said.

Fleury said he encourages people who don't have much athletic experience to give rugby a try.

"We also get guys that come out, who have never even played high-school sports, and they do fine," Fleury said.

Fleury said that size and athletic ability are not important.

"If you are worried about your size, don't be. There's a place for everyone on the rugby pitch. I started because I missed the competitive side of sports, and the intramural program just wasn't cutting it. I needed contact," he said.

Fleury said to compete, interested individuals must pay an annual fee, which also registers them in the National Rugby Association.

"To play, you must pay a yearly due, which is $45 per semester. When you pay the fee, you are automatically registered with the National Rugby Association. The fee also pays for your uniforms and officials for the games," Fleury said.

Fleury said even though rugby might be hard to learn at first, once you understand the game, you will enjoy it.

"At first, it's hard because the sport is new and you don't know the rules of the game or any of the other players," he said.

"You just need to stick it out, and you will end up loving everything about the game," Fleury said.

Chris Sorensen, physics professor, said he liked playing because it gave him a feeling that he was a superstar.

"I played rugby because I loved the contact. I loved just being on the field of competition," Sorensen said.

"Rugby always gave me a feeling that I was an athlete no matter how old I was," he said.

Fleury said rugby is a great way to meet new people.

"Rugby is a gentleman's sport. After the games, we always go out with the other team and get to know them," he said.

"When teams come in from other towns, we put them up for the night or the weekend. Rugby is a great way to make friends."

Spencer Martin, junior in turf management, said rugby is a game for people who enjoy intense physical play.

"If you like to run, and you are a physical person, rugby is a game you should try. It is very intense and demanding," Martin said.

Dear Cassandra,

I have been spending too much time on America On-Line recently. On Monday evening, I met a married woman with a 2-year-old from Wichita. After a lengthy discussion, we decided to meet for lunch Tuesday.

The conversation during lunch was great, and we had a lot in common. After lunch, she drove me to her house. She showed me around, and we carried on a good conversation. In the living room, the foreplay began and I was really attracted to her until she took me into the master bedroom. The foreplay continued, and she gave me oral sex.

Somewhere between foreplay and intercourse, we simultaneously looked at the wedding picture on the night stand, and it ruined the moment. She wants to continue our relationship, and her husband is going to be out of town in two weeks. Your advice is greatly appreciated.

Signed,
KSUSMITH

Dear KSUSMITH,

Having oral sex is still sex. Infidelity is still infidelity.

My advice is to end it. Now. Take it from me and all my personal knowledge: getting involved with a married person is not a good idea. You could get hurt, physically and emotionally.

Jazz album offers new experience

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

A mix of rhythm and blues and jazz creates the character of the new album by the seven-member Pat Metheny Group titled "We Live Here."

The compact disc contains nine songs and almost 70 minutes of music, which are loaded with strong instrumental lines and a few vocal tracks.

Pat Metheny, the leader of the group, said one of the notable things about this album is eight of the nine tracks were written by Metheny and group member Lyle Mays.

The collaborative effort is very apparent in the blending of the instrumental sounds and harmonies.

Keyboards, straightforward percussion and easy guitar sounds are the mainstay of the groups.

I think the opening song, "Here to Stay," is a good example of the group's instrumental abilities.

A prominent beat, backed by guitar, percussion and keyboards, creates a smooth rhythm and blues sound, making the song very easy to listen to.

Metheny said the strong beat is something different for them and it might surprise people on first impression, but a lot is going on in the song so the beat doesn't dominate the track.

The guitar synthesizer and electronic keyboard in "Something to Remind You," the seventh track on the disc, highlight the strong harmonies and light jazzy sounds. This is as close to a ballad as anything on the CD. I think this is an excellent track to relax to and create a mellow mood. Just turn it on and kick back with a pillow.

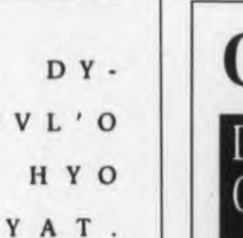
A flugelhorn breaks the mold in track eight, "Red Sky." The long horn solo offers the ear a different experience.

The title track, "We Live Here," changes the album's tempo and mood temporarily. The tempo quickens and becomes an upbeat jazz track.

This song started out as a folk piece for the group, and Metheny combined it with some different beats to come up with a lot of activity in one song.

I think vocals might have added depth to the quality of a couple of the tracks, but it isn't a big problem. Vocals are relegated to background harmony lines, but the album holds its own very well without any lead vocals.

"We Live Here" may not be for everyone. The mellow blues and light jazzy sounds are miles away from the loud, noise-oriented music that is currently popular. The lack of vocals shouldn't deter anyone from giving the album a chance. It is more than just some instrumental elevator music.



To anyone who would like a refreshing break during a long, noise-filled day, I recommend they try this album. The melodies and harmonies will drain the stress right out of your day.

Band sings about life issues, helps homeless

MARK GOODWIN
Collegian

Personal integrity, racism, sexual responsibility, tolerance of differing viewpoints, political activism and homelessness.

While other bands are writing about relationships, the band Power and Fear is singing about these and other issues every time they perform.

The Kansas City band, which won the Wednesday night section of last week's Battle of the Bands at Snookie's Bar, said it hopes to get people to think about social issues.

Homeless advocacy is a big part of the band's agenda. The bassist for Power and Fear, Vitamin D, said the band is working on an album called "No Housing, No Peace."

Vitamin D said the proceeds from the compact disc will go to the National Union of the Homeless.

"They are a grassroots organization that lobbies Congress," Vitamin D said. "They basically force government to pay attention to homeless people."

Vitamin D said many people are one paycheck away from being homeless, and the Union for the Homeless brings attention to it.

"The Union for the Homeless shows people that not all homeless are lazy alcoholics," Vitamin D said. "It's mostly families, and they stress breaking the cycle of homeless and shelter life."

Freedom of thought and lifestyle are also central themes of Power and Fear's message. Lead singer Communicator Peace, a.k.a. Jesse Jackson, describes the group's music as "consciousness music."

"We want to break down the stereotypes people have," Jackson said. "We have an interracial band, and some of the members are openly bisexual.

"Being artists, we're all really out there trying to experience all we can, pushing it to the edge.

"We've all gone through, or are going through, our drug phases, so the psychedelic mindset is a big part of our music."

Jackson said the group wants to send people the message that material worth is not as important as our culture makes them believe.

"No matter what the Republican or Democratic parties tell you, money does not have to rule your life," Jackson told the Manhattan crowd.

Jackson also said drugs can be a tool for re-evaluating priorities.

"What happens through drugs is it lets you find your soul again, especially if you grow up in a society that crushes your soul by basing your worth on how much money you make," Jackson said.

Power and Fear consider themselves an alternate channel for information dissemination. One of the group's concerns is the media are controlled by too few individuals.

"Here in Lawrence, one guy owns AM and FM radio stations, a TV station, the newspaper and a cable TV station," Vitamin D said. "I've been a professional journalist. Corporate journalism is about censorship. Alternate viewpoints just don't get any exposure."

The band, which has been together more than three years, blends reggae, rock and hip-hop influences into something that, although difficult to peg, sounds a little like a cross between "Living Colour" and "Arrested Development" with some Jimi Hendrix thrown in.

Committee endorses Bicknell

appointed by Finney last October to replace Catherine Conger of Iola, who resigned in July from a term that expires Dec. 31, 1996.

Bicknell attended the board's November, December and January meetings. However, if the Senate declines to confirm him, Bicknell would be off the board.

Lawrence said Bicknell expressed honest interest and concern for education in Kansas during his confirmation hearing before the Education Committee last Wednesday.

She also stressed his support for Pittsburg State University and local education in Pittsburg.

Lawrence said Wichita State University President Eugene Hughes was very impressed with the way Bicknell has taken hold on the board and been involved.

She said Hughes believes Bicknell brought to the regents a business sense and acumen that would be a great asset to the board.

Walker said he considered Bicknell as well-qualified for the regents as any appointee he has seen in the six years he's been in the Senate.

"I've heard rumors that there will be problems with his nomination," Walker said. "If there are concerns, I'd like to know what they are."

No one said anything.

Sen. Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, said Bicknell is a person who can address the business community's concern that Kansas students are not being prepared for work as they should be.

"I would agree with Sen. Lawrence that Mr. Bicknell brings a very unique perspective to the board in that regard," Hensley said. "He's hired people educated at all levels in Kansas and is imminently qualified, perhaps the most qualified candidate I've seen on the Board of Regents."

Medicaid next on Gingrich's change list to give them control of their own health care."

Gingrich said he did not yet know what kind of mechanism would replace HCFA if it were abolished.

"This is a topic a lot of very smart people ought to start looking at," he said. "I know it's the right question. I don't have an answer."

Finding that answer will be the job of the task force. Gingrich declined to predict a timetable or even to say whether it might happen this year.

Gingrich also said he planned to meet later Monday with congressional leaders and members of the National Governors Association to discuss overhauling Medicaid, the federal health-insurance program for the poor.

As for the rest of his health-care agenda, Gingrich said he envisioned tackling reform piece by piece, rather than in the kind of huge overhaul bill the Clinton administration failed to pass last year.

"I argued two years ago that no large comprehensive health-care bill could work because it's too intellectually complicated," he said.

He said he would first like to move through Congress a bill to allow people to carry their health insurance from job to job. Then, he said, he would try to pass a bill that guarantees tax deductions for self-employed people who buy their own insurance.

The idea, he said, is to keep moving individual reforms one by one as a series of building blocks.

Gingrich also said the Food and Drug Administration should be replaced.

"The current FDA structure is anti-jobs, anti-science and anti-progress," he said. "There has to be a part there somewhere that says, 'What does the 21st-century Food and Drug Administration look like?'"

Gingrich said he also plans to ask the House leadership about establishing a monthly Correction Day on Capitol Hill.

"We'd take the dumbest thing the federal government's been doing and just abolish it," he said.

He invited the hospital association members to tell him some of the dumb things they know of being done by the federal government.

Drug to be used with therapy, treatment

To be affective, ReVia is meant to be used in combination with therapy and other forms of treatment.

It has been tested in several double-blind, placebo-controlled studies that lasted 12 weeks each.

The majority of the patients who received ReVia remained abstinent.

During a particular study conducted by Dr. Joseph Volpicelli at the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine, only 50 percent of the patients treated with ReVia returned to heavy drinking, while 95 percent of the placebo-treated patients relapsed.

Mastrangelo said that ReVia has been on the market for 10 years under the name Trexan. During that time, it was used to treat heroin addiction.

"It was fairly successful in the treatment of heroin addiction, but we had to change the name for the new market," Mastrangelo said.

"Side effects are minimal, usually just involving nausea," Mastrangelo said. "It does not cause any physical addiction."

Other side effects are difficulty sleeping, anxiety, nervousness, abdominal pain/cramps, low energy, joint and muscle pain and headaches. ReVia also can cause severe damage to the liver if taken in large doses.

There is warning information about liver toxicity available, but when given at the recommended dosage of 50 mg a day, there have been no real problems, Mastrangelo said.

National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism Director Enoch Gordis said, "While not a magic bullet, naltrexone promises to help many patients in their struggle against a chronic, relapsing disease."

Robinson to give keynote speech begin at 11:30 a.m. Thursday in the K-State Union.

The keynote speaker of Black History Month will be Randall Robinson, executive director of TransAfrica. His presentation will be at 7 p.m. Feb. 13 at Forum Hall.

Taylor-Archer said Robinson has been a long-time advocate of U.S. foreign policy and how it relates to the African continent and the Caribbean.

Joe Clark, former principal of Eastside High in New Jersey and focus of the movie "Lean on Me," will speak at 7 p.m. Feb. 15 in McCain Auditorium.

"I think he is an inspiration to all black people," Jimmy Dean, junior in psychology, said. "He was a good role model to young people in the movie 'Lean on Me.'"

Abdulhaqq said nine candidates will be competing in the Mr. and Mrs. BSU pageant at 7 p.m. Saturday in Union Station.

On Feb. 17, "Fusion: a Production of Arrested Development," a cultural workshop including the use of drums, dance and other multimedia, will be presented at 8 p.m. in McCain.

Taylor-Archer said it was mainly students who planned the events for the month.

"I am very pleased with the leadership they have demonstrated," she said.

Senate chair: Senators should get credit

Nolfi said she thinks the change will send a message.

"If you're going to get a grade, you should have to do something. I don't think you should just be involved. You should have to do something," she said.

Wheeler said he thinks senators should be able to continue taking the course.

"There's a whole atmosphere here. There's elections, representing, office hours, committees and retreats. We are actively involved, and this shouldn't be detrimental to us. There are some rewards," Wheeler said.

Renee Fisher, Senate intern, said she thinks senators should continue to receive credit for the class.

"I don't think this is a pud class. Anybody who can stay awake until 6:15 a.m. should get some kind of credit," Fisher said.

Paying fines not the only ticket option

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

Illegal parking on campus often results in a scant, little, yellow envelope nestled beneath your windshield wiper.

That little, yellow envelope often contains a fine that doesn't seem so scant.

Paying the fine is not the only option, though.

The K-State Parking Citations Appeals Board (PCAB) gives students the option of presenting their side of the story, said Audrey Deines, chairperson and junior in human resource management.

"Parking is a huge problem in the first place, and if they didn't have a way to voice their opinion, then it would be an even bigger problem," Deines said.

The PCAB is composed of faculty, staff and students.

Upon the issuing of a parking citation, the alleged parking violator has five business days to fill out an appeal form before the fine is due.

The board members come in weekly to pick up packets containing 10 appeals. Each appeal is reviewed by two different judges, Deines said.

"The system has just been changed and revised," Deines said. "In the past, the appeals were looked at by just one board member."

The PCAB members then return their reviewed packets to Burt Hall, Deines said.

If the two PCAB members deny the appeal, the person appealing has five business days to pay the fine.

If the two PCAB members have conflicting judgments, the appeal is heard by the PCAB at its next meeting. A majority of a vote decides the ruling, Deines said.

In any case, the persons appealing have the opportunity to present their case before the PCAB in person. An appointment to appear before the PCAB must be made within five business days of the denial.

Deines said the new system leaves less room for bias.

"With two judges, you can see that the system is more fair," Deines said.

Dwain Archer, director of parking services, said it doesn't matter who violates parking regulations.

"A ticket is a ticket. A person creating a traffic violation is the same," Archer said.

Archer said the system is a welcome change.

"Students used to only review student appeals," Archer said. "Faculty/staff used to only review faculty/staff appeals. I think that having students and faculty/staff ruling on the same appeal gives it more balance."

Archer said the PCAB reviews more than 500 appeals each semester, and the outcome of each appeal is known within 30 to 40 days.

He also said the PCAB plans to review appeals this summer for the first time.

"Things are slower in the summer due to the decrease in the students, but we want the appeals to remain current," Archer said.

Archer said he wanted to avoid leaving the PCAB with too many appeals to review in the fall.

"They would be reviewing 250 tickets when they returned in the fall, and that would create a workload," Archer said.

Deines said she has heard some off-the-wall appeals while serving on the PCAB.

She said one person appealed a ticket for not having a valid parking permit. The person appealing stated the permit blew out while the windows were down for a dog in the car.

Deines said others also bring up fear for safety on campus as a concern. The people who appeal on these grounds park close to the residence halls with an incorrect parking permit.

"If we let something like that go by, people will use that as an excuse all the time," Deines said.

K-State space experiments to lift off

STEVEN YOUNG
Collegian

K-State scientists will have several hundred experiments aboard the space shuttle Discovery when it launches at 11:50 tonight.

Two experiments during the eight-day mission are an examination of the effects of microgravity on the immune system and testing of a water-purification system by Stephen Chapes, associate professor of biology.

These experiments are being conducted in microgravity on behalf of NASA for possible use in space. However, there may also be applications on Earth, George Marchin, associate professor of microbiology, said.

Chapes said his experiments could lead to drugs for treating AIDS and other infectious diseases. This is the second flight for this experiment, he said.

The first set of results showed that the drug being tested, Pagylated Interleukin-Two, appears to stimulate the production of substances vital to the immune system, such as white blood cells, Chapes said.

For this shuttle mission, the route of injection, dosage and experimental controls have been changed, he said.

If the results of the first experiment are repeated, the drug could be used by people who are bedridden or in wheelchairs to strengthen their immune systems, Chapes said.

Those people, because they put no weight on their feet, are in a situation that is magnified in zero gravity, Chapes said.

Discovery will also be testing an idea from Marchin and Jack Lambert, professor emeritus of chemistry, who have designed a new disinfecting component for water- purification systems.

Polyiodide resin, a substance currently used in small-scale water purification systems, has had trouble fighting some bacteria, Marchin said.

He said the new resin is a mixture of silver and copper.

The Discovery crew will mix the material with bacteria for a while and then stop the reaction, Marchin said. After the shuttle returns to Earth, tests will be conducted to see if the bacteria are still alive, he said. The same tests are being conducted on Earth, he said.

The silver and copper mixture has appeared to be effective against the bacteria the polyiodide resin has had trouble with, Marchin said.

"My most optimistic prediction is that it could be added to the polyiodide system," he said.

Small water-purification systems such as those used by campers could more effectively kill bacteria, Marchin said.

"There is a lot of hype with this," he said.

Marketing departments like to cite effectiveness of a product in space, Marchin said.

"If NASA were to use this process, think of the promotion that could be," he said.

These experiments were planned and submitted by BioServe Space Technologies.

BioServe is a NASA-supported and funded effort between K-State's Division of Biology and the aerospace engineering sciences program at the University of Colorado.

Dream quilt

Children express wishes through art

JANET GILLILAND
Collegian

Wishes, dreams and the giggles of energetic children and K-State students filled the Early Childhood Lab early Tuesday morning.

Children in the Early Childhood Lab made story quilts as a learning project. Lynda Andrus, assistant professor of art, was in charge of the project.

The project began by Andrus reading the book "Tar Beach" aloud. As she began reading, the children's faces lit up with excitement as they grabbed their carpet squares to sit for storytelling time.

The book is a story quilt that combines autobiography, fiction, painting and quilt-making within one art form while focusing on dreams. Faith Ringgold, who creates story quilts, is the author of the book.

Each child was assigned a K-State student partner from the Art for Elementary Education class. This provided a learning experience for both the children and the K-State students.

After listening to the book, the children then went with their partner and were asked to make a story quilt and show their dream or wish.

Andrus said this project exposes the children to the artist, Ringgold, and exposes them to different materials to make their collage. Tables of glue, felt, buttons, pictures, yarn, lace and crayons were available for the children to use and express their dreams.

Some children showed their dreams of wanting to be a doctor, while others showed their expressions by making something they like, such as a zebra.

"It's fun to watch the kids get into making their quilts, and it's good for us too, as future educators," Chantel Willingham, junior in elementary education, said.

Judy DeLong, lead teacher at the Early Childhood Lab, said this was an inclusionary project because it includes children with special needs along with children who have typical needs.

"It's nice to see the kids progress and learn to get along and help each other," DeLong said.

Andrus also conducted this project last fall at the Riley County School District, where 500 kids participated from preschool to the eighth grade.

This is the first time for the Early Childhood Lab to have the project for the children. Children ages 3 to 5 were participating in this quilt project.

"It is good for us because we will be working with kids, and it gives us the experience. It also gives the kids an opportunity to be creative," Amy Knight, senior in elementary education, said.

After the children finished their quilts, the students from the Art for Elementary Education class then took the individual quilts back to their class and sewed them together. They will bring them to the children to hang in the lab.

"Each child gets something different out of this project because each child has their own dreams, are creative, and this gives them a way to let their energy out," Brooke Patterson, senior in elementary education, said.

Campus-wide escort service to begin

AMY SIMON
Collegian

Whether going to a late-night study session in Farrell Library or a party at Union Station, it will soon be easier for students to travel safely across campus in the dark.

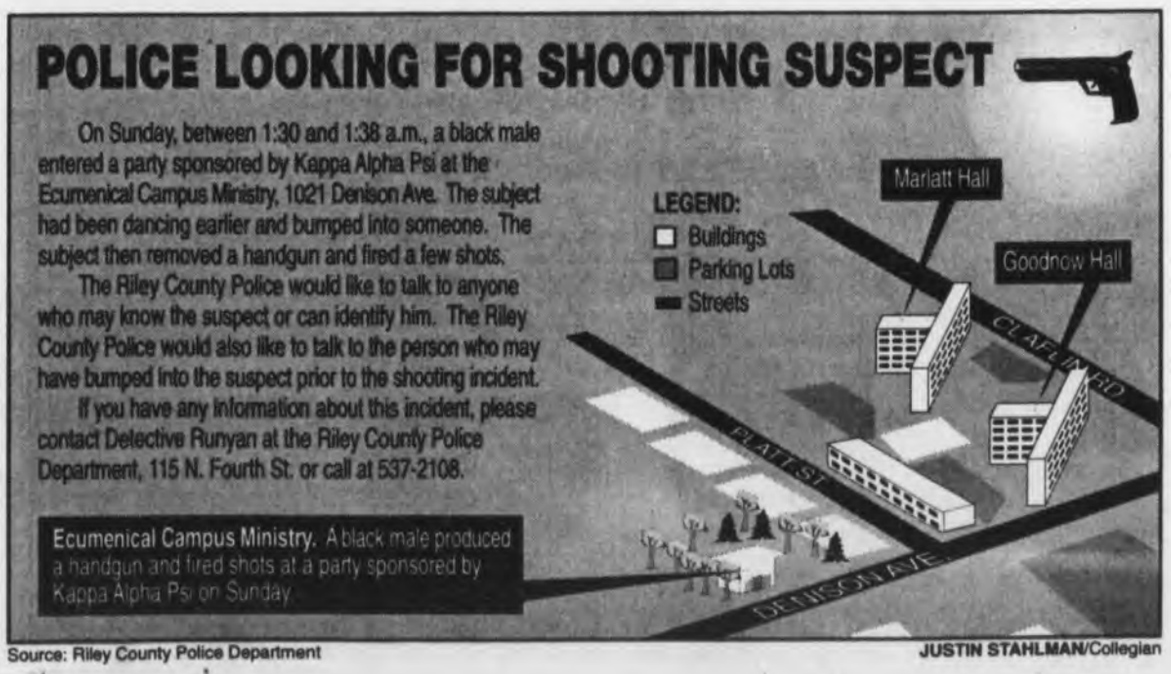
Campus escort services in Strong Complex, Goodnow Hall and Derby Complex will be consolidated into one system today, Lin Bliss, Association of Residence Halls president, said.

Students needing an escort across campus can call 395-SAFE between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m., Bliss said.

This number will put them in contact with a police dispatcher, who will refer the request to escorts at the nearest residence-hall complex. Volunteers will escort any student, faculty member, staff member or visitor as far as a block off campus.

However, Bliss said Haymaker and West halls have not yet joined the consolidated system. Residents wanting escorts to those residence halls should still call the front desks.

Pairs of student volunteers, usually one male and one female, will respond to requests, Bliss said.



One volunteer will carry a pager, and the other will carry a cellular phone. The cellular phones and pagers will make it easy for the dispatcher to contact the escorts.

Escorts will also use the cellular phones and pagers to keep the police informed of campus safety conditions.

ESCORTS
Students needing an escort across campus can call 395-SAFE between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m.

"The escorts will be patrolling to look for burned-out light bulbs and other such things that would affect the safety conditions on campus," Eric Keen, ARH treasurer, said.

There are hopes for the program to expand by recruiting volunteers from greek houses and other off-campus students, Keen said.

▶ MORE CUTS IN FINANCIAL NEED-BASED SCHOLARSHIPS EXPECTED

TOPEKA (AP) — Increased tuition has taken its toll on students from low-income families, and the federal government is cutting back funding that would help them afford college for their children, legislators were told Tuesday.

Steve Jordan, executive director of the Kansas Board of Regents, told the House Subcommittee on Education and Legislative Operations that he expects the federal government to cut $900,000 in funding from the state's $1.1 million scholarship program.

It already has cut $100,000 this year, eliminating 1,000 scholarships, he said.

Only one out of eight students eligible for state-supported grants receive money from the state's only need-based financial-aid program, Jordan said.

The average family income of students eligible for the program is $15,000 annually.

Jordan said the regents would be willing to work with the subcommittee on a proposal that would take out-of-state students in the Midwest Higher Education Consortium out of the appropriations process.

The students, all of whom come from Nebraska, Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Minnesota or Illinois, are part of a program that enables them to attend Kansas regents institutions for 1.5 times the cost of the state's resident tuition. In return, Kansas students can attend the participating states' universities for 1.5 times their resident tuition.

By including the students in the appropriations process, their full tuition — not their reduced tuition — is figured into the regents' budget, causing it to be about $500,000 short.

Jordan said the governor granted the regents most of its requests in his proposed budget, but Jordan did ask the subcommittee for a 3.5-percent increase to account for inflation of the cost of operational expenses, such as office supplies and utilities.

The governor proposed a 1.5-percent increase.

Jordan also asked for funding for individual institutional enhancements, which include adding new programs, and updating old ones.

The regents are working with the governor's staff on a new way to look at tuition, but Jordan declined to comment on the new program and said it was too early to release any information.

▶ CURRENT KANSAS OPEN MEETINGS STATUTE COMES UNDER SCRUTINY

TOPEKA (AP) — While a legislative committee examined proposed changes to the Kansas open meetings law, the editor of the Wichita Eagle said Tuesday the present statute is so weak it might as well be taken off the books.

"It would be far more honest to repeal the law altogether," Davis "Buzz" Merritt said to the Senate Local Government Committee, while also suggested ways to strengthen the law.

Merritt appeared before the committee representing the Eagle and the Kansas Press Association.

He said his comment that the law might as well be repealed was a personal opinion.

"The law, as it now exists, even without the latest proposals for change, is a farce and a cruel deception," Merritt said.

"Let's get it off the books entirely and allow citizens to fully understand their plight. Perhaps they and you then will see the need for an original act," he said.

The committee is considering a bill to clarify that members of local governing bodies may meet at social gatherings as long as they do not transact public business.

The bill also would allow local governing bodies to go into executive session to discuss appointments to boards and commissions.

Merritt said the present law is worthless.

"It has no teeth. It's easily evaded. It's been amended out of existence," Merritt said.

He said it allows two members of an elected board or commission to talk about business outside of recognized public sessions.

He said to lawmakers that if two or more members talk about public business, then that is a meeting and must be open to the public.

"The simple truth is that Kansas citizens have no guarantee of open government and no protection against elected officials doing as they please," he said.

Closed sessions should be allowed for only strictly limited reasons, and they should be taped for later court review if requested by citizens, Merritt said.

▶ SENATE REVISIONS COULD PROVIDE RELIEF FOR KANSAS TAXPAYERS

TOPEKA (AP) — House Majority Leader Vince Snowbarger and Senate Minority Leader Jerry Karr went before legislative committees on Tuesday with plans they said aren't perfect but represent a step toward giving Kansans tax relief.

Snowbarger's plan would take the state's 35-mill school-finance property-tax mill levy off motor vehicles. Karr and the Senate Democrats' plan, on the other hand, would tie the state's standard income-tax deduction to the cost of living.

Karr explained to the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee a proposal sponsored by all 13 Senate Democrats.

It would increase Kansas' standard deduction by the same percentage as the rate of inflation each year, starting with the current tax year.

Karr, of Emporia, said if Kansas had indexed its standard deduction to the cost of living in 1988 when the federal government started doing indexing, it would have saved Kansans $35 million in state-income taxes.

If it were enacted now, he said, it would save them $3.4 million in 1995.

The Democratic indexing plan does not bring Kansas into total conformity with the federal indexing, but this would be a move ahead for the future, Karr said.

Taking advantage of the small classroom, Karen Merryman works closely with her students as she reads the story "Stone Soup" during her morning classes at Oak Grove Elementary.

Private school stresses active participation instead of grades

WADE ANDERSON
Collegian

There are no desks, no lectures, no textbooks and no grades given.

It doesn't matter — children still learn the 3 R's and even more at Oak Grove Alternative School.

"Children learn by doing," said Shawn Bunch, parent and school board member for Oak Grove. Bunch is also one of the original founders of the school.

"Children are creative. They're natural scientists," he said.

Karen Merryman, Oak Grove's head teacher, said sometimes the children are given an appliance and screwdriver with the task of finding out how the appliance works.

Oak Grove School is a nonprofit, parent-run cooperative that started in 1991.

The parents meet and choose the board of directors.

Parents spend a minimum of three hours per month working for the school.

Most everything is different about Oak Grove School. It sits almost unnoticed, surrounded by trees on the north side of K-hill.

"Our seating is a wonderful science area. We're able to watch birds and study the tracks of various kinds of animals," Merryman said.

The location of the school sets itself apart from other buildings in the area, but it is the environment inside the school and the school's philosophy that set it apart from public schools.

"The school works to conform to the children," Andrea Blair, curriculum adviser, said.

Blair, who also works at K-State as a learning disabilities specialist, said the problem at public schools is the curriculum.

"It misses the top- and bottom-level students. It reaches about a fourth of the students," she said.

Bunch said individual students all have their own curriculum.

Teachers, parents and children, if they're old enough, determine what level students are at, Bunch said. She also said the curriculum doesn't limit students.

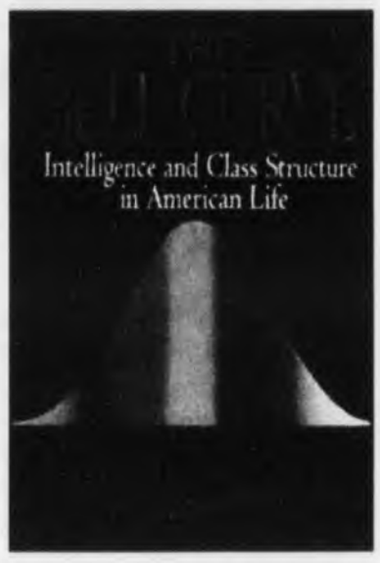
Merryman said she thinks the schools work for three reasons: strong parent involvement, student participation in what they want to learn, and a low teacher-student ratio.

There are 15 students and two teachers in the school — about a 7-1 student-teacher ratio.

"I think public teachers would be envious of my situation to work with such a small class," Merryman said.

She also said the time she spends with an individual student is more than a normal classroom teacher would be able to spend on one of their students.

The students range from preschool age to fourth grade.



Blair said they have children of different ages in open classrooms.

Open classrooms mean there aren't lines of desks that the students have to sit in all day long. Instead there are large tables and workstations set up throughout the room.

'Bell Curve' studies path to intelligence

KATHLEEN MASTIO
Collegian

"The Bell Curve" is an intellectual book with the diversity to be understood at almost any level.

While "The Bell Curve" is in excess of 650 pages without notes, it is some of the most penetrating research that I have ever read.

The scientific method behind the study is impeccable.

Although this is without doubt an extremely controversial topic, the ideas are momentous.

The results, which are currently being debated, are valid and intelligent.

Various methods of research were used to confirm, on a public level, the genetic nature of intelligence.

Authors Richard Herrnstein and Charles Murray used not only research that they had performed, but that others had done.

The results, according to Herrnstein and Murray, were remarkably obvious.

Another goal of the book is to demonstrate the polarization of society, as we divide based on cognitive ability.

Herrnstein and Murray suggest that we are forming new class structures because education, income and career all divide us in some way.

They don't suggest a solution to this rapidly rising wall, but they do point it out.

While they do say that intelligence is only 40-80 percent hereditary, their evidence is undeniable.

All of the research they use is well-explained in addition to being unbiased.

Herrnstein and Murray's work and the works of others demonstrates its balance.

Some of the studies used by the pair of authors have been praised publicly.

The purpose of "The Bell Curve" is to submit research to society as a whole for consideration.

Their research has been cloaked in a shroud of negative publicity, but most of the condemnation is unwarranted.

The ideas presented may not be popular or politically correct, but they are none-the-less well founded.

I would ask that anyone who has not read this book to pick up a copy and decide for themselves.

One of the tragedies surrounding this book is the fact that many people haven't read it but have formulated an opinion based on what they have been told by others.

Before jumping to any conclusions about "The Bell Curve," read it. One may find "The Bell Curve" to be thought provoking to say the least.

A majority of significant advances have been encompassed by skepticism. Christopher Columbus, Albert Einstein, the Wright Brothers, and Thomas Edison were all told they were foolish.

In the end, their beliefs were proven to be more accurate than anyone knew.

If fellow book readers would like to do a little fact-finding of their own, I recommend "The Bell Curve."

It will push your mind to a new level and increase your knowledge about intelligence.

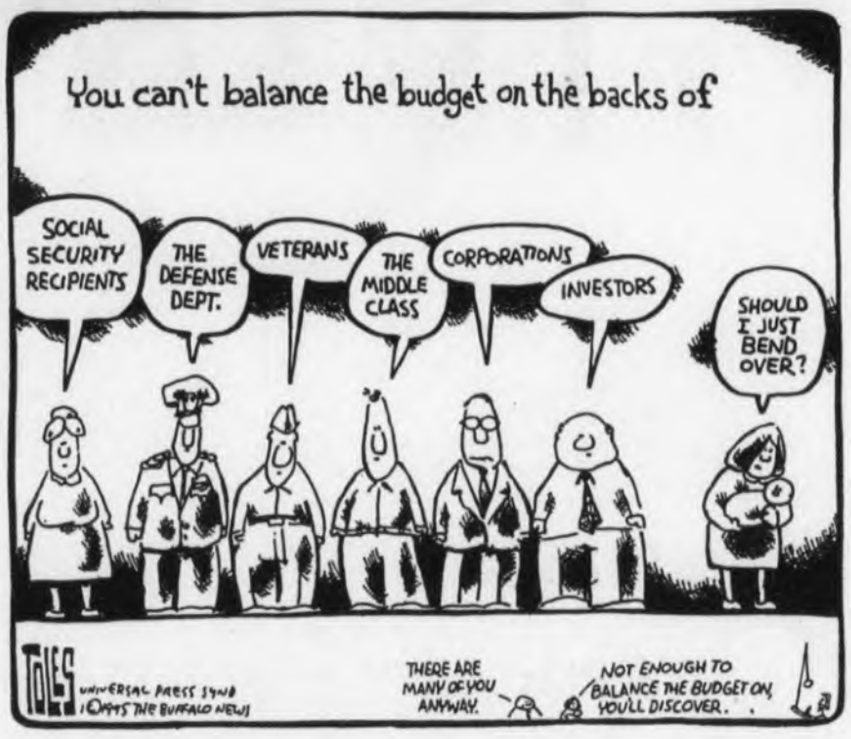
Rumor mill needs facts about Saturday incident

If KPL could harness the energy of the campus rumor mill, it could light the Vegas Strip. It's been going full-force since an incident last weekend.

On Saturday night, there was a party at the Ecumenical Campus Center. Someone brought a gun, and shots were fired.

The Collegian editors heard about the incident Sunday afternoon. After several hours and many fruitless phone calls, we still only had the cop report as information.

On Monday, we tried again. We found a lot of hearsay; that someone's foot got stepped on, words were exchanged, and a gun was fired in the air. We found out that no one was shot and taken to the hospital, but we didn't know if anyone got hurt otherwise. No one wanted to talk.



Meanwhile, the rumors kept growing, until we were being accused of trying to cover this incident up. Too often, the Collegian is accused of blowing things out of proportion. By trying to make sure we had the facts straight, we did just the opposite. We didn't think about the fact that the rumor mill was grinding, but not a lot of students had the facts about what happened.

It's not that we don't care. But we were trying to make sure we printed the facts, not the rumors.

On Page 1 you'll find a graphic that explains what happened and where. The Riley County Police Department is asking for information from anyone who knows something about the incident.

Call them at 537-2112, or us at 532-6556, if you have any facts, not rumors, about Saturday night.

Fax harassment needs to stop

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

The Fred Phelps saga continues.

Topeka lawyer Jerry Palmer has challenged Southwestern Bell to pull the plug on Phelps' notorious gay-bashing fax machine. He said that a Kansas Corporation Commission regulation that allows Southwestern Bell to revoke telephone services from a client who is making harassing calls to another person should be used against Phelps.

In the past, the KCC regulation has been enforced against people who make obscene or harassing phone calls that harass the person receiving the call. Palmer said he now wants it to be applied to third-party harassment.

In Palmer's opinion, the regulation should also be enforced against people who send unwanted faxes that are hostile to someone other than the recipient.

It seems a little strange to comprehend at first because most people don't have fax machines, and even fewer receive faxes from Phelps.

To help put it in perspective, imagine Phelps was making unsolicited calls to you to tell you that God hates someone. This is what Phelps does with his fax machine. Who could argue that after months and months of this behavior that it wasn't a form of harassment against the person Phelps is targeting, to say nothing of the fax recipient?

Apparently Southwestern Bell doesn't think it is. The corporation said it doesn't have enough standing or proof to do anything about it right now.

In a letter recently published in the Topeka Capitol-Journal, Southwestern Bell of Kansas President Melanie Fannin said the corporation is working to solve the problem. She said one solution to the Phelps problem would be for customers who receive his faxes to use the call blocker feature that Southwestern Bell offers.

In effect, this solution lets Phelps keep paying for his service while Southwestern Bell gets more people to sign up and pay for those nifty feature packages.

Southwestern Bell ends up making more money than before while the responsibility shifts from the fax sender and the medium of the fax onto the fax recipient.

Maybe Southwestern Bell could offer a "Phelps Phax" package with call blocker, caller ID and call return (so you can tell him how much you appreciate his faxes) for a snazzy $15 or so a month.

Southwestern Bell must have all the guts of a cockroach.

Southwestern Bell set up a telephone number that customers could call to voice their concerns about Phelps' faxing and the possible solutions to stop it.

Fannin said that some callers favored pulling his service while others were concerned about free speech.

She said Southwestern Bell is trying to balance the two issues.

Where Southwestern Bell and these Phelps apologists go astray in their logic is in believing there is such a thing as absolute free speech.

Phelps does not have an absolute right to tell whomever he wants whatever he wants anymore than anyone else does.

Not only does Southwestern Bell have the guts of a cockroach, it also has the backbone of one.

It's obvious that Southwestern Bell is less concerned with free speech — or its customers' peace of mind — and more concerned with the inevitable lawsuits that Phelps, a disbarred lawyer, will hurl its way if Southwestern Bell has the courage to do what it would do to any other person who calls women in the middle of the night to whisper obscenities about other women. Phelps will call hellfire and brimstone down on Topeka if his fax machine gets disconnected, not to mention civil suits. That's why few people (Jerry Palmer excluded) ever challenge Phelps.

If enough people can prove that the faxes are coming from Phelps, Southwestern Bell will be short one more excuse for not cutting off phone service to his fax machine.

In its defense, Southwestern Bell has some due process to give to Phelps before it could consider pulling his service.

It has to make sure that the faxes are coming directly from him and not from some third party. This means people who receive Phelps' faxes have to agree to have a trap put on their phone lines so that Southwestern Bell can verify where the faxes are coming from.

If you receive unwanted faxes from Phelps, call the phone company and have a trap put on.

If enough people prove that the faxes are coming from Phelps, Southwestern Bell will be short one more excuse for not cutting off phone service to his fax machine. There's also something you can do even if you don't own a fax machine. Southwestern Bell has established a number at which you can voice your opinion about this situation. You can speak to a Southwestern Bell employee about this at (913) 276-6570.

Meanwhile, we'll all be waiting to see if Southwestern Bell develops anymore guts and backbone, or if it will instead continue to be an accomplice to Phelps' hate ministry.

Careless litterbugs deserve the worst

This is to the white Corsica with Ohio plates driving in front of me on Denision Avenue by Memorial Stadium at approximately 4:55 p.m. Monday afternoon.

KADY MASSEY

I saw you pitch your lit cigarette butt out your driver's side window. I know it was lit because I saw the sparks when it fell on the street.

Don't do that.

If I see one more lit cigarette butt hit pavement while I'm driving, I think I'll rear-end them. I cannot count the number of times I've been cruising blissfully along the Interstate thinking how great it is not to live in Jersey when a cigarette comes flying out of the window of the car in front of me, spewing sparks like dragon spit.

Listen up all you smokers out there: Cigarettes are litter, especially the kind that are still smoking. Those are the worst possible thing to throw out a window. Maybe it's because I grew up in western Kansas where drought is fairly common, or maybe it's just because I appreciate green landscape, but the site of any trash sickens me just a little. People throw away the oddest stuff on the highway — cans, bottles, shoes, evidence of past misdeeds, trash bags full of junk, old mattresses, you name it.

When I see trash that is still smoking, I can't help but worry. I look around at my beautiful state and see pop cans in the ditches and beer bottles in my yard (I don't drink beer, so I know they're not mine).

All of this stuff can be picked up and recycled, and someone can make a buck, but a lit cigarette can do more damage than can be undone by an afternoon with a trash bag tied to your belt.

So what can we, the nature-lovers, do? Hug a tree? I don't think so. Take down license-plate numbers? That's a start. I know the fines for littering are hellacious, so let's make the bums pay. Chase them down and make them pick it up? OK, that could be fun. The state could issue permits, and there could be an open season on littering. Maybe some of that money could go to schools in the Regents. That way, instead of raising tuition, we could bag litterers instead.

Or better yet, how about a bounty system so there would be a cash reward for each offender brought in? Repeat litterers who get away would have a higher price. This could turn into a real sport. Some people could probably become professionals.

Maybe Kansas could take a lesson from Idaho. Last summer, a retired couple was driving through Idaho, home of many forests, towing a car behind a trailer. The car got a flat that the couple didn't notice until sometime later. Unfortunately, sparks from the rim of the tire had already started fires along several miles of highway. They called the fire department and then went on their way. It was already too late to stop most of the damage, and the fires ate up a lot of Idaho. The couple received a bill from the state for firemen and equipment, plus damage resulting in the several millions. If Idaho was really feeling vindictive, they sent it C.O.D.

I really do think we should take action from these littering cretins before we have to bill someone for a prairie fire. If you smoke and are taking offense at any of this, that's tough. All I can say is keep the things in your car. I don't smoke, so I don't have to be around it. A lot of the people I work with smoke. I go outside to get away from them. Outside includes my car.

To the non-smokers/litterers among us — next time you see someone doing any of the behavior I have described, smack them with your car, and then write and tell me you did. Thanks.

Kady Massey is a sophomore in mass communications.

▶ GOVERNMENT

Democrats are not to blame for problems

Dear Editor,

After Clinton's State of the Union Address last Tuesday, I am once again proud to call myself a Democrat. Not because we are any less reinterpreted or reinvented by Republican ideologies and media wedge-drivers; but because he reaffirmed for me the foundations of the Democratic Party and reminded me of the principles on which it was founded. Our party was based on the premise that there is such a thing as good government and that there are things that good government can do for us more efficiently than we can do ourselves. This does not necessarily mean "bigger is better" or "government for government's sake" but simply that government can be a positive force in people's lives.

I am tired of being told that because I am a liberal Democrat, I am for big government programs and goverment interference. These big programs we have all come to know and hate are not the result of Democrats but of the compromise between Democrats and Reublicans driven by lobbyists and special interests.

The fact that government is not responsive to the people is not because of Democratic politicians but because of a money-driven system (one which the Republican congress refuses to address) in which people refuse to vote.

To point at our federal government and claim that government can't do anything right is like shooting fish in a barrel. All it really says is that BAD government can't do anything right: a fact which Democrats have never denied.

▶ MENTAL ILLNESS

Columnist made thoughtless comments on schizophrenia

Dear editor,

Although I come up to K-State only once a week, I do enjoy browsing the K-State Collegian between classes. I would like to respond to the recent article by Erin Mansur-Smith, who bemoans criticism of the student paper in her "Save the gripes, send us a letter" piece Jan. 24. So I thought I'd take the offer — I have two comments.

First, as any serious student of journalism should know, consumer input and marketing strategies are an integral part of running a successful paper.

If Miss Mansur-Smith keeps hearing that some students feel that the paper is uninteresting, then perhaps someone would examine why they feel this way and how the paper could become more responsive to student interests.

Lighten up, Erin — nobody said you folks don't work extremely hard on the paper. But anger and pouting isn't the most productive response to this issue — why not work to make the paper more responsive? Heck, sometimes I have thought there wasn't much of interest, either.

It seems to me that public criticism goes along with the territory of newspaper journalism, and if you can't stand the heat, why stay in the kitchen?

My second comment is on a more serious note. I was offended by your comment, "And we enjoy our work. It may make us drooling, chain-smoking schizophrenics, but this isn't about us."

I am sure that you never intended to offend anyone with that comment — but please consider these statistics: One in five families will have a member diagnosed with a serious mental illness such as schizophrenia, and one in every four people you know may have or will have some sort of clinically diagnosed mental illness.

Incidence of schizophrenia is a little over 1 percent of the human population, regardless of country or region. I'm sure you wouldn't intentionally offend these people simply because they have a chemical imbalance of the brain, something over which they have no control.

When you live with schizophrenia or another serious mental illness every day, it is stigmatizing and negative comments such as this that make it so difficult to deal with mental illnesses.

Many sufferers find dealing with the shame and stigma harder than with the limitations of the illness itself. Schizophrenia does not make people drool or chain smoke. The drooling you are referring to is an extrapyramidal side effect of anti-psychotic medications which produce a Parkinson-like symptom of excessive salivation.

I am a psychiatric nurse at Colmery-O'Neil V.A. Medical Center in Topeka and also a member of the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill (NAMI), which is a grass roots, consumer-based organization, which advocates for the mentally ill and strives to challenge stigma and improve the lives of people suffering severe, debilitating mental illnesses.

I am concerned about the Collegian printing statements such as this, which are commonly used by well-meaning but unaware people. But it perpetuates the stigma and shame, and damages the lives of the mentally ill as well as undermines the work of health professionals who strive to help those who suffer mental illness.

I thank you for your attention to this matter and for your consideration.

GIVING OF ONE'S SELF

Greek organizations, members give their time, resources for charities

A 6-foot ball may not sound like it could be used for much except a frightening game of Hacky-sack, but it can.

Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority and the Delta Chi fraternity are sponsoring a kind of soccer game with one of these balls to raise money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

The game is one way greek organizations raise thousands of dollars every semester for charities.

The greeks call this volunteer work their philanthropy.

A study by Jelena Jovanovic of Greek Affairs showed that in fall 1994, the greek organizations volunteered 27,769 hours and raised $63,191 for various charities and organizations.

Heather Harris, chairwoman of the Kappas, said the national branch strongly promotes participating in a philanthropy.

"We would like to show the community that we just don't live here. We want to give something back to the community."

The Kappas will be bringing Earth Ball to K-State this spring. The event will be April 8. Harris said the event will be open to the entire University.

The 6-foot Earth Ball is played with six to eight people. The object of the game is to kick or hit the ball — basically whatever it takes to get the ball over the goal line.

The Delta Chi's learned of this game from the Delta Chi Chapter at Iowa State, which has been playing the game for several years, Harris said.

Harris said the sororities really get involved. They tutor for local grade schools and help out at Big Brothers and Big Sisters.

Harris said it really depends on the nature of the organization as to how much they participate in the organization that they are raising money for.

"There's always more we can do. We're always looking to improve," she said.

Alpha Gamma Rho's main philanthropy is Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. The group raises money by having a beach party for all the fraternities and sororities at Tuttle Cove.

"The beach party is a pretty big deal," Andrew Roush, philanthropy director for AGR, said.

AGR raised money by charging an entry fee to all the fraternities and sororities. This year they raised about $1,200, Roush said.

"The guys enjoy giving back to the community," he said.

The fraternity enjoys hosting the event for Big Brothers and Big Sisters. Roush said the best part of the philanthropy was awarding the check and seeing the expression of the director when she received the check.

Ginger Cheever, executive director of Big Brothers and Big Sisters, said the fundraising really helps.

"For the students to take the time, it's so wonderful. You can't thank them enough," Cheever said.

The beach party consists of various games at which the fraternities and sororities compete against each other.

"It's kind of neat competing against each other at the games,"Harris said. "It's a good time. Everyone really enjoys it."

A few members of the AGR house are also paired to little brothers. They like to invite their little brothers over to the house for dinner and to play football with them, Roush said.

The Kappa Alpha Theta's main philanthropy is Court Appointed Special Advocates of Riley County. CASA is a national organization that gives children a voice in court, Jennifer Bradley, former philanthropy chairwoman of the Thetas, said.

CASA comes to the Theta house once a semester and gives a presentation about the organization. At these informative meetings, the women are given an opportunity to become volunteer case workers for CASA. The house also serves as a board member of the local CASA organization, attending their meetings.

Nationally, all Theta chapter houses raise money for CASA. For the last three years, the Thetas have raised money for CASA by having a soccer tournament.

Bradley said the tournament is open to the whole University, but most entries are from fraternities.

"It's a fun time to get out there," Bradley said. "You get to meet a lot of people.

"We get to coach the teams and help line judge."

Bradley said it's not hard to raise money because people know why the money is being raised. This year the Thetas raised $900 for CASA.

At Christmas time, the Thetas also sell Christmas cards produced by CASA. Bradley said the sorority buys the cards at cost and sells the cards for profit, with the proceeds going to CASA.

The Delta Upsilons have one of the longest-standing and one of the more profitable philanthropies of all the fraternities, Marty Gilmore, junior in microbiology, said.

The DUs produce a "Women of K-State Campus" calendar.

Gilmore said it's hard to find a good philanthropy to do in such a flooded market, with so many other groups doing fund-raising events.

For 12 years, the DUs have produced and sold the "Women of K-State Campus" calendar, with proceeds going to The Villagers in Topeka.

The Villagers is a national organization that provides a home for neglected and abused children. The homes are staffed to provide a temporary family environment until conditions improve for the children at home, Gilmore said.

The calendar features women from all over campus, one for each month of the school year. This year's calendar was produced by Cannon Clifton and Ryan Bridges, philanthropy chairmen for DU.

The two chairmen are responsible for planning and promoting the calendar.

The calendar is photographed at Snookie's Bar in the spring and sold the following fall at fee-payment time.

"They will take care of the arrangements, and then every guy in the house will sell all the calendars," Gilmore said.

The fraternity was able to raise $3,000 for the Villagers this year.

ΑΓΡ BROTHER TURNS BIG BROTHER

"I tell you there's nothing more than the feeling when you first walk through the door. ... It really makes you feel special."

JUSTIN HURLEY

Volunteer for Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc.

Unlike most siblings, Justin Hurley chose to be a brother.

He is not related to his little brother, but Hurley still tries to spend as much time with him as he can.

Hurley is a volunteer for Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc.

The two spend one to two times a week with each other.

"I find a day during the week — we'll spend most of the afternoon together," said Hurley, a member of Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity and sophomore in animal sciences.

The toughest part of their relationship is finding the time to spend together. Hurley said he really wants to be someone his little brother can rely on.

"I try never to be late, and I try to call him all the time. That's part of what I want to be for him, someone he can rely on and a friend," Hurley said.

Hurley became interested in the program when a member of the house brought home a pamphlet announcing a meeting for the group.

"I really thought that was something I really wanted to do," Hurley said. "Being around little kids and just having a good time."

Tami Carolan, case worker for Big Brothers and Big Sisters, said the first step to becoming a big brother or big sister is to come to one of the information meetings and pick up an application.

Additional requirements to be met are a personal references check, a personality test, two interviews with a case worker and a criminal record check.

The interviews help the case worker get to know the volunteer better.

"We try to learn about the applicant," Carolan said. "It's a chance for me to sit down and get to know the person."

Through the interview, Carolan was able to help Hurley choose a little brother.

"I think he's a wonderful big brother," Carolan said. "He's been very active."

The first time Hurley met his little brother, he said they just went out for an ice-cream cone at Dairy Queen.

Their favorite activity together is fishing in the spring and late fall.

"A lot of the time he'll just come over here and watch a movie," Hurley said.

Hurley said the time and effort he puts in is well worth it.

"I tell you, there's nothing more than the feeling when you first walk through the door or when Tami said how his face lit up when he found out he had a big brother. It really makes you feel special," Hurley said.

Hurley said he has tried to have a positive effect on his little brother, but Hurley's little brother has had an effect on him too.

"He's brought some diversity in my life. It's kind of funny: You get to college where you get to go into all the collegiate activities and stuff. And you do really get all wrapped up in school. For me, it's a way to get away from school and yet have a great time," he said.

BIG 8 BASKETBALL

RUNDOWN

#3 Kansas 16-2 (5-1)

Upcoming games: Feb. 4 Iowa State, Feb. 6 at Okla. State, Feb. 11 Oklahoma, Feb. 14 at Nebraska.

About the Jayhawks: KU has defeated the No. 1 and No. 2 teams in the nation, as the Jayhawks beat UConn. Now the Hawks have three tough games in a row.

#11 Iowa State 17-3 (3-2)

Upcoming games: Feb. 1 at Oklahoma, Feb. 4 at Kansas, Feb.8 at Missouri, Feb 11 at Nebraska.

About the Cyclones: ISU stumbled against Mizzou on ESPN's Big Monday. However the Clones beat K-State for its third Big Eight victory. Saturday's game against KU could be for the title.

#18 Missouri 14-3 (3-2)

Upcoming games: Feb. 4 at K-State, Feb. 8 Iowa State, Feb. 11 Okla. State.

About the Tigers: MU escaped with a win in Ames, but the Tigers have a big game against K-State on Saturday. Then MU has OSU at home, which could be for second place.

Okla. State 13-6 (3-1)

Upcoming games: Feb. 1 at Nebraska, Feb. 4 Colorado, Feb. 8 Kansas, Feb. 11 at Missouri.

About the Cowboys: OSU jumped back into the Big Eight race, and could take the lead with games against KU and MU, who are currently in first and third place.

Nebraska 14-5 (1-3)

Upcoming games: Feb. 1 Okla. State, Feb. 8 Oklahoma, Feb. 11 at Iowa State, Feb. 14 Kansas.

About the Cornhuskers: NU continued to struggle with a loss to Oklahoma in Norman. The schedule doesn't get any easier for the Huskers. They face the top three teams in the league in the next two weeks.

#24 Oklahoma 15-4 (2-2)

Upcoming games: Feb. 1 Iowa State, Feb. 5 at Nebraska, Feb. 8 K-State, Feb. 11 at Kansas.

About the Sooners: OU is playing hot and cold. After losing to K-State in Manhattan, the Sooners came back and whipped the Huskers at home. Ryan Minor is still the Big Eight's leading scorer. Jon Ontjes is the Big Eight's leader in assists. OU's schedule is favorable for the next two weeks. They could easily go 3-1 and be back in the Big Eight race.

Colorado 10-7 (1-5)

Upcoming games: Feb. 4 at Okla. State, Feb. 8 Nebraska, Feb. 11 K-State, Feb. 15 Oklahoma.

About the Buffaloes: Donnie Boyce still is the story for the Buffs. The Big Eight's second-leading scorer is playing through a stress fracture. However, Ted Allen fell to the injury bug and missed the Buff's game at Kansas. Allen was playing well for CU.

Prolonged Journey

Hatcher faced injuries, poor grades, parenthood before leading K-State

Story by Derek Simmons
Design by Jeremy Crabtree and Derek Simmons

Elliot Hatcher smiles often these days.

And smiles haven't always come easy.

But Hatcher is now doing what he has always loved — playing basketball. Playing it well, too.

It wasn't so long ago that the 6-foot guard from Indianapolis was told basketball for him was over. He was told that just walking was skeptical.

Adversity, perseverance and faith can all be associated with Hatcher's prolonged journey from Cardinal Ritter High School to his junior year at K-State.

"It's just been a long battle — uphill," Hatcher said.

As a senior at Cardinal Ritter, Hatcher averaged 28.8 points, 4.5 steals and 6 rebounds a game.

The sixth-leading scorer in Indianapolis high-school history, all-city and all-state selection believed a Division-I scholarship and professional career was in the future.

"I was confident I would play Division-I ball," he said. "All players dream about playing pro basketball. That was always on my mind. I was like 'Well, yeah, I'm going to play pro ball after D-I.'"

Hatcher was attracted to basketball, he said, because of his jumping abilities. His forte was rim-bending, crowd-pleasing dunks.

"I had a 42-inch vertical," he said. "So, everybody always said 'Let's go watch Elliot Hatcher play.' I kind of drove off everyone coming to watch me play to see if I would get a dunk or not."

School became just a ticket to the gymnasium.

By graduation, Hatcher's options for the next level were limited. His academic standing left him with the possibility of attending a junior college or sitting out a year as a Proposition-48 at a university.

"My grades didn't work out," he said. "I played around in high school a lot. I just played basketball and did enough to stay eligible. That's all I wanted to do. And that's what I did.

"When it came time for me to decide where I wanted to go, everybody told me my grades weren't good enough, and that I could go Prop-48 or juco."

Hatcher landed at San Diego Mesa Junior College, but not necessarily by choice.

"I went out there because my baby's mom was in the military," he said. "And I wanted to be one of those dads that was there when my baby was born. I could have gone to a bigger juco or a Prop-48, but I figured it was my responsibility to be there with my little girl."

So without a scholarship or ties to a basketball program, Hatcher traveled to California, where later his daughter, Destiny Marie Hatcher, was born.

Hatcher walked on at San Diego Mesa and, after a solid freshman season, earned a scholarship. Then, one day in a pick-up game, disaster struck.

"Somebody accidentally ran into my knee. ... I ruptured my patellar tendon," he said.

The injury cast Hatcher into depression.

At first, doctors wouldn't tell him the severity of the injury, fearing it would discourage rehabilitation and ambition.

For Hatcher, it was bleak enough.

"I didn't want to eat. I didn't want to get up or anything," he said. "I just laid in bed. I just couldn't believe I got hurt."

The injury was a result of knees still tender from the removal

Cats get break from rugged competition

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

A week off can be helpful for a team that has faced six ranked opponents in a row and have another ranked foe on the horizon.

"This week off will help us stay mentally sharp," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "We need to maintain conditioning along with the mental side."

The Wildcats will next face No. 16-ranked Missouri at Bramlage Coliseum Saturday.

Asbury said even with the week between games, practices won't be any easier.

"I gave them yesterday off," Asbury said on Tuesday. "We will practice normal on Tuesday and Wednesday. Then we will go hard and get ready for Missouri on Thursday and Friday. That should be enough for a team that we just played three weeks ago."

Saturday's game against Missouri is the Cats' first game out of only five in February.

"The schedule was set up kind of strange," Asbury said. "We have a pretty good spacing now, after playing too many in January. February should be a little bit easier."

Now with the Cats sitting at 2-5 in the Big Eight, Saturday's game is critical if K-State has plans on postseason play.

"Every home game is big," Asbury said, "especially after losing once at home already. We have to win at home.

"These games are for positioning for seeding at the Big Eight Tournament. There is a lot of basketball left. Our goal is still to play in the postseason."

That goal of reaching the postseason is reachable, Asbury said.

"It will probably take 17 wins to get into the NCAA Tournament, and it will take 15 wins to get into the NIT. The players seem to believe that they can make it, too.

"We've been right there with everyone."

In the Cats' first meeting with the Tigers last month in Columbia, K-State shot only 17 percent in the first half and trailed 23-16 at halftime. Mizzou also shot only 29 percent from the field.

However, the Cats battled back to make the game close. At one point in the game, the Cats trailed by only a few points, but Missouri ended up winning by 6 points.

In that game, Asbury said both teams' defenses contributed to the poor shooting.

He said he doesn't expect much to be different from this Saturday's match-up.

"They are an unbelievable defensive team," Asbury said. "It's incredible how solid they are. They make you earn every basket.

"That's why they are such a great road team. They play tough defense, and that keeps the crowd out of the game."

A key in stopping the Tigers' attack will be holding Missouri's Paul O'Liney in check. He has been averaging 19.9 points per game.

"He is dangerous," Asbury said. "You don't want him to get the ball back after he passes it. He has such great range."

After facing five ranked team in 14 days, K-State will take a week off before facing another ranked team in No. 18 Missouri.

Kuregian to compete against top 32 collegiate players in country

TODD STEWART
Collegian

By reaching the finals of the Rolex ITA Central Regional last fall, tennis player Karina Kuregian will be representing the K-State women's tennis team in Dallas at the Rolex National Indoor Championships, starting today.

"The top 32 players in the country qualified by reaching the finals of the Rolex regionals," K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said.

Bietau said that the upcoming Rolex Championships is one of the biggest meets in the country and is part of the collegiate women's tennis Grand Slam.

"The Grand Slam consists of the Skytel Clay Court Championships and the Riviera All-American Championships in the fall," Bietau said.

"And the Rolex National Indoor Championships and the NCAA Meet in the spring."

Kuregian warmed up for the meet with a pair of impressive wins last weekend.

She posted a season-opening 6-0, 6-1 victory against Boise State's Maria Jose Capuano and a 6-1, 6-0 win against Creighton's Cheryl Meyer.

The Rolex National Indoor Championships start today and run through Sunday.

■ After taking two out of three last weekend at Ahearn Field House, the rest of the team will be out of action until the weekend of Feb. 10-12.

That's when they travel to Utah for matches against Brigham Young, Utah and Weber State.

The team will have a 12-day layoff before they take their 3-1 record to the three-match weekend in Utah.

▶ BIG EIGHT BASKETBALL

Conference better than expected

4 teams in top 25; new coaches have success in 1st year

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

When the Big Eight Conference had its annual media day in Kansas City last November, there were many questions about how solid the conference would be.

One such question was, how will Missouri rebound from losing four starters who went 14-0 in Big Eight play last season.

Also, will Kansas be able to reload after losing three starters?

The other big question was, how will three Big Eight teams do with new coaches?

Well, now the Big Eight is nearing its halfway point, and most all of those questions have been answered.

Take the Missouri Tigers, for example.

The Tigers are ranked No. 16 with a 15-3 record. They also have a 4-2 record in the Big Eight after defeating Iowa State 80-71 in Ames on Monday.

"We obviously played one of our better games on both ends of the court," Missouri coach Norm Stewart said. "We had good, balanced scoring."

■ Then there comes No. 3-ranked Kansas, which hasn't skipped a beat this season.

Despite losing three starters, the Jayhawks have already defeated the No.1 and No. 2-ranked teams in the nation.

The nation is still talking about how easily the Jayhawks defeated No. 2-ranked and unbeaten Connecticut 88-59 Saturday.

"I was probably more pleased with our work against their press than anything else," Kansas coach Roy Williams said. "Jacque Vaughn was sensational against it. The other guys gave him the right spacing and screened for him when he needed it. But we caught UConn on a day when their shots were not going in."

■ Even the new kids on the block are getting into the winning.

Newcomers Tom Asbury, Kelvin Sampson and Tim Floyd have been coaching like seasoned veterans this season.

Between the three of them, they have a total of 43 wins compared with only 15 losses.

Floyd's Iowa State team is ranked No. 11 in the Associated Press poll and Sampson's Sooner team is ranked No. 24.

Then there is Asbury's K-State team. Before the season started, skeptics said the Cats would be lucky to win even 10 games.

One of those skeptics was Asbury.

"No one would have thought that we are as good as we are now," Asbury said. "I wouldn't say that we are overachieving, but then again I won't say that we aren't."

Now with 11 wins and two conference wins, Asbury said the Cats still have their eyes on postseason play.

"The only true goal as a head coach is to get your team into postseason play. So, that's our goal, and that's our direction," Asbury said. "It's probably going to take 17 wins to get into the NCAA, and probably take 15 to get into the NIT.

"At the beginning of the year, I would have thought that the NIT would have been a stretch."

■ Now that the midway point of the Big Eight is in sight, most of the preseason questions have been answered, and the Big Eight has proved again to be one of the most dominant conferences in the country.

All that remains is the battle for the Big Eight title, which Asbury said could be interesting.

"It's going to be a scramble," Asbury said. "All of the teams are right in there. No one team stands out from the other."

"No one would have thought that we are as good as we are now."

▶ AYCOCK, HAASE AND MEYER HONORED

Angela Aycock, who scored 29 points and had 14 rebounds in Kansas' losing effort against Connecticut on Sunday, has been named the women's Big Eight player of the week for the third time this season.

Jarod Haase and Loren Meyer were chosen for the men's weekly award. Haase scored 20 points against No. 2-ranked Connecticut and 25 points against Nebraska. Meyer led the Cyclones to victories over Northern Iowa and K-State last week. He averaged 23 points per game.

Cats can't keep early momentum

K-State loses early leads, falls to Buffs and Tigers

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

K-State continued to struggle in the first half against Big Eight Conference opponents during the weekend.

Both Colorado and Missouri defeated the Wildcats with first-half runs.

"It's the same thing that's happened all year," K-State post player Shanele Stires said. "We go on that drought where we can't score. It's not that our defense is absolutely terrible. We just shut down offensively. It's us not focusing on what we're supposed to do."

Despite going into halftime down by 12 points against No. 6 Colorado, K-State fought back.

Though the Cats never had the lead, a three-point barrage by Stires and wing Missy Decker got the Cats back into the game, tying it up at 49.

However, after an exchange of layups to move the score to 51-51, Colorado guard Amy Palmer put the Cats away for good.

That's when Palmer hit three straight three-pointers for nine of her 14 points.

Colorado used its size advantage by pounding the ball inside to 6-foot-5 inch center Isabelle Fijakowski and 6-foot-3 inch forward Erin Scholz.

Fijakowski led the Buffaloes in scoring with 22 points, while Scholz added 13.

Stires again led the Cats, dropping in 22 points. Decker followed with 16 points, and freshman Brit Jacobson contributed 10 points.

After falling to the Buffaloes, the Cats traveled to Missouri, where they fell into familiar territory.

They started strong and got the early lead. However, the Cats hit a wall and committed a lot of fouls.

"We ran good offense for the first 10 minutes," said K-State coach Brian Agler. "We were up 21-16, then all of a sudden, we're down 29-21."

The Cats went almost four minutes without a point late in the second half, while the Tigers reeled off 13 straight, mostly from the free-throw line. MU won 70-60.

"We get teams to the free-throw line too often. Some of that is at the end of the game, but we get teams in the bonus too early," Agler said. "People are knocking down their free throws against us, and they get a lot of them."

Stires led all scorers with 29 points.

"She's a player," Missouri coach Joann Rutherford said. "She can shoot the three, then come inside and post you up. She plays the perimeter very well, handles the ball really well, then she'll come inside and post up well. That's what makes her so hard to defend."

Decker again earned double figures, finishing with 12 points. Jacobson added 11.

STIRES' LOG

K-State post Shanele Stires led the Cats in scoring in both games.

- Against Colorado, Stires finished with 22 points.
- Against Missouri, Stires finished with 29 points.

DeCamp calls it quits

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

K-State will finish the Big Eight Conference season without one of its premier players.

DeCamp

Senior wing Shawnda DeCamp, a second-team all-conference selection and last year's leading scorer in the Big Eight, left the team Thursday for personal reasons.

DeCamp was the second player to leave the team this season and the seventh player to leave the team in two years.

"She didn't practice all last week and decided not to play basketball last Thursday," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

Though DeCamp had averaged 14 points per game for the season, her ability to shoot three-pointers made her a target for other teams' defenses, Agler said.

"They found creative ways of keeping her from scoring."

DeCamp had hit only 4.7 points for her last three games.

"She felt like she wasn't being an asset to the team, and she lost her desire to play," Agler said.

"She brought a lot of experience as a senior," teammate Shanele Stires said.

Agler said DeCamp fit the K-State offensive scheme perfectly.

"We run a motion offense, and Shawnda learned to run that offense well," Agler said.

Though DeCamp leaves as the Cats' second-leading scorer, her former teammates said they are ready to move on.

"We're not consumed or worried about it anymore," Stires said following the Missouri game, K-State's second game without DeCamp. "It's behind us, and we have to worry about what's ahead of us."

Agler was asked, "What does a coach do when his star says she no longer wants to play?"

"I just try to be a good listener, try to be supportive," Agler said. "You have to help them make a good decision for themselves and a good decision for the team.

"And I think she made a good decision," Agler said.

DeCamp left her mark in the K-State record books, breaking every school record for three-point field goals made and attempted.

This included a single-game record of nine three-pointers in a game against Detroit Mercy on Nov. 29, 1993.

She also has the season mark of 91 three-pointers, which she set last season. That combined gives DeCamp a career total 135.

- Sophomore Missy Decker, who replaced DeCamp in the starting line-up, has averaged 14 points per game since DeCamp's departure Agler said.

"Missy has really come on," said Agler. "She has really done a good job."

Hatcher went 'against all odds' to recover, play basketball again

of bone spurs to alienate patellartendonitis. The patellar, the tendon Hatcher ruptured, is connected to the knee cap.

"They told me I wasn't supposed to walk or play again. They didn't tell me any of that until after I started to rehab. I started coming back, then they told me. I was already depressed, and they didn't want me to get more depressed."

Eight or nine staphylococcus infections followed the injury, Hatcher said, partly because he didn't want to get up and move around.

"They told me that might have been some of the reason why I got the infections," he said.

Hatcher wasn't progressing. His condition, because of the infections, had become much worse.

That's when his mother, Paulette Hatcher, made the trip from Indianapolis to San Diego to see her son. She had been through a similar encounter.

"She had a stroke when she was young, like 26 or 27," Hatcher said. "She didn't give up. She battled through all the hard times she had. I remember watching and encouraging her through rehab, because she can't use her left arm."

But now Elliot was the one in need.

"After I'd seen what she went through, and after my knee injury, she was there for me," he said. "It just gave me more strength to go against all the odds. And I finally got over it. It took awhile, but I got over it. My mom helped me through it.

"I probably took a lot of my talent for granted at first. I never really worked on my game. I guess it was just God-given. I just played."

Playing basketball again would now demand his effort.

In addition, the operation to resolve the injury was improperly done, forcing Hatcher into yet another surgery.

"I had it fixed, and it was fixed wrong," he said. "I had eight or nine staph infections. And then I had it fixed again. And that doctor brought my knee cap down a lot. It's still like an inch or a half-inch higher than my other one. He brought it down as far as possible."

Hatcher opted to leave California for Grayson County Community College in Texas.

He recovered from his knee injury, averaging 19.8 points, 6.2 assists and 4.5 steals in his sophomore season.

"They told me I was fortunate to be able to play," Hatcher said.

"I rehabbed, but I really just did it on my own," he said. "It's not 100 percent. It's probably not even 90 percent. In juco, after practice, I'd be in the gym rehabbing, or I'd do it before practice."

The averages — scoring, assists and steals — were all still impressive, but Hatcher had lost one of his most important assets: his jumping ability.

Gone was the 42-inch, fan-attracting vertical leap. "It took me down to a 34 or 34-1/2," he said.

"People say, 'Well, you can still jump.' But they don't understand. It's not like it used to be."

It's an element of the game Hatcher had to sacrifice and one he still misses.

"I don't get upset, but in the back of my mind, I'm kind of depressed when another guy goes up for a dunk," he said. "I say to myself, 'I used to be able to do that.'"

The end of Hatcher's sophomore season at Grayson brought a difficult decision.

He could return to California, attend Long Beach State and be just 45 minutes from his daughter and a four-hour flight from his girlfriend, Danielle, who was at the University of Hawaii.

Or, he could journey to K-State, closer to his mother at Indianapolis.

Hatcher opted for the Big Eight Conference and K-State.

"My mom hasn't really been able to come and see me play since I left high school," he said. "So, I figured I'd come to K-State and give her the opportunity to see a couple of games and watch me play.

"Without her, I wouldn't be here. I probably can't give as much to her as she gave me, but I'm going to try. She's done everything for me."

But three states and the 1,200-odd miles separating Hatcher from Destiny, now 4 years old, limits him to just phone calls.

"There are times I might sit up in my room and just think about my little girl," said Hatcher, who has her name tattooed on his left shoulder. "If there are personal things going on, I might sit up there and call my mom.

"Everybody cries sometimes. I'm going to cry for my little girl because that's my baby, and I don't get to see her that much."

K-State and Hatcher have been an agreeable match.

He leads the team in scoring with 14.6 points per game and ranks first in four other categories. In 19 contests, Hatcher has scored in double-digits 17 times.

In K-State's 74-66 win against Oklahoma State, Hatcher's first conference game, he scored 23 points — the most by a newcomer since the New York Knicks' John Starks had 27 in 1988.

Among the league's rookies, Hatcher is first in scoring and field-goal percentage, second in three-point field-goal percentage and steals, and fourth in assists in Big Eight games.

He scored a career-high 32 points in the Cats' win against Auburn.

With all the success and attention, Hatcher said some people might have the wrong impression of him.

"A lot of people look at me and think things that I don't really see," he said. "I'm caring. I love kids.

"I like people. It's just sometimes you just want to be by yourself. With all I've been through with my knee, I kind of became a loner. I had to do things myself.

"I tell people and some of my friends in juco, no matter what, if I'm fortunate enough that my name gets out ... I'm still just the same player I was before. It just means that people are recognizing me, and they are just starting to say my name more. I don't want anybody looking at me differently because I'm not going to change," he said.

Hatcher said he's here just to play, win and maybe help restore K-State's basketball tradition of the past.

"I'm just another person out here trying to make it and do the best I can," he said. "That's how I want people to look at me."

Even with an 11-8 record, even with the Wildcats submerged at seventh in the conference and even with Paulette, Destiny and Danielle miles away, Hatcher still finds room for a smile.

Track finishes 1st at MU

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

The men's and women's track teams combined for a first-place finish at the MU/KSU/KU Triangular Saturday at Columbia, Mo.

K-State beat Kansas 254-246. Missouri finished third with 197. The team totals were calculated by adding together both the men's and women's point totals.

"The way they have this meet set up makes it very difficult for one team to pull away from another team," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said.

The women's squad turned in a strong performance, again led by seniors Gwen Wentland and Jill Montgomery.

Wentland continued to dominate in the high jump as she captured first in the event with a leap of 6 feet 2 inches.

Wentland went on to take second in the long jump behind Montgomery, who took the event with a personal best of 19'1".

Wentland won the triple jump with a leap of 38'4", and Montgomery sprinted to first place in the 55-meter hurdles.

However, the difference in the meet may have been Marshall Grayson.

His jump of 23'8-1/4" inches vaulted him into first place.

More importantly, it created an eight-point turnaround for the team, which was the margin of victory.

"The jump was very significant in putting us in first place," Rovelto said.

High jumper Ed Broxterman jumped for the first time since rupturing his appendix on Dec. 9.

Look beyond hair to own snobbery

Dear Cassandra,

My topic is greeks. For starters, why is it that many girls in sororities have their hair cut the exact same way?

Also, every person from my home town who is now greek were the biggest rejects in school. They came up here and were automatically handed a new personality. You greeks need to take a look in the mirror. My question is, why are you "better" because you're in a house?

Choleric

Dear Choleric,

The greeks aren't the only ones who need a good look in the mirror. There are greeks who are shallow and snobbish, but there are plenty who aren't like that and plenty of non-greeks, like you, who are.

For starters, you sure are hung up on hair for someone who is non-judgmental.

Some greeks probably do think they're better than others. But why don't you get down off your high horse and think about your own ego problem?

▶ LIVE MUSIC

Slackjaw, MU 330 ready for dual show

MARK GOODWIN
Collegian

MUSIC
St. Louis ska band MU330 and Lawrence band Slackjaw will perform at 9 tonight at Berlin in Aggieville.

Drop a class, sell plasma, do whatever it takes, but be sure to get over to Berlin by 9 tonight to see two great bands that don't make it to Manhattan often.

Slackjaw, a Lawrence legend for the last five years, and MU 330, a popular ska band from St. Louis, will offer Manhattan music fans an ear-splitting good time.

The two groups will be playing the last show on their recent mini-tour, which has included gigs in Carbondale, Ill., St. Louis, Lawrence, and tonight, in Manhattan. While some might find the combination of Slackjaw and MU 330 a little odd, the two bands get along well and enjoy playing together.

"Slackjaw is kind of like a big brother to us," MU 330 lead singer Jason Nelson said. "People need to realize Slackjaw is one of Lawrence's greatest natural resources."

Slackjaw said the feeling is mutual.

"We used to play with them all the time at the Rumblebox in K.C.," drummer Dave Melody said.

"All the bands were ska except us, but we got along great. The kids would go nuts, and they didn't even serve any alcohol there."

Melody and the other members of Slackjaw are looking forward to the South by Southwest band competition in Austin, Texas, in March.

The group won a Lawrence competition sponsored by the Note late last year and will have their expenses paid to compete in Austin.

"The last three Lawrence bands to go to the South by Southwest have been signed, so we hope we don't jinx it," Melody said.

"A lot of independent record labels go there to sign bands. We get one 45 minute set. If they like us, they like us, and if not ..."

Melody said Slackjaw will be making only its second appearance in Manhattan.

The band played at Charlie's Neighborhood Bar last month. Melody said the band's performance was well-received by the Manhattan audience.

"We were supposed to play after Spine, but we ended up playing first, so some of our fans didn't make it to the show in time to see us."

Asked to describe Slackjaw's music, Melody paused. "People say we're kind of heavy — I don't know," he said.

"Our lead singer, Skinny D, sounds like he's from hell. You can't always tell what he's saying. Hell, I don't even know what he's saying."

While you might not be able to make out Skinny D's lyrics, you won't have to worry about hearing either of these bands from the back of the bar.

In fact, if you live within two blocks of Berlin, you'll probably hear the show for free whether you want to or not.

But if you really want to have a good time, pay the cover charge, get a little tipsy, and heed the advice of MU 330's Nelson.

"Tonight we dance until we all get a rash," he said.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

A WINNING YEAR '95 Rec Report

Recreational Services, Kansas State University, Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex

Watch for our full page ad on the 1st day of each month for program information and monthly calendar of Recreational Services Events!

Wildcat Workout

Sweat with Your Sweetie

Exercise with a friend! Have you ever noticed how exercising with a friend doubles your commitment to sticking with your exercise schedule? The "Sweat with Your Sweetie Workout" is the perfect opportunity to invite someone to join you in a healthy heart, cardiovascular workout. All afternoon sessions will be combined at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday, February 14, for this Valentine treat. Invite a sweet friend, roommate, significant other, or exercise partner to sweat along with you.

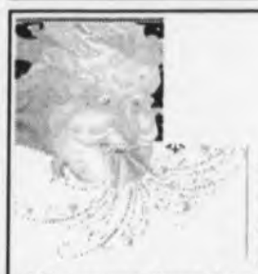
Pool Action

Stroke Mechanics Workshop
Wednesday, February 15, 8:30 p.m.
Certified swimming instructors will critique your swimming style and share techniques to help you improve your stroke. Valid student ID or facility use card required. This is not a learn to swim workshop.

My Favorite Workout

PAM SPAULDING has been using Recreational Services' facilities since 1980. Spaulding, a pharmacist at Lafene Student Health Center, said she primarily uses the pool at the Natatorium for her workouts. She exercises three times a week and said her routine usually consists of swimming laps. Spaulding enjoys using the Natatorium because of the convenient location. "The pool hours work well with my schedule and the lifeguards are very friendly," she said.

Who's Who at Rec Services



JEROME STOKES, senior in psychology, has been an intramural official for three years. Stokes has officiated flag football, basketball, and softball. When he first started officiating, he said he felt nervous. After three years of experience, however, he feels confident in his ability to officiate a fair game. "If you're good, people respect you," he said. Officiating has also provided Stokes with a social outlet, he said. "I can't walk through campus without recognizing people I have officiated for," he said. Stokes, a native of Topeka, Kansas, will graduate this May and hopes to find a job in industrial psychology. He also plans to make time for officiating high school basketball in the future.

BRANDON FORSSBERG, fifth year senior in exercise science, has worked as a fitness consultant for Recreational Services for almost a year. Forssberg provides an orientation of the facilities and the weight and fitness equipment for anyone not familiar with them. "I design fitness programs for people depending of their fitness goals," he said. Forssberg said finding the right fitness program for someone is not always easy. "If they don't like it, they're not going to do it, so I try to make their workouts as enjoyable, yet effective, as I can," he said. Most of the fitness programs he designs include instruction on weight equipment. "I provide my clients with a weight program that includes number of repetitions, number of sets, and lifting technique," he said. Forssberg, a native of Pratt, Kansas, is graduating this May and hopes to pursue a career in physical therapy.

Cold and Flu Season... Exercise could be the best medicine!

Although research is still in the early stages, recent studies have shown that moderate exercise in women at Appalachian State University, resulted in half the occurrences of colds and flu as their sedentary counterparts. It appears that exercise can help give people an edge against infections. In another study, elite women athletes who are in their 70's, were found to have superior immune functions as opposed to sedentary women of the same age. These findings seem to give credence to the opinion that exercise can enhance the functioning of the immune system.

Make time to come to the Rec Complex! We have plenty of equipment and programs to help you get started. We offer a Fitness Consultant who will meet with you individually and help get you on the way to better fitness. Once you start your exercise routine, you'll feel good about yourself and it may even help fight off those cold and flu bugs which are going around.

CONSTRUCTION UPDATE

The ongoing Rec Complex construction brings many questions and frustrations during our most crowded time of the year. This update is to help you understand what is coming with the expansion/renovation.

- Exercise sessions will be held in a new fitness/multipurpose room. The room will have a shock absorbing floor, better acoustics, a better sound system and the program will no longer have to compete for time with basketball.
- There will be four more basketball courts in the new large gym which will accommodate many more players.
- Tired of 14 laps/mile around the current track? There will be a new track at 8 laps/mile with vision to the outside and no conflict with basketball games or exercise session sounds and music.
- The weight and fitness room will bring greater numbers of cardiovascular equipment, as well as free weight and weight machines.
- The entire building will be air conditioned.

Please be patient and understand that more and better fitness and recreation facilities and programs are just around the corner. We are working toward total completion in June.

Fitness/Exercise Consultation

Brandon Forssberg is available on Mon., Wed., and Fri. from 1-6 p.m. and from 8 a.m. to noon on Thurs. for scheduled appointments. Call 532-6950 to request an appointment. Brandon will contact you and set up an appointment. This service is provided free to students and facility use card holders.

Fitness Facts

Winter outdoor exercise requires preparation: don't overdress, wear several layers, warm up and stretch indoors, drink plenty of water, and compensate for the wind. Runners create their own wind chill running into the wind. Combat heat loss by wearing hats, gloves, and appropriate foot wear. As much as 70% of your body heat can escape through exposed hands, feet, and head.

Outdoor Rental

The Outdoor Rental Center will reopen Friday, February 24th! Hours of operation will be Sunday through Friday 4:00 - 6:00 p.m. and Saturday 11:00 a.m. - Noon. We have a complete line of camping equipment including canoes, tents, sleeping bags, stoves, lanterns, back packs, and ice chests. Parking proposal

"Who wants a hideous parking garage in that beautiful place? I walk 25 minutes to campus and think people who live the farthest away should get first dibs on parking permits."

GREGORY EISELEIN
assistant professor of English

"I think it's going to look tacky inside of Memorial Stadium. But, I certainly hope it will be available for both students and staff."

CRYSTAL DEKAT

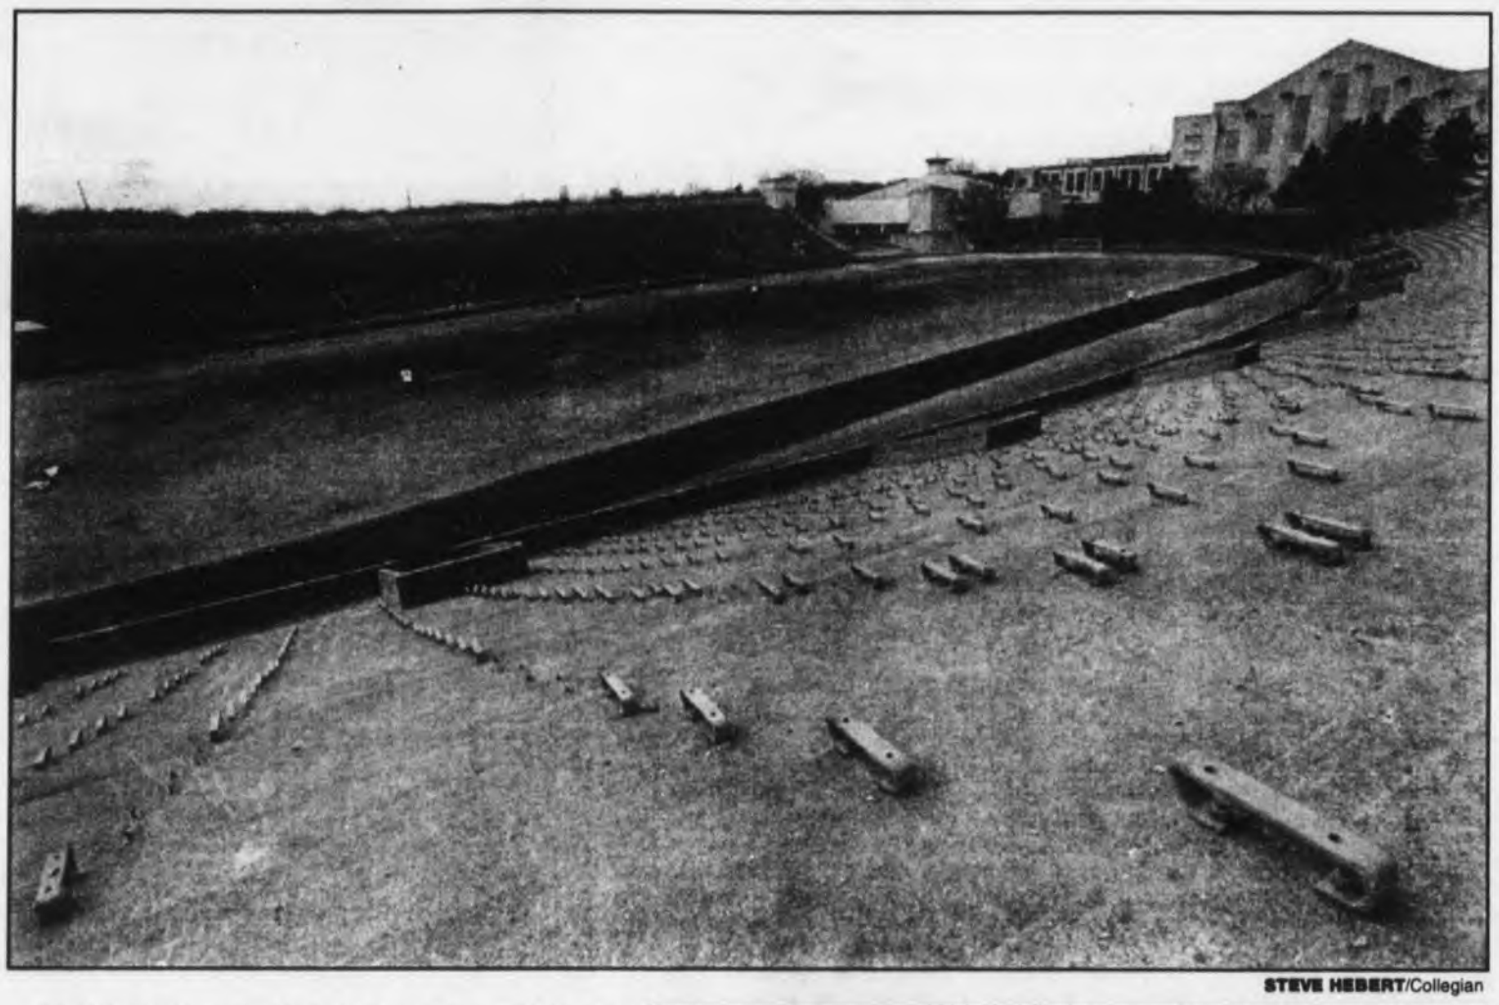
For years people have griped about the parking problem. Now, a solution has been offered.

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

In a plan to meet long-term parking needs, the University's Parking Task Force has recommended construction of a 1,250-car garage.

If approved, the garage will be located within the confines of Memorial Stadium and is scheduled to be completed by 1998.

"We don't want to tear down the stadium," Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said.



Instead, he said the plan would be to build an aesthetically correct, three-level garage that will not rise above the walls of the stadium.

In addition, the stadium will become a full horseshoe on the south side facing Anderson Avenue, completing the original architect's plan for the stadium.

Rawson said the project's estimated $10-million to $12-million cost will be financed by revenue bonds to be repaid with income generated by parking fees and fines.

"That's a ballpark figure," Rawson said, "It may be cheaper, and it may be more expensive."

He said the varying costs for the garage may include building it on special piers because of soil condition and adding roofing to Memorial Stadium to prevent leakage.

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, said the cost would also include relocating the playing field currently within the stadium walls.

Finkeldei said the playing field could possibly be moved near the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex or in place of the K-State Union south parking lot.

Rawson said because of the city's decision to add a turn lane on Anderson Avenue, the south parking lot will be reduced, and turning it into a green space is conceivable.

He also said the task force had researched all possible sites of the garage extensively.

"We have to have parking somewhere, and the University is basically landlocked," Rawson said.

The 10-member task force, which convened in November, included elected student leaders, faculty and classified senates and campus organization representatives.

The group reviewed several options to alleviate K-State's parking situation through the use of a special parking survey, information from other Big Eight universities and consulting with professionals experienced in planning campus garages and operating shuttle systems.

Student Body President Jeff Peterson said Memorial

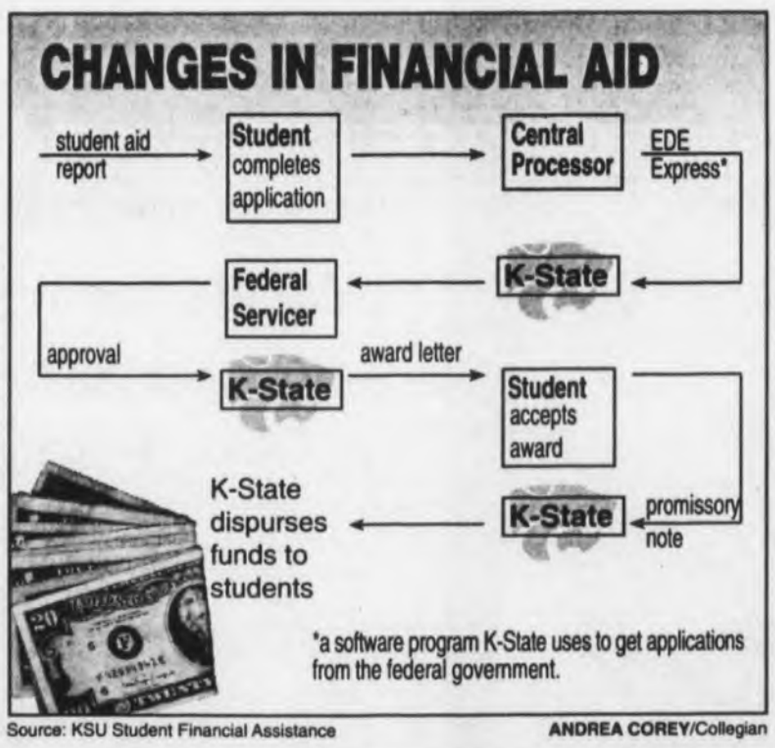
▶ SCHOLARSHIPS

Federal money for aid to be cut

KIMBERLY WISHART
Collegian

State of Kansas Scholarships may be cut out of the federal budget completely because of expected cuts in funding for financial aid.

"This reduction in the State Student Incentive Grant Program could affect 40 to 45 K-State students," Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said. "The federal allocation was reduced by approximately $100,000. This is the only scholarship with federal dollars in it."



Recipients of the State of Kansas Scholarship are eligible to receive $50 to $1,000 a year, which can be renewed for four years. They must be a Kansas citizen attending a Kansas school.

"They had to be designated state scholars with a financial need," Moeder said. "There is a bunch of criteria state scholars need to meet in order to qualify, like a certain ACT score or completing a certain curriculum."

Some students have already felt the effect of the proposed cuts.

"I qualified for two years at $1,000. This year, during the fall, they sent me a letter that said I qualified if I just sent in the $10 application fee." Jenni Stiverson, senior in marketing, said. "I sent it

Student loan control given to K-State for 1995

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

K-State, and not guaranteed lenders, will have control over student loans beginning in fall 1995.

This change, a result of the new programs implemented by the U.S. Department of Education, will affect the student body.

"Seventy percent of all K-State students receive some kind of financial assistance," Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said.

The loan programs that have been introduced are the Federal Direct Student Loan Program and the Direct Loan Consolidation Program.

Through these new programs, the University will have control of the students' money. The money will be sent directly from the federal government to the schools.

Moeder said, "We can guarantee that students' money will be there when they pay fees."

Currently, 104 universities are participating in the first year of the direct loan program, which is completely voluntary.

"The schools love it. It's much simpler. Students get their money much quicker. There is

Food-service employees question job security

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

K-State Union Enhancement Steering Committees are waiting for professional food-service recommendations before deciding the fate of the current food-service program — and its employees.

"There certainly is an awful lot of anxiety," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life and co-chair for the enhancement steering committee.

Union Director Jack Sills said he has had some food-service employees ask him questions about the safety of their jobs. Unfortunately, for now, he said he doesn't have any concrete answers to give them.

"At least we can talk to one another," Sills said.

Bosco, who is also the associate vice president for institutional advancement, said Thomas Ricca Associates, a food-service consultant company, has been hired to provide the committee with professional, unbiased information to use as a basis when making the decision whether to remain self-operational, to contract food service to an outside company, to bring in franchises and brand-name restaurants or to implement a combination of these options.

Bosco said he wishes he could reduce some of the anxiety among food-service employees. He said he hopes the anxiety will be short-term.

When making decisions, he said, the committee will have to respond to student, faculty and University needs first.

"We may not be able to adequately serve our current work force," Bosco said.

Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said 36 full-time workers and about 200 students are employed with food services.

Two of these employees have worked for the Union since 1969, Sisson said.

Among the benefits full-time workers receive are $222 a month in health-insurance benefits, a free meal worth $3.25 every time they work a shift five hours or longer, retirement, paid sick leave and vacation leave dependent on the employee's length of service and paid funeral, jury, military and national holiday leave, Sisson said.

Sisson said employees might not get an equivalent benefit package from an independent company.

▶ SOME DIABETES MAY BE CAUSED BY GENE

NEW YORK — An overactive gene may cause some cases of the most common form of diabetes by interfering with the body's response to insulin, a study suggests. If so, scientists may be able to treat those cases better by developing drugs to shut off the gene, said researcher Dr. Ira D. Goldfine.

More than 95 percent of the nearly 14 million Americans with diabetes have so-called type II or adult-onset diabetes, which often develops after age 30. In type II diabetes, a person's body fails to respond normally to insulin, which is supposed to lower blood sugar levels.

▶ BILL PERMITS POLICE TO HANDLE TRUANCY

TOPEKA — A bill that would allow police officers to pick up children from the street if they are playing hooky drew support Tuesday from both school board members and police officers.

Rep. Joel Rutledge, D-Wichita, told the House Education Committee that police presently are helpless in enforcing the state's compulsory school attendance laws.

The bill would allow police officers to pick up children under the age of 16 during school hours if the youngsters are out of school. Police would be able to take them to school or to a truancy center operated by the school district.

▶ HOT LINE TO KEEP MOTORISTS AWARE

TOPEKA — The state Department of Transportation and Highway Patrol on Tuesday launched their new Kansas Road Condition Hot Line, a toll-free 1-800 service designed to keep motorists aware of possible traffic hazards.

Transportation Secretary Dean Carlson and Patrol Superintendent Lonnie McCollum made the first calls to the service, a prerecorded message that alerts motorists to weather- and accident-related traffic delays or tieups.

KDOT will provide the information, and the Patrol will update the information as needed when changes occur.

▶ FORECASTER FIRED FOR MAKING ON-AIR RACIST REMARKS

DETROIT — A white TV forecaster was fired for some on-air banter in which she likened a gorilla to a black man.

WDIV dismissed Michelle Leigh on Monday, a day after the remark aired. Leigh, 27, a weekend forecaster at the station since July, apologized but said she believed her punishment was too severe.

Near the end of Sunday's 6 p.m. newscast, WDIV ran a preview for a report about "most-eligible bachelors." In the preview, a black woman said she preferred "chocolate-skinned" men.

That was followed by a report on a birthday party for a 415-pound gorilla at a zoo. Then, Leigh turned to anchors Emery King and Asha Blake and asked, "Does that qualify as chocolate-skinned?"

"We felt she crossed the line," Alan Frank, vice president and station manager, said in announcing her firing.

"Her comments last night violated our policies, and clearly they're against our beliefs."

▶ DEFENSE ATTORNEY GOES OUT ON A LIMB

NEW YORK — Embarrassed by its failure to heed warnings of a plot to bomb the World Trade Center, the FBI orchestrated a vast terrorism case against 12 Muslims to salvage its reputation, a defense attorney argued Tuesday.

John Jacobs leveled the accusations in the second day of opening statements in the biggest terrorism trial in U.S. history.

Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, a blind, 56-year-old Egyptian cleric, is accused along with 11 alleged disciples of plotting to blow up New York City bridges and tunnels, the United Nations and an FBI office in what prosecutors called a holy war against the U.S. government.

▶ FBI SETTLEMENT REACHED IN LAWSUIT

LOS ANGELES — The FBI agreed to pay nearly $300,000 to settle a lawsuit from a former agent who claimed her 10-year career was ruined after accusing a superior of sexual harassment.

The 1993 lawsuit by Suzane J. Doucette, 40, was the first lawsuit filed by a female agent against the FBI. It alleged sexual harassment, sex discrimination and retaliation.

In announcing the settlement, FBI attorney Howard Shapiro in Washington said there also was a previously unannounced settlement involving two Orange County agents. The FBI paid agent Heather Power-Anderson $192,500 and agent Boni Carr Alduenda $155,000 last May to settle their sexual harassment lawsuits.

▶ KING'S WIDOW SUPPORTS SHABAZZ

NEW YORK — The widow of Martin Luther King Jr. said Tuesday that federal prosecutors are targeting the daughter of Malcolm X in an attempt to tarnish her father's legacy.

Coretta Scott King joined Malcolm X's widow, Betty Shabazz, other civil rights leaders and about 200 spectators at Riverside Church in Harlem to voice support for Qubilah Shabazz, who is charged in Minneapolis with conspiring to kill Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

Shabazz has pleaded innocent to federal charges of hiring a hit man to kill Farrakhan. Betty Shabazz said last year she thought Farrakhan was involved in Malcolm X's 1965 assassination.

Students jump for Velcro

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

About 150 students ran, bounded up on an inflatable platform and stuck themselves to a giant velcro wall as part of a free event sponsored by the Union Program Council Wednesday afternoon.

Velcro-jumping was easy for some students, but for others, like me, it was a big challenge.

After watching students slip and slide, crash into the inflatable cushions and get stuck upside down, I was contemplating whether I wanted to remain an observer or give the sport a try.

For a while, I watched the sight from the balcony and then later ventured downstairs toward the jumping area, where seven students strapped in neon suits were lined up to perform the ultimate Velcro jump.

Before I climbed into a suit and joined them, I filled out a waiver form in case I broke, twisted or bruised anything.

I then strapped on a suit and took the advice of an experienced jumper.

"All you have to do is run, jump up on the black thing and do whatever acrobatics you can without killing yourself," Dan Merson, fifth-year psychology student, said.

Merson, who had skipped class to improve his Velcro-jumping technique, ran, leaped onto the black platform and stuck flat to the wall with little difficulty.

It looked like fun, so despite the butterflies in my stomach, I sped across the linoleum floor in my socks and hopped up on the inflatable platform. Although I didn't have enough height to bounce up and stick against the wall, I threw myself against the Velcro wall anyway.

I was a little humiliated at first, but after a few seconds, the embarrassment faded, and I wanted to try it again.

Sean Beaver, vice president of UPC, said he Velcro-jumped 72 times Wednesday.

"I think it's a blast," Beaver said. "A lot of people are coming back for more."

Beaver said he thought they should have naked Velcro-jumping.

"I think we should do it nude, but then what are you going to stick to? I don't think I want to know the answer."

Beaver said he enjoyed the event.

"Things like this are what I'm going to remember most about college," Beaver said.

Christy Drake, chairman of the UPC special events committee, said UPC brought in the inflatable Velcro wall because of the success of the laser quest and the virtual-reality attractions in the fall semester.

Drake said she was pleased with the turnout.

"There's been a pretty steady crowd going through all day long, which is what we had hoped for," she said.

Drake said the attraction was rented for four hours Wednesday

Local band makes it big, rocks ABC tribute to singer

ERIC MELIN
Special to the Collegian

EDITORS' NOTE: What follows is a firsthand account of the life of a rock band on the road. It is the documentary of Truck Stop Love, seen through the eyes of Eric Melin, drummer and one of the band's founding members. The other members of the band are Brad Huhmann, bassist; Matt Mozier, vocalist and guitarist; and Rich Yarges, vocalist and guitarist.

It covers the time period during which the band spent recording an ABC special music tribute to Tom Petty, scheduled to air on ABC channel 49 (channel 5 in Manhattan) at 12:40 a.m. Saturday.

Truck Stop Love is now in Memphis, Tenn., where band members are recording their first full-length album.

10:30 a.m.

Well, tonight's the night. Yesterday at 8 a.m., we boarded a plane for a 5-1/2-hour trip to Los Angeles, courtesy of the record label.

There wasn't much to do on the plane, so Brad and I tried to figure out how many Heinekens it takes to get drunk at 20,000 feet.

Our A&R guy (arts and repertoire — this guy acts as a liaison of the record company to the bands. His job is to sign the bands and help them through the system), Micheal Roth, picked us up at the airport and took us to his apartment.

We had an informal meeting and talked about the new record, how much money they're spending on it, what songs we're doing (we have to choose from 35 or so), and what the hell we want on the cover.

▶Later, we went to a huge used-music store, and I picked up two great old Elvis Costello records for 92 cents each. Then we rented some movies and some liquor was drunk.

Tonight we go to the House of Blues (Dan Aykroyd's club — "Doctor Detroit" rules!) to play for the "Tribute to Tom Petty" night with four other bands on the tribute record.

There's basically going to be a buttload of industry types there, checking everyone out, and the night is being filmed for ABC in Concert to be aired Friday.

They still don't know whether Petty is going to be there or not. Apparently his house got flooded or something. (I can just see it now: Tom Petty in his basement, soaking up water into a bunch of buckets.)

▶We're getting ready to go to Scotti Bros. (our record label) for a bit, and then to the club to do interviews (something I'm not too good at, not having a lot of practice) with the Westwood One and MPI radio networks. ABC crews and CNN will also be there, filming soundchecks.

We couldn't fly my drums or the amps out here, so we'll all be playing on someone else's equipment, something I'm kind of hesitant to do. At least I have my snare drum and the others brought their guitars.

Every time Micheal sees us play, something breaks. He's a damn jinx. He saw us at the CMJ convention in New York, and Rich's tuner broke. He saw us at the Mississippi River Music Festival in St. Louis, and Matt busted strings on two guitars in 45 minutes.

Something's bound to go wrong tonight. If nothing terribly sad and wrong happens, though, I am prepared to kill all evil.

Jan. 10
9:15 a.m.

I am now sitting aboard our plane back to Kansas City, tired and in a bit of pain. Last night was just another event in a long string of surreal events that began with our MTV Rockin' Campus Bash fiasco in Texas a couple of years ago.

It continued when we met our labelmate "Weird" Al Yankovic in the studio next to ours while recording our EP.

We did at least four radio and TV interviews yesterday. The ABC one was the worst — your typical band-hell questions, plus some new terrible ones. ("What are some of your new song titles?") I tried to spice that one up a bit, but probably ended up looking like more of an idiot. Oh well, I guess we'll see.

Getting interviewed by VH-1 ranks up there in the surreal category for sure. Maybe we'll be on after a James Taylor video.

▶The House of Blues was a trip. From the outside, it looks like a tin shack, but once you get inside, it's a damn palace! It's three levels high with valet parking, a lot of suits and 20 or more scrubs wandering around. They were the bands.

The green room was on the top floor, and it was stocked with beer, sodas and water, plus a lovely deli tray. Spinal Tap jokes ("You keep folding the bread, and it keeps breaking!") were aplenty.

That was where I spent most of my time calming my nerves, along with the other bands. We had played a show with Everclear once before in Chicago, and we had a campus show rained out in Carbondale, Ill, with Throneberry, so we had almost met them too. The band aMiniature was really cool, and so were the guys in Engine Kid, who went first.

The club was already packed when they started, and we went downstairs to watch them. During Everclear's set, we went back upstairs, and the makeup girl was racing around looking for us.

She was powdering people's faces so they didn't look pale and dead on television. I tried to avoid her, as my punk rock ethics suggested, but I finally relented.

There was something really funny about a bunch of guys in T-shirts and jeans getting their faces powdered, and I figured I would never get the chance again. I sat down in the chair and the first thing she did was go straight for the zit on my chin. Tee hee.

▶Right before we went on, I didn't feel too nervous, but I

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Finally, K-State may have a parking solution

The campus has limited space to grow, and putting the garage on an already existing lot would lessen the amount of parking spots needing to be added.

The members of the Parking Task Force, much to everybody's surprise, have made their decision about how to fix our parking problem.

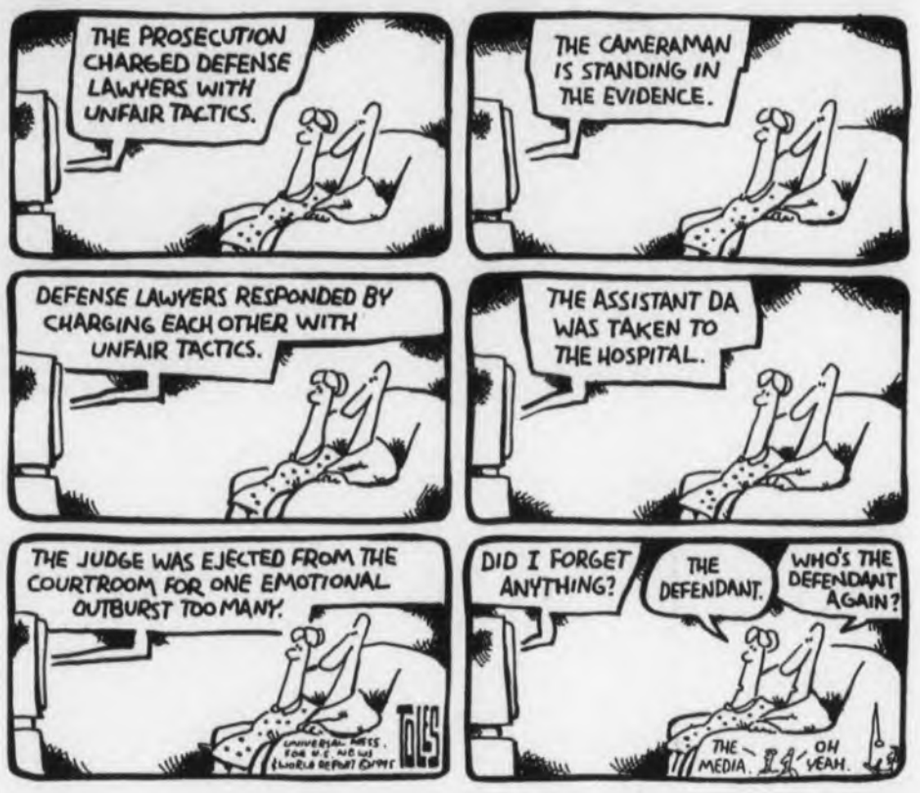
It is a good plan, and it makes the most of a difficult situation.

The idea of a parking garage in the middle of Memorial Stadium seems goofy. But at least they hope to design the building so it does not look like a glaring pimple on the butt of the University.

Many people, the task force members said, balk at the idea of tearing down Memorial Stadium.

While they could never please all of the people all of the time, the plan will go a long way to meet opposing needs.

The campus has limited space to grow, and putting the garage on an already existing lot would lessen the amount of parking spots needing to be added.



Thomas Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said it was the cheapest idea — but not a cheap one.

The garage will cost $10-12 million for the new garage — definitely not cheap.

But it is better than $500,000 a year for a shuttle, and it is close to the K-State Union, the hardest place to find a parking spot.

It will help the future of K-State.

BACK TO BACK

Today's topic: the death penalty

"Back to Back" is a pros-and-cons column by John Hart and Dan Lewerenz that is featured bi-weekly on the Collegian opinion page. The feature represents the opinions of the columnists only.

Death penalty serves justice to victims

JOHN HART

The world celebrated the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camp Auschwitz last week, and no other place more aptly embodies the horror of Hitler's Final Solution in which 6 million Jews died.

Supporters of the death penalty believe the people who conducted these atrocities against the human race deserved to be executed.

Opponents of the death penalty argue otherwise.

The Kansas Legislature considered the issue of the death penalty last spring and correctly decided to reinstitute the measure.

Now conservative lawmakers in both chambers of the Legislature are considering widening the scope of the new law.

The arguments that justified the execution of the people who were behind the Holocaust also justify the current death-penalty law in Kansas.

When a murder occurs, there is nothing anyone can do to fully repay such a devastating loss.

However, the state should do everything in its power to administer justice in such a circumstance.

What does it say about the value of Stephanie's death when the man who tortured, raped and killed her is provided with three square meals a day and cable television?

Almost two years ago, a friend from my high-school graduating class, Stephanie Schmidt, was brutally raped and murdered near Pittsburg.

Her murderer, Donald Gideon, was a convicted sex offender.

Stephanie's parents, Gene and Peggy Schmidt, led a courageous battle to toughen sex-offender laws and also pushed for the new death-penalty law in Kansas.

This case provides a good example of why Kansas made the right decision in renewing the death penalty.

Gideon received the toughest sentence in Kansas — the 'Hard 40,' or 40 years before becoming eligible for parole.

Yet even in that case, the murderer is in a far better position than the deceased victim.

What does it say about the value of Stephanie's life when the man who tortured, raped and killed her is provided with clean clothes, three square meals a day and cable television?

Gideon will enjoy all of those things while, in the words of Stephanie's father, "my daughter is in a ditch."

By not executing criminals like Gideon, the state is preserving a life that has devalued all life.

Gideon and others like him have already sentenced their victims to death.

Executing murderers removes an element from society that has held the value of all life in contempt.

This serves to uphold the value of not only the victim's life, but all life.

Death-penalty opponents frequently portray the death penalty as a barbaric "eye for an eye" approach to criminal justice.

While this philosophy is no longer taken literally in most parts of the world, our society still follows the spirit of this law.

When a crime occurs, an important function of our criminal justice system is to administer a fair and just punishment for the crime committed.

The simple formula is that the severity of the punishment increases with the severity of the crime.

Of course, when a murder occurs, the murderer should not be executed in the manner in which he or she killed his or her victim.

However, the criminal should pay a penalty that is roughly equal to the loss incurred by the crime.

In most cases of murder, where life is so grotesquely cheapened, the only punishment that can even approach that tremendous loss is execution.

When a crime occurs, an important function of our criminal justic system is to administer a fair and just punishment for the crime committed.

With the case of the Holocaust, it is impossible to even fathom a punishment fitting of the crime.

Execution certainly is the most fair and just punishment available after a heinous crime occurs.

Dan's response

The Holocaust epitomizes the inhumanity a society is capable of. And the rape and murder of Stephanie Schmidt is undeniably tragic.

But taking the lives of the perpetrators will not resolve either.

Emotionally, the death penalty is very compelling.

When we see the worst one individual can do to another, there is an insatiable urge to retaliate in kind.

If my sister were raped and murdered, a part of me would want to see her assailant dead.

But that would not bring her back. And it would not constitute justice.

The arguments in favor of the death penalty appeal to us because they pull our emotional strings, ignoring our rational ones.

In seeking "fair and just punishment," one must look beyond a simple analysis of severity.

One must ask: "What is accomplished?"

Does the criminal learn anything?

Does the victim receive any recompense?

Is society better off?

The answer to all of these questions is "no."

Especially if the accused is not even afforded the right to a fair trial.

There is a time to listen to your heart and a time to listen to your head.

When a life hangs in the balance, give me a rational thinker any day.

Capital punishment accomplishes little

DAN LEWERENZ

Last year, the Kansas legislature brought back the death penalty, and this legislative session will likely see the introduction of a bill seeking to expand the scope of last year's legislation.

Not only would this be a mistake, but we should rescind last year's legislation and eliminate the death penalty altogether.

In an environment in which the vast majority of the population supports the death penalty, arguments against it are often written off as "soft on crime" or supporting criminals' rights over the rights of the victim.

But the concept of rights is essential to the argument against the death penalty.

American justice, despite its shortfalls, is based on the premise that an individual is innocent until proven guilty. But allowing a death penalty violates that most basic of concepts.

To allow the death penalty to work, those with a moral objection must be removed from the jury. After all, if I feel that that death penalty is the same as murder, and by finding an individual guilty I know that I am condemning that person to death, then I cannot contribute to a guilty verdict.

Not only would this be a mistake, but we should rescind last year's legislation and eliminate the death penalty

To do so would make me a murderer, no better than the accused.

Because of this glitch, prosecutors are allowed to screen for a "death-qualified" jury, or one in which none of the jurors has a moral objection to the death penalty.

How does this violate the rights of the accused? (Remember, he is not a criminal until after the trial, if he is found guilty.)

Given the same evidence, "death-qualified" juries are more likely to find an individual guilty than non-"death qualified" juries.

This means that, even before the trial begins, the cards are stacked against the defendant, regardless of the evidence.

Of course, the bias of the jury is irrelevant unless and until a mistake is made. But those mistakes are made. And sometimes we don't find out until it is too late.

In our nation's past, we have executed more than a dozen individuals who, it was later discovered, had not committed the crime for which they were convicted.

And if that's not injustice, I don't know what is.

Furthermore, the death penalty fails to meet the goals of the criminal justice system. For obvious reasons, it fails to rehabilitate the criminal. ("Your honor, X has been a model citizen since his burial.")

But neither does it provide better protection for society. Outside of the occasional prison break, someone who spends his life in prison is no more of a danger to society than the individual given a lethal injection.

Finally, the vast majority of social science research indicates that the death penalty has no deterrent value.

While one would think that fear of execution would prevent one from committing a capital crime, most murders are heat-of-the-moment affairs during which rational thinking is not a top priority.

And most people who plan a murder also plan to get away with it, rationalizing away any concern for punishment.

The only thing the death penalty accomplishes is death. There is no justice or redemption for the criminal.

There is no restitution for the friends and family of the victim.

There is only a dead body. Another dead body.

And that is what our criminal justice system seeks to avoid in the first place.

John's response

What our criminal justice system seeks to achieve is justice, and the death penalty is just.

Death-penalty opponents expend a lot of time and energy offering improvements in the system but little time explaining why it is wrong to execute the perpetrators of the Holocaust, for example.

The moral question hasn't changed since that time: is it morally permissible to execute a person?

This is the same question facing Kansans today.

Arguing about improving the jury-selection process in death-penalty cases doesn't help us answer this timeless moral question.

Suggesting that the death penalty is bad because it's not a good deterrent is also sidestepping the moral question. At any rate, the purpose of the death penalty is not necessarily (but hopefully) to be a deterrent, but to administer justice.

Outside of the occasional prison break, someone who spends his life in prison is no more of a danger to society than the individual given a lethal injection.

The most unfortunate aspect of the death penalty when practically applied in America is the fact that a few innocent people have been executed.

However, all human institutions are imperfect, and if we failed to take decisive action because of this, our society would be paralyzed.

Innocent people are convicted of other crimes, but we should not throw out our entire criminal justice system. When American planes bombed Germany in World War II, everyone knew innocent civilians would be killed, but this did not halt our mission to crush the evil Nazi regime. In almost all cases of capital punishment, there is justice for the criminal. Furthermore, the criminal can be redeemed.

Redemption is partly a theological issue. I believe it's possible for a person to be executed but still be forgiven and enjoy eternal life. When Jesus was on the cross, he said to the man next to him, who was also being crucified: "Today you will be in paradise."

Also, in many cases, there is restitution for the friends and family of the victim, who can live in peace because justice has been served.

The Gambler & The Bookie

Gambling can be recreational or a way of making some real money, but it can become a big problem

EDITORS' NOTE: The names in this story have been changed, because of the sensitive and illegal nature of its content.

Joe: a bettor

Mark: a bookie whose father is also a bookie

Bob: a former bookie

What is America's biggest sport? It's not football. It's not basketball. And, after this season, it's not baseball.

All you have to do is reach in your pocket to find the answer.

It's gambling.

"It's such a major business because there's so much money in it," Bob, a former bookie, said. "Look at Vegas. America loves to gamble."

Bob started his business when he started college. He started out doing a lot of gambling on his own, then he thought he'd go small-time with some buddies of his, he said.

It got bigger.

"When someone finds out about it, he tells his friends, who tell their friends," Bob said. "It just grows from there."

For Mark, another bookie in the area, it was more of a family tradition.

"My dad is a bookie in California. When I was 12 or 13 years old, I had to answer phones for my dad," he said.

Mark started his own business when he came to K-State, and he hasn't had many money problems since then, he said.

"Last year I made $10,000. That was only during school time," Mark said. "When I go home, I make a few more bucks."

Bookies rely on the media. Bob said he can get the "lines" for games — the point margin by which one team is expected to win — from any sports page.

The lines come from the big bookies in Vegas. These estimates help to even out the scoring advantage of one of the teams.

Bets are usually placed through a coding system over the phone. That makes it easy and safe for everyone, Mark said.

Bob also emphasized the importance of the telephone.

"I get a few calls during the week, a few on Saturday, but the most come on Sunday," he said.

Especially Super Bowl Sunday. He said this year he received 200 to 300 calls in one afternoon.

"It's a constant headache," Bob said. "The phone's always ringing off the hook."

Not all of those callers want only to bet on the game itself. Some will bet on anything.

"There are so many things to bet on," Bob said. "The first person to score a touchdown, the first team to fumble, even the coin toss."

What's in it for the bookies? Bookies typically make a 10-percent profit — known as "juice" — on bettors' losses, Bob said.

For example, if someone bets $100 on San Diego and San Diego loses, the bookie would take $110 from the bettor.

Both Mark and Bob said collecting the money is the hardest part of the business for college bookies.

Big bookies, those who make $100,000 per weekend, can afford big bodyguards.

College bookies can't. So how do they collect?

"Anyway I can get it, I'll have it," Mark said. "I call them a lot, visit them, create a payment plan, break it up into small sums."

To avoid debt, bettors have to learn to play it safe, Joe, a bettor, said.

"If I lose, I quit. But from what I've seen, that's the exception to the norm," he said.

One dangerous practice bettors engage in is what is known as "chasing," or following a lost bet with a bet of equal value in an attempt to break even.

An example of chasing is a bettor who loses $50. So the next time, he bets $50, trying to break even.

If he loses that time, his debt is $100, and the cycle continues.

Mark said he never allowed that to happen.

"I never got in the minus. But honestly, that's just luck," he said. "I knew guys that lost $8,000 before they got out."

Bob said a lot of money in the Manhattan area is won and lost on K-State and the Kansas City Chiefs because most people will bet for their local teams.

"The thing that kills most people is betting with their hearts. There are tons of stupid bettors out there," he said.

Why do people bet on something when the odds of winning are at best 50-50?

"Some people do it to win money; some do it to make things interesting. You just got to bet with what you can lose," Bob said.

That's hard for some bettors, Joe said.

"It's really addictive," he said. "I've seen a lot of older students who don't have the money, so they keep trying to win it back."

Besides being put in the hole, bettors and bookies must worry about being put in jail.

The minimum penalty for illegal betting in Kansas is classified as a Class-B, non-person misdemeanor, Mary Horsch, director of communications for the state attorney general, said.

With no prior record, a person could get probation, she said. The maximum penalty depends on the district attorney, she said.

Of course, it helps to have connections.

"My dad has one of the lieutenants in the LAPD betting with him," Mark said. "It's really hard for the cops to get inside it."

Being a bookie eats up a lot of time.

Mark has to watch the headline news ticker, answer phone calls, keep track of the lines and do his homework.

But it has its advantages.

"It's a good way to make easy money, but you got to know what you're doing," he said.

"You can't be trusting — if you are, they'll take you for everything you got," he said.

Kuregian to compete in national championships

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

Since the age of 5, Karina Kuregian has spent time around the tennis court.

"I learned tennis at a very young age," Kuregian said. "My father is a tennis coach. I pretty much got started that way. I was just hanging around tennis courts watching other people play."

With her father's assistance and many years of practice, tennis has paid off for Kuregian, the No. 1 singles player at K-State.

Not only has she brought attention to Wildcat tennis with her No. 9 ranking in the Rolex Collegiate poll, but she has earned her shot at national recognition.

Kuregian

Kuregian, K-State's first tennis all-American, will show the country exactly what she has starting today at the Rolex National Indoor Championships in Dallas. The tournament is set up for the top 32 players in the country and is scheduled to run until Sunday.

Kuregian will start match play tat 9:30 a.m. today against Tyler Junior College's Laura Nhavene, who is the national small-college singles champion.

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said the team has dramatically improved since Kuregian, a 5-foot-9-inch junior from Yerevan, Armenia, joined the squad.

He said he found the tennis star through a man in New Jersey, who was responsible for bringing Kuregian into the country.

"I got in touch with Karina through another coach, actually," Bietau said.

"I kind of recruited her through him."

Kuregian opted for K-State after turning down offers to attend Tennessee and Arizona State.

"Besides tennis, I think Karina chose Kansas State because of our intensive English language program," Bietau said.

"Her English wasn't very good when she came in. It was good for someone like her to get in and improve in time to meet NCAA regulations."

Kuregian brought an impressive résumé to K-State. She competed on the Armenian National Team and captured the silver medal at the World University Games in mixed doubles.

She also won the Soviet Union Cup in the doubles division in 1991.

As a sophomore in 1993, Kuregian had the most successful fall in K-State history, finishing with a 17-3 singles mark, 8-2 doubles record and a ranking in the nation's top 20.

Included in that season was her showing at the Riviera All-American Championships.

Kuregian became the first player ever to start in the qualifying rounds and advance all the way to the quarterfinals, winning a record nine consecutive matches.

Things haven't always been bright for Kuregian at K-State, though. She missed the majority of last year's spring season because of a serious back injury. She underwent off-season back surgery but made a return trip to the court during the fall 1994 season.

"It was pretty difficult for me to get back into tennis shape," Kuregian said.

"You kind of have that fear. You always know that there is something in your back that has bothered you before. I actually feel like I am in much, much better shape than I was last year. I mean mentally, physically and all around."

Kuregian said she hopes her playing career does not end here at K-State.

"My main goal is to graduate first," Kuregian said.

"After everything is done, I will see how I feel. I want to see if I can stay in good physical shape," Kuregian said.

"If so, I would like to try to go professional after my days are done at K-State."

Golf teams ready for season

Teams want better success in spring season

K-State's men's and women's golf teams saw signs of success in the fall season, but they are looking for better things in the spring.

The highlight of the men's golf team in the fall season was the first-place finish in the D.A. Weibring Intercollegiate tournament in Bloomington, Ill.

"It was an 18-team tournament. Nebraska got second — we were 10 shots up after the first round and never lost that. So that was pretty impressive, I thought," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

The reason for the team's success in the fall season was the playing of junior Troy Halterman.

He has finished in the top 15 in four of the five tournaments he has played in, including two straight first-place finishes in the D.A. Weibring tournament and the Texas-Arlington Invitational.

"Troy had a great fall. Out of the five tournaments he played in, he had a chance to win two of them with nine holes to go, and two other tournaments he did win," Elliott said.

"Troy is also an academic all-Big Eight or all-American this year."

Elliott decided to move his off-season workouts to the morning instead of the afternoon.

This switch will free up time in the afternoon for the team to play if the weather cooperates. If the weather is bad, the team practices hitting balls and drills in the evening at the Brandebury Complex. The team is ready to get back in full swing for the spring season starting Feb. 7 for outdoor practice.

The first meet for the golf team is the Southwest Classic in Austin, Texas, on Mar. 13-14.

"I think it's mentally a big tournament; we come out playing good," said Jason Losch, junior in construction science management."

"Look for the best in every tournament. We need to use it as a starting point and get ready for the rest of the season."

The women's golf team struggled on the golf course in the fall season but not in academics for the first semester.

Out of 12 women, the team's average was a 3.2 GPA.

"They're real confident in the classroom," Elliott said. 'I guess the biggest thing they need to gain is confidence in their game."

"The biggest thing they need to gain is confidence in their game."

MARK ELLIOTT
K-State golf coach

The best finish for the women's team in the fall season was placing third in the Husker Golf Classic.

In the tournament, senior Donita Gleason tied for sixth place, and junior Staci Bush placed ninth.

The missing link in the women's golf team in the fall season was Jacque Wright.

She played in the first two tournaments but missed the last three because of eye problems. Last year, Wright was the first alternate for the NCAA Women's Regional.

"She's back. That should be a big plus for the women's team," Elliott said.

The women's team started practices yesterday.

The team's first tournament action will be the Lady Bronc Golf Classic in Harlingen, Texas, on Mar. 20-22.

"I think we'll do really well in some good upcoming tournaments we are going to play in," Dallas Cox, senior in elementary education, said.

Stockton breaks all-time assists record

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALT LAKE CITY — John Stockton, wasting little time in setting the record and ending what was fast becoming an ordeal for him, became the NBA's career assist leader Wednesday night.

With a pass to Karl Malone, who scored from the left corner, the Utah Jazz guard set the record with 6:23 to go before halftime in a game against the Denver Nuggets.

The basket gave Stockton his 9,922nd assist, putting him ahead of Magic Johnson. Stockton entered the game 11 assists shy of the mark, and he produced less than half the number of assists he usually gets in an entire game.

The game was stopped after the milestone assist, and a crowd of some 20,000 at the Delta Center stood and cheered for several minutes. Stockton was awarded the game ball, and the Jazz bench emptied to congratulate him.

Stockton, who has grown weary of the hoopla surrounding the record and only begrudgingly speaks of it, tied the mark 1:02 earlier, slicing to the basket and passing to Tom Chambers for a 16-foot jumper.

His record performance came in his 860th pro game. Johnson set his assist total in 874 games from 1979 to 1992 with the Los Angeles Lakers.

"He's by far the best floor leader there is today," Johnson said. "He always doubted himself. That made him work harder to prove himself to himself and others."

It took just 10-1/2 seasons — all at Utah, and the past seven as the NBA's assists leader — for Stockton to close in on Johnson.

The 32-year-old Jazz playmaker was averaging 12.2 assists per game — up from his career rate of 11.5 — as Utah, making its best start ever, sought a franchise-record 14th consecutive victory at the Nuggets' expense.

But the Jazz, which could tie the Lakers' NBA record for road wins with a 16th victory Thursday night in Houston, has also benefited from Stockton's defense and long jumpers.

As of Wednesday night, he was sixth in the league in steals, with 2.12 an outing. From three-point territory, he was shooting at a 45-percent clip, seventh in the NBA.

Stockton overtook Oscar Robertson, who had been No. 2 on the all-time assists leaders list, by dishing out 14 scoring passes in a 111-94 victory last Saturday over New Jersey.

On Monday night, he added 14 more assists in a 115-80 victory over Minnesota to set the stage for Wednesday night.

A big part of Stockton's success has been having a great power forward — Malone — to pass to.

The Stockton-Malone combination has been the core of the Jazz offense. Malone, so often a target of Stockton's looping feeds under the basket, has taken advantage of Stockton's passing ability to become Utah's all-time scoring leader and recently became just the 19th NBA player to top 20,000 career points.

As a gym rat growing up in Spokane, Wash., Stockton quickly realized the best way for a small guy to get into games was to be a good passer. He grew to a height of 6 feet 1 inch and mixed his passing, jumpers and lightning-quick layups to become league MVP in his senior year at Gonzaga Prep.

He next starred at Gonzaga University, averaging 20.9 points per game his final season.

Cut from the Olympic tryouts, Stockton was surprised to be drafted by the Jazz in the first round of the 1984 draft.

"I literally had no expectations coming in," he said.

"I didn't think I'd make the NBA."

He was wrong, taking over as starting point guard in his second season.

Stockton would eventually play in the Olympics as a member of the original Dream Team, which won the gold medal in 1992.

▶ WENTLAND NAMED BIG EIGHT TRACKSTER OF THE MONTH

K-State senior Gwen Wentland has been named Big Eight trackster of the month.

Wentland established a new world record in the pentathlon high jump in January.

Her leap 6'4-1/4" at the Wildcat Pentathlon Jan. 20 bettered her own world-record tying jump of 6'4",which she established at the Winter Pentathlon in December.

Wentland is currently ranked in the top 10 in four categories of the Big Eight Season Best Performance List.

No. 1 high jump;
No. 1 pentathlon;
No. 2 triple jump, and No. 5 long jump.

Wentland has received an invitation to compete in the high jump at the Melrose games in New York City.

Signees to be announced officially today

K-State football coaches have been on the road recruiting the best possible athletes for next year's team.

Today, the football office will officially announce the signings of new recruits. Throughout the recruiting stages, K-State has received 16 oral commitments.

A big commitment was made by quarterback Cody Lee Smith, who transferred to K-State from San Antonio Community College in California.

Smith will vie for the starting quarterback position with Matt Miller, replacing the quarterback duties of all-Big Eight selection Chad May.

Smith is one of the four verbal commitments who played at a junior college this past fall.

Other names who are orally committed are: Eric Janeau, 6'3", 325-pound offensive tackle from Garden City Community College; Niam Mills, 6'4", 290-pound lineman out of Long Beach St. Community College; and Jabbar Williams, 6'3", 235-pound linebacker.

Twelve commitments from the high-school ranks are expected to sign at K-State.

The signees are from many different areas including Florida, Texas, Illinois, Missouri and Kansas.

Local commitments from the state of Kansas include: Lamar Chapman, 6'2", 185-pound defensive back from Liberal; Manhattan High product Jason Hogaboom, 6'2", 270-pound defensive lineman; Mark Simoneau, 6'1", 215-pound linebacker out of Smith Center; and Martez Wesley, 5'9", 175-pound receiver from KC Schlagle.

Juggling 2 children and a busy schedule means Maribeth Sweet has

Three lives to live

Enjoying some time together, Maribeth Sweet and her five-year old daughter, Laura, joke around on a Friday evening. Sweet tries to reserve Friday evenings for "do nothing" time in which she can spend some time relaxing with her children.

It's 5 a.m., and Maribeth Sweet is just getting up to get herself and her two children ready for school.

Her schedule is packed with family, class and work, but Sweet's ambition remains focused. She wants to succeed in school.

"I take it more seriously than the average 19- year-old," Sweet, junior in speech pathology, said. "I have more responsibilities. There's no one else responsible for my financial situation."

She didn't expect to be a single mother, but she said it's something she has dealt with. She knows her life is different from that of traditional students.

"Sometimes I envy them. Many of them have more spare time. My one day is like three of theirs because I have three lives I'm responsible for. I kind of live three lives instead of just one," she said.

Sweet takes her academic career seriously and strives to get good grades.

"Academically, I'm more mature. I do take it more seriously than a lot of people. This is serious business — I'm paying for it, and I know what I have to do."

At 30, Sweet is concerned about her marketability once she has her degree.

"I'm concerned that when I go look for a job that I'm older than most others going in, but hopefully that will work to my advantage," she said.

She also said she realizes that even though she is busy now, some benefits from being a student may not follow her into the job market.

"I know now that my day is nonstop, but it allows some more freedoms than an eight-to-five job. Now work accommodates my schedule," she said.

Sweet graduated in 1982 from the now-closed Manhattan Luckey High School. She attended Manhattan Area Vocational Technical School for an associate's degree in office education. After marrying in 1985, Sweet moved to South Carolina, where her military husband was originally from. They divorced in 1991, and she moved back to Kansas with her children, Paul, 7, and Laura, 5.

No longer living with a two-salary income, Sweet went back to school in fall 1992, in part to be able to make more money.

"I was educated before I came to college, but I was also married," Sweet said. "We had a double income, so it wasn't as important for me to make as much money."

Sweet said she wants to better herself.

"Being a secretary was OK when I was married and my husband was our main source of income, but it wasn't OK just for me to support two kids," she said. "And I was bored with it. I wanted to be challenged."

Being a single mother and a student, Sweet has to deal with more than money and time management.

Sweet said she has a limit as to how much stress she can take, but fortunately her threshold is high.

"I can handle stress probably a lot more than your average person. I have a lot of stress every day, but I can't sit around and bitch and worry about being stressed."

Sweet said unexpected changes in her schedule can be stressful.

"If I have a glitch, it really bugs me," she said. "It happens all the time, so you'd think I'd be used to it by now.

"Every little change I make — I can't just make it for me, I have to make sure it works for everyone."

Illnesses pose a problem, one for which there are few solutions.

"Sometimes one of them is sick, and I have to miss class and work. I have brought them to school with me, but that's not good for them either if they're sick."

Often, Sweet herself will go to class when she feels under the weather.

"It's hard to be sick — there's no chance to be sick. I feel like I have to go. I have to save my time for when the kids are sick."

Sweet said she tries to help her children in many ways.

She said the Big Brother/Big Sister program has been good for her son, Paul.

Larry Meyer, senior in secondary education, is Paul's big brother. Meyer said they are usually together once a week from 3 to 8 p.m. They participate in activities such as bowling, hiking and ice skating.

"I think she wanted me so Paul would have a male person in his life," Meyer said. "It gives him a chance to talk. He's able to get close to someone and express his feelings."

Sweet tries to get her children involved in as many things as possible, but finances for everyday life can sometimes be limiting.

Work at Farrell Library as a student assistant in the administrative office helps pay standard bills such as rent, but assistance from other avenues is still needed for Sweet to attend school.

"I have some financial aid, and that is a little easier for me to get because I am a single parent, but I also have some loans that I have to pay back," Sweet said.

Paul and Laura go to KSU Child Development Center after school. Social and Rehabilitation Services assists Sweet in paying for this service.

"It's difficult to manage financially. I get help from SRS. They pay my child care. There would be no way I could pay for day care without help," she said.

The Center, which provides care from 7 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Monday through Friday for children aged 1 to 12 years, bases payment on parental income. It receives reimbursement from the state for meals served to the children.

Lorna Ford, director of the center, said it was a multicultural program.

"The children here are from all different countries, all different backgrounds. We use that to enrich the curriculum. We want to do away with any type of stereotyping," Ford said.

Sweet picks Paul and Laura up from day care around 5 p.m. and goes home to prepare dinner as quickly as possible for the two hungry children. Evenings are spent helping Paul and Laura with their homework, getting them to bathe and coercing them into going to bed.

"I try to get the kids to go to bed by nine, which isn't always easy," Sweet said. "After that, I can straighten up and study."

Finding time to study and spend time with her kids can sometimes be a problem for Sweet. Her remedy is to crack the books when the kids are asleep.

"I try not to study while they are awake. I couldn't get it done anyway, and I want to spend that time with them," she said.

Being a good role model for her children is important to Sweet.

"I'm setting an example for the kids. It's easier for me to be disciplined when I know I have to set an example. I can't just say, 'Oh, forget about studying,' because they're going to see that."

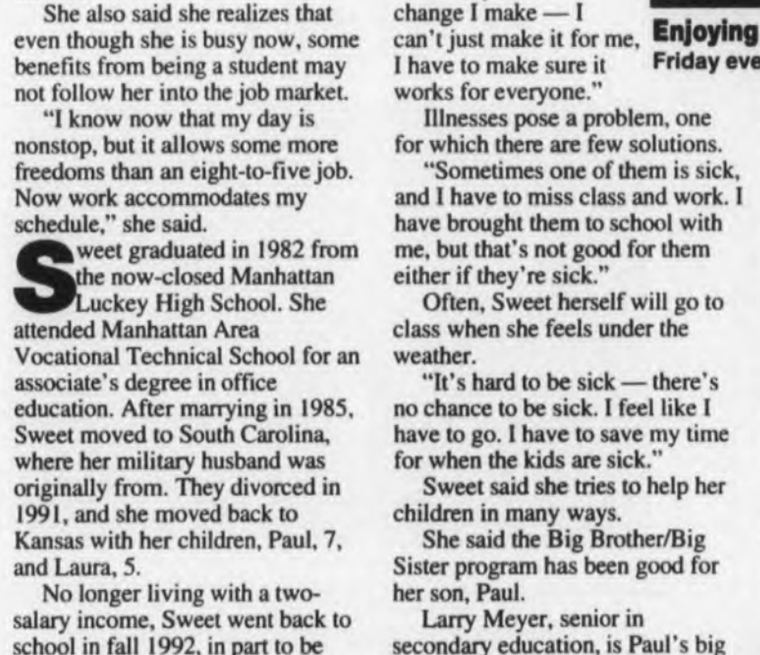
She sets one night out of the week for her family to relax, go out to eat, watch television or a movie and stay up late.

"Friday evenings are our designated 'do nothing' evenings. It's our time when we can be together without school. Usually by Fridays, I'm looking forward to not having to get up so early."

Sweet's personal time is very limited. Besides not having much time for herself because of family and student responsibilities, other factors contribute to the dilemma.

"Babysitters are hard to afford, and it's hard to find one I'm comfortable with. Lots of times I can't go anywhere because there's no babysitter."

On the rare occasions that Sweet does do something for herself or go somewhere without Paul and Laura, she said she has mixed feelings.



"I feel guilty because I'm used to them being with me all the time. It also kind of helps. I can come home and appreciate them more," she said.

Sweet said she dreams of the advantages a higher income will bring.

"I can't wait to have my own house and can afford someone else to clean it. The kids have their hearts set on an upstairs. I want to be able to take a real vacation every year, not visiting family, but a real vacation. I don't want to have to worry about finances," Sweet said.

Despite all of that, Sweet said she wants more than anything to be the best mother possible.

"I try so hard to be a good parent. I have to be both parents. I really rely on people's encouragement."

Maribeth takes notes in one of her four classes. She is a sophomore in speech pathology and audiology.

While grocery shopping, Paul leans against his mother as they go from aisle to aisle.

Fast food could kill jobs

COBY HESS
Collegian

Fast food has K-State Union employees worried about their jobs. The Union is considering bringing brand-name fast-food restaurants to the Union as a part of the Union Enhancement project.

Carolyn Bailey, hot-foods work leader for Union Food Services, said she is worried about her future employment.

"We have been working under the gun since September, not knowing whether we will have jobs next fall."

Becky Lind, Union Stateroom supervisor for 10 years, said if she loses her job, she is worried about finding a new job that recognizes her experience.

"It is a possibility that we may lose our jobs by August. One concern of mine is if I will be able to find a job where the benefits and wages would reflect my experience."

Teto Henderson, Union Station manager, said he wouldn't be too upset about the changes if the Union does get fast-food restaurants in it.

"I would say that I am concerned, but not worried about losing my job. I am confident that I would be able to work with the professional food-service management if that were the case."

Joy Barry, bakery work leader for 10 years, said she is concerned that health standards may be compromised by the fast-food restaurants.

"Union Food Services is part of a learning facility that should promote health, and fast-food restaurants do not promote health," she said.

Union workers may not get much notice if they are going to lose their jobs, Lind said.

"There could be a notice of as little as 30 days for employees of Union Food Services to find another job. I don't want to move from Manhattan, and the job opportunities in my field are limited here," she said.

Union wants students to save money

Historically, Bosco said, Union food service hasn't made enough money to be financially independent.

"Food service has been subsidized by students. That is no longer acceptable," he said.

Bosco said the whole idea of enhancement changes are for students to pay for construction costs through fees and for revenues to pay for operation costs.

Some changes have been made for food service to make more money. Adding changes have improved revenues, but not greatly, Sisson said.

"We are having a much better year than last year," Sisson said.

Sills said if the decision is made for food services to become a contract operation, as the food service sub-planning committee has recommended and the enhancement budget of $9.2 million was based on, he hopes K-State will take steps to retain current, non-management employees at their current pay and benefits.

"If I get my way, this will be a condition of the bid," Sills said.

Under Sills' plan, management employees would be interviewed by the contract company and given preference for available positions, except for food-service manager or director, Sills said.

This plan is based on one used by the University of Texas. In its change to a contract food situation, Sills said, the university president dictated that the retainment of current employees be a mandatory part of their food-service plan.

Sills said it has been estimated that Texas will retain employees at their present salary and benefit plan. It will cost the University a total cost of $319,000.

As the University administrator the Union reports to, the final food-service decision will rest with Bosco.

He said the final decision will be based on what is right for the University.

"First, we have to determine what is the appropriate path for K-State," he said.

Bosco said the project will be funded not just by student fees, but from entrepreneurship revenues as well. When outside companies lease Union space, they are responsible for financing renovations in their area.

"Mainly, we want to save students money," he said.

If it is decided to continue with self-operated food service, it will cost around $800,000 more than was budgeted.

"We would have to reassess every single item," Bosco said.

Options available for repayment less paper work and no standing in line waiting for money," said Jane Glickman, public-affairs specialist at the Department of Education.

K-State will be participating in the program beginning fall 1995, but only freshmen and sophomores will be included.

All students will have the option of the Direct Consolidation Loan to repay their loans. The plan consists of combining their loans and paying them back according to their income after graduation.

Moeder said the main concern with this plan lies in loan consolidation.

"This may make loan repayments take much longer and cost more because of the added interest," Moeder said.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., also has concerns about these plans and whether students are aware they could be paying more.

Joel Bacon, deputy press secretary for Kassebaum, said: "She's not convinced a federal agency is best to get involved in students' money."

Kassebaum, chairwoman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, has indicated that the committee will look into the programs, Bacon said.

Task force recommends solutions

Other advantages the task force cited included the possibility of preserving Memorial Stadium and nearby campus safety.

"An added feature is that security is located right there with the police department located in the stadium," Darell Edie, chair of the University Parking Council, said.

Members of the task force said a shuttle system was considered as a remedy for long-term parking.

"The surveys we collected indicated that a shuttle system might be desirable, but it would not be used," Edie said.

The task force said reasons for rejecting the shuttle included an estimated $525,000 annual cost, outlay expense and the lack of community buses for backup.

The task force also recommended reducing parking congestion through short-term plans to be implemented within the next 18 months. The recommendations included

- Distributing classes evenly throughout the 7:30 a.m. to 9:00 p.m. time period.

Rawson said classes are primarily scheduled 9:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. He said this would reduce the demand for parking during peak class time.

- Develop a plan for implementing a uniform parking permit fee in conjunction with specific assignments to be enforced by Dec. 1.
- Study issues related to placing additional restrictions on the sale of campus parking permits.
- Reduce the number of parking spaces reserved for state-owned vehicles.
- Reduce the number of reserved parking stalls from 400 to 200.
- Re-evaluate the adequacy of visitor parking on campus and modify existing parking.
- Initiate a campaign to encourage the use of car pools, bicycles and walking.
- Construct additional campus bike routes and provide more bicycle racks with city of Manhattan sales-tax money. It is a multi-year project scheduled to begin in 1996.

Federal loan programs may also experience cuts in within a week of receiving the letter, but I never heard anything again."

Stiverson said it made her mad because she had met the requirement of the scholarship by maintaining above a 3.5 grade point average.

"That's a big effect. When you don't get that $1,000 scholarship, then it turns into loan money, and that's money I'll have to pay back," she said.

Stiverson said she was concerned about the implications of the cuts.

"They talk about raising the educational level and helping students find funding, and now they want to cut it. We'll turn into one big ignorant country because most students can't afford to go to college and live away from home," Stiverson said.

Moeder said there is no projected cut in state funding, but federal funding could be reduced completely.

"It's a possibility it could happen for next year. State scholarships would then be operated just with state money," Moeder said. "It's cost-saving. Congress is always looking for places they can cut."

This doesn't mean that all student aid is safe from budget cuts, though. A Republican plan, which will get under way this spring, includes cutting funds for the work-college program, the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant and the Perkins Loan program, Moeder said.

Feeling a little fed up? Flip them the finger

Write to Cassie:
Kedzie 116
Manhattan, KS
66506

Dear Cassandra,

At the end of last semester, I was the victim of a natural disaster. Luck failed me when I rolled down 15 steps on the ice. The result: some kind of a broken, dislocated, dysfunctional, twisted finger that is also very unattractive.

Moreover, my disgrace continued when acquaintances asked me how I was "handling" things. In the office where I work, the new topic for conversation was my inability to point out things in a "straight" manner.

This incident has caused me severe emotional trauma. I am no longer myself, an individual; everyone now sees me as nothing more than a huge, swollen dislocated finger.

Cassandra, I feel like a gigantic human tape recorder that repeats the story of my misfortunes time and time again. How can I politely tell people to buzz off and mind their own business?

Signed,
Twisted

Dear Twisted,

First, if you have not seen a doctor, I suggest you do. This sounds like a pretty serious injury if it is still dislocated and twisted.

As for dealing with people's comments, make it very clear that you do not like being the object of everyone's conversation. Try and steer the conversation on to something else.

If it continues, the only thing I can tell you is sometimes the only way to combat rudeness is to be rude yourself. Tell them if the only thing they can find to talk about is your finger, they lead very pathetic lives.

Cassie

'The Mission' does not edit reality of 1700s

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

If it can be said American movies always have happy endings, then "The Mission" is definitely not an American movie.

Dealing with the touchy subject of the colonization of South America by the Spanish and the Portuguese in the 1700s, "The Mission," also out on video, is a sweeping picture of epic proportions that does not edit out realities for the sake of the audience.

★★ Good future rental
★ Bastardization of cinema

THE MISSION

The Union Program Council presents the Kaleidoscope film "The Mission" at 7 and 9:30 p.m. Thursday and at 9:30 p.m. Saturday in Forum Hall. Tickets are $1.75.

From the beginning, director Roland Jaffe drops our senses into the boiling tropics of South America with the riveting scene of a martyr. As natives tie a man to a wooden cross and send him down a river and ultimately plunging over immense falls, Jaffe pans swiftly along the action, gazing at their feet.

It is scenes like this one that make the movie's 1986 Oscar for best cinematography seem rightfully understandable. It also won the 1986 Palm d'Or for best film at the Cannes Film Festival.

Jeremy Irons portrays Gabriel, a Jesuit priest sent to South America to convert natives. He leaves the safe grounds of Ascension, the Spanish colony town, to venture deep into the forest over great waterfalls and establish a mission to convert a native tribe. Irons is his usual elegant self, choosing a minimalist approach to his faith.

Liam Neeson makes a small cameo performance as another Jesuit named Fielding.

The film is a little forgiving of the natives. They probably weren't as peace-loving and gentle to outsiders, but one must feel sympathetic to their ultimate fate. Even so, there aren't any prominent native characters developed, a common but forgivable problem in these European-angled films about colonization.

Back in Ascension, a mercenary named Mendoza, played to perfection by Robert DeNiro, has taken asylum with the local church. He has just killed his brother (a surprise cameo by Aidan Quinn) for cheating with his wife. Lacking the willpower to accept his sins, Gabriel talks Mendoza into joining him at his mission.

Mendoza, once a foe to the natives trading in slaves and goods, is now a friend. He and Gabriel create the new mission and establish a village.

However, all is not well. A cardinal (Ray McAnally, who narrates most of the movie as a letter to the Pope) from Europe has come to the colonies to decide where the boundaries are to be drawn. What is of importance here is that Spain doesn't allow slavery (actually a lie) and tolerates the natives, while Portugal deals in slaves and depletes the natives.

The climactic battle scene, with its chaotic atmosphere of gunfire, arrows and cannon explosions, is riveting. Jaffe has managed to capture a very human side to war. The battle is sweeping, but every now and then a small girl or innocent boy is swept into the mess.

Ennio Morricone's musical score is memorable and a definite highlight. It could very well be one of the better film soundtracks in the last few decades. It can be lush, much like the jungle; menacing, to match the political warfare; or sweet, to match the innocence of the native tribes.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

K-State visiting scholar Marilyn Kern-Foxworth speaks to a class Wednesday afternoon in Kedzie Hall. Kern-Foxworth, whose visit is being sponsored by both the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and the Office of Multicultural Affairs, will be the keynote speaker for Black History Month.

Guest scholar to examine media racism

HEATHER BALLEW

Marilyn Kern-Foxworth doesn't want to do anything to blemish her race.

And although she has received more than 35 important recognitions and has written more than 65 articles in trade, academic and popular periodicals, she still strives to do all she can to be a positive influence.

Kern-Foxworth, a K-State visiting scholar, will be the keynote speaker for Black History Month.

Kern-Foxworth is a Texas A&M University faculty member who is an expert on African Americans in advertising.

She is also the author of the first book written about African Americans in advertising, "Aunt Jemima, Uncle Ben and Rastus: Blacks in Advertising, Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow."

A signing session for her book will immediately follow her speech on Thursday.

Kern-Foxworth said her speech will look at African American images and their effects. She said many people have certain stereotypes about African Americans.

"There are bad people in every race. There are people who are on welfare in every race. There are people who do drugs in every race. There are teen-agers who get pregnant in every race," Kern-Foxworth said.

"Stereotypes are so detrimental to how we treat each other," she said. "I think we need to learn how to accept people for the way that they are."

Carol Oukrop, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said Kern-Foxworth's visit is being sponsored by both the school of journalism and the office of multicultural affairs.

"This woman has a perspective to share that I think a lot of the rest of us would do well to hear," Oukrop said.

Kern-Foxworth's visit is part of the Visiting Scholars Program, which increases recruitment efforts and provides additional opportunities to increase the visibility of minority faculty in the classroom and on campus.

Kern-Foxworth said she wants her speech to speak not only to African American youth but to any human being who wants to make the Earth a better place to live.

SPEAKER

Marilyn Kern-Foxworth, a K-State visiting scholar, will be the keynote speaker for Black History Month at 11:30 a.m. today in the Cottonwood Room in the K-State Union.

Panel encourages women to break job stereotypes

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

Women must reach out to other women, Olga Davis, assistant professor of speech, said.

Davis spoke to a group of 25 faculty and students during a women's issues forum Wednesday.

The event, sponsored by Delta Theta Sigma sorority as a part of Black History Month, included a panel of five women who addressed issues facing young black women.

"I am a struggling black sister, so I listen to these women to get to where they have gotten and maybe beyond," said Syvette Davis, junior in sociology and president of Delta Sigma Theta.

Panelists encouraged women like Davis never to limit themselves in their goals regardless of their chosen field.

"The world has really opened up for women in science, but the pipeline is leaking," said Pangie Ennis, a graduate student in physics and member of the panel. "What I mean is women are going for the degrees but not the jobs."

Ennis said one of the problems for women in science is they think they can't make it in the field.

"The second is the fact that as women, most of us want family and a career. We want it all, and we can have it all but just at different times," she said.

Kendell Scott Moore, a computer programmer, said women have to have the courage to be assertive.

"You have to look out for yourself. Be willing to speak up, to reach out and take risks because you make things happen for yourself," she said.

The panel members emphasized that when women do succeed, it is their responsibility to reach out to other women.

"When you get to the top, don't ever forget where you came from. Always reach down and care for those below you," panelist Anita McAlister said.

Davis said she agreed.

"We lift as we climb and we build as we grow," Davis said. "Don't ever discriminate against the girl beside you. She may be the one to lift you up. You may be the one to build her up as you grow."

Davis encouraged young black women to read about women of the past for inspiration in their careers.

Rockers not fazed by stardom really had to go to the bathroom. The beer had done the trick to calm me down, and now I was suffering the consequences. I ran around the corner backstage to relieve myself just as we were being introduced. "Eric! Eric!" my band members were screaming, "Get your ass over here!" So much for the bathroom.

Our 20-minute, five-song set was totally rockin'. We didn't make any major mistakes, and people were getting into it. I didn't notice the cameras too much, but I know Rich did, because they stuck one right in his face right away.

Matt said he looked up while he was singing and saw himself on a TV monitor, and that kind of freaked him out.

The kit I was playing on was really nice, so I played good 'n' hard. It wasn't completely set up right, though, and it kept moving towards my lap. There was no time to fix it, so I ended up splitting my knuckle open on the metal rim. Oh well, at least we only had to play for 20 minutes.

▶When we were done, we got herded around like a bunch of cows for photos. There were congratulations, introductions to "important" people, and more photos. I felt like I was in a wedding.

Matt said to me later, "I feel like we were in a competition and we just won." I think we broke the Micheal Roth curse.

We'll hopefully see more of the bands again when we hit the road this spring.

Petty never showed, but his daughter did, along with his publicist. No big deal. I had kind of forgotten about him anyway.

Now it's time to concentrate on the new album. It's home for a day, a show in Lawrence, home for one more and then off to Memphis to record.

Velcro wall brings fun to K-State Union rented for four hours Wednesday afternoon from a company named Funny Business for $900.

Chris Holbert, who was touring the country with the Velcro wall, said the Velcro wall is one of Funny Business' most popular attractions.

Holbert said the Velcro course and the other inflatables were safe for children and adults.

"It's very safe," Holbert said. "We haven't had any major injuries — just minor ones like twisted ankles."

Tim Derowitsch, freshman in pre-med, said seeing others crash inside the inflatable contraption was the reason why he didn't try a jump.

"It's kind of crazy," Derowitsch said. "If more of them stuck to the wall, I think I would do it, but most of them are falling on their heads."

Curt Kennedy, sophomore in physics, said he was surprised when he walked by and saw the crowd of people by the balcony.

"I was wondering what they were looking at," Kennedy said. "I thought they were looking at the signs, but then I looked down and saw people jumping on the Velcro wall."

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

For long distance calls. Savings based on a 3 min. AT&T operator-dialed interstate call.

Minneapolis band plays at Union Station for Reggae Night

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

An eclectic mass came together to pay tribute to what would be the 50th birthday of Bob Marley Thursday night at Union Station.

The Minneapolis Reggae All Stars have met sporadically for the last two years with the help of Jeff Taube of Mid America Talent.

"They are the cream of the reggae crop. They were the best in the area," Taube said.

Mostly they meet for this two-week tour, and then they return to their other bands and jobs. Otherwise they perform together pretty erratically throughout the year.

The slinky, somber vocalist, Lynval Jackson, migrated from Jamaica. He celebrates Marley as the man who brought music where it is today and opened the world up for new reggae musicians.

"It's about bringing people together," he said.

Keyboardist Steve Starks' fingers tap-danced as he rocked, so laid-back his hands didn't seem connected to the rest of him.

Starks said he is most drawn to the music because of the effect it seems to have on others.

"I just love watching other people get high on the music," he said.

Previously a member of bands Ethical Treatment and Blind Rhythm, he now focuses most of his time on the band and works as a temporary at a Minneapolis, Minn., bank.

Chicago native and guitarist Markiss also plays for a rhythm-and-blues band called Shades of Color and tours with Ashanti.

"Playing Bob's music gives us a chance to keep it alive," he said. "It's too easy for him to become known as just another pop artist.

We have to remember what he was by remembering what time he came from," Markiss said.

Bassist Steve Scott of Trinidad also grooves in a recorded band known as Jai Cafe, as well as working as a freelance industrial engineer.

"Playing Marley gives us a chance to stand on a soapbox with his message. He was about raising consciousness," Scott said.

"The message was 'Love your brother and your sister and just let everyone do their own thing.'"

Originally from Venezuela, drummer Brian Alexis also plays with Markiss in Shades of Color.

Tony Paul charmed the congas as the crowd zigzagged around the dance floor and left little room for air holes.

Paul does a radio show out of Minneapolis and tours nationally with the Minnesota Children's Theatre.

He said he is glad to be doing a college tour to get away from the bar scene for a while.

"Students seem to be more knowledgeable, so they understand what we're doing," Paul said, "and there's more energy in young people."

The All Stars didn't intend to be anything more than a one-time get together in the beginning.

Most of the band had been working on various projects, and there didn't seem to be much enthusiasm for new reggae originals at first.

"When people heard we were going to be doing Marley, we sold out immediately," Scott said.

"We've been doing Marley ever since. We love his music. We have to love it to do it. It's a lot of work. We respect the music," he said.

His music is light-hearted and simple:

"Don't worry about a thing, cause every little thing is gonna be all right."

Markiss weaves his sly riffs around Jackson's voice, and the beat goes on.

Leaders must be cultivated

HEATHER BALLEW
Collegian

African Americans do not have a national black leader anymore, said Marilyn Kern-Foxworth, a visiting scholar from Texas A&M.

Kern-Foxworth was the keynote speaker for Black History Month Thursday in the K-State Union Ballroom.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Kern-Foxworth said the key to finding a strong national leader is to cultivate leadership within the African American community, especially among children.

Using the word leadership as an acronym, she gave 10 points that affect people and how they become leaders.

The first letter in the word leadership, L, stands for learn, Kern-Foxworth said.

"I don't want you to discount anyone," Kern-Foxworth said. "You never know where you can learn."

Kern-Foxworth said learning black history is important because it helps African Americans understand where they come from. Once people learn their history, they know of their royal beginnings and begin to act royally, she said.

Senate delays credit-hour vote

Student senators have strong opinions about per-credit-hour tuition but chose to wait until next week to make a decision.

Senators voted Thursday night against speeding up the vote on a bill that would recommend a cap on per-credit-hour tuition at 12 hours.

Scott Rottinghaus, Academic Affairs Committee chair, sponsored the bill. David Winkler, human ecology senator, wanted to move it to special orders so that students could get their opinion heard early in the process.

"If students want a say in this, we have to talk to the administration now," Winkler said. "The best time to have a say in the issue is before the proposal is made."

Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, said tuition would not be considered by the

Seminars add to jazz festival

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

The sultry sound of jazz will soon be heard in Manhattan.

On Friday and Saturday, the Department of Music at K-State will present the Kansas State University Jazz Festival at McCain Auditorium.

The jazz festival was created to give high-school students and their instructors a chance to receive increased experience and understanding of American big-band music.

Nine high schools and two colleges will attend the festival.

"The festival is a valuable opportunity for anyone involved in music," said Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies at K-State.

Various seminars and workshops are planned for the two-day event.

The events will cover musical interests of students and instructors such as performance and career- and industry-related topics.

"The one event I consider the best event ever at the festival is the career seminar," Wilson said.

The career event will show what the real world is like in the music industry.

"Anyone interested in music will gain extremely valuable information about music as a career," Wilson said.

The seminars will be conducted by teachers, performers and professionals who are prominent in the music industry.

"There are some great clinicians coming," Wilson said.

Dena Sly, freshman in music education, is performing at the festival and said she is very excited about the events.

"This is the real thing," Sly said.

Britt Woodman, Duke Ellington's famed lead trombonist, will present the festival's first historical lecture, "Duke Ellington on the Road."

Woodman, who gained popularity during his work with Ellington, the composer and leader of jazz orchestration, is one of the top lead and solo trombonists in the world.

Ellington has written and conducted countless popular jazz melodies such as "Harlem," "Sophisticated Lady" and "Creole Love Song."

At the festival, students will also get to interact or perform with the K-State Concert Jazz Ensemble in instrument demonstrations for the trumpet, trombone, saxophone and rhythm section and clinics for blues improvisation.

Want to go the festival? Register between 4 and 7:30 p.m. Friday and 8 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. Saturday in the McCain Auditorium lobby. The cost is $5.

An outstanding high-school soloist will be selected to perform with the K-State University Concert Jazz Ensemble.

Another festival highlight is the world première of a composition composed and arranged by Count Basie Orchestra leader and Grammy Award winner Frank Foster. The arrangement will be played by the K-State Concert Jazz Ensemble.

The festival will conclude with a "Jazz Party" at 5 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

It will feature the KSU Jazz Trombone Quintet, Jazz Vocal Ensemble, Jazz Flute Choir and the jazz combo Maiden Voyage.

Earthquake update

The Japanese Red Cross Society has received $310 million in donations.

Officials have increased damage estimates to more than $100 billion.

The Japanese government announced Thursday it would spend $150 million to build temporary housing.

An aftershock Thursday had a preliminary magnitude of 4.1 on the Richter scale. No damages or injuries were reported.

Design lessens earthquake destruction

STEPHANIE STEENBOCK

Three K-State civil engineering professors are promoting a design they believe will eliminate some of the damage caused by earthquakes like the one that recently rocked Kobe, Japan.

Philip Kirmser, Kuo Kuang Hu and Stuart Swartz have been working on a design for their invention, Stiffness Decoupler for Base Isolation of Structures, since 1976.

The key to their design is to make building supports that are both strong and flexible. The design uses large, hollow, concrete columns for strength with slender steel pipes inside the column filled with low-strength concrete for flexibility.

Bearing pads on top of the columns provide damping to help eliminate the displacement of the structure.

"The contribution of our invention is a breakthrough. If you try to make the column stronger, you make it stiff. Our innovation makes it strong and flexible," Hu said.

Since the invention relies on common construction materials like concrete and steel pipes, it is inexpensive to install in new or existing structures.

The design not only protects the

NEWS BRIEFS

▶ HEARING LOSS, EAR INJURY PROMPT ARCHITECTURE DEAN TO RESIGN

Lane Marshall has given his resignation as the dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

Marshall said his resignation is due to his severe permanent hearing loss and temporarily impaired equilibrium.

"After giving it considerable thought, I've decided to step down as dean and return to teaching in landscape architecture," Marshall said.

"I can still be 100-percent effective as a teacher, but my hearing loss has made it more difficult for me to be as effective as I wish to be in all the situations I find myself in as dean."

Provost James Coffman said a national research will be conducted for a new dean.

"Lane has agreed to continue as dean until we hire a successor," Coffman said. He anticipates identifying a new dean by January 1996 and having that individual on campus by June 1996.

Marshall has been dean of the College of Architecture and Design since 1989. Before coming to K-State, he was in charge of the landscape architecture department at Texas A&M University for seven years.

"Lane Marshall has been an outstanding dean for the College of Architecture and Design and a definite asset for the entire University. Moreover, Dean Marshall has been an excellent leader on major University-wide projects such as the general education project and the Task Force on the Educational Experience," President Jon Wefald said.

Marshall

Marshall received the President's Medal by the American Society of Landscape Architects for his contributions to the profession. He was the national president of the society from 1978 to 1980.

Coffman said that during Marshall's time as dean, the college has seen significant improvement.

"He's been a first-rate example of a good person to work with," Coffman said.

Associate Dean Ray Weisenburger had similar things to say about Marshall.

"He is easy to work with and creative yet has strong direction. He has clearly defined the goals for the college," Weisenburger said.

Marshall said he thinks the college will be able to re-evaluate and determine its direction for the future with a new dean.

"This will give the college an opportunity to look at a new vision for the future," Marshall said.

▶ DUTCH FLEE TIEL AS FLOODWATERS RISE

TIEL, Netherlands (AP) — Soldiers sweated through the night to patch a dam threatened by rising flood waters in Ochten, while the 5,000 residents of the low-lying town joined the largest refugee exodus in Dutch history.

Flood shelters were filling up Wednesday as evacuees fled north in packed cars along jammed highways, pulling trailers loaded with furniture. As many as 250,000 people have abandoned their homes and belongings in Gelderland and Limburg provinces.

The Waal River subsided slightly, but main sections of earthen dike protecting the low-lying southeastern Dutch countryside were weakened by the surging floodwaters draining from Germany, Belgium and France.

Most of the Netherlands is below sea level. The flooding threatens to destroy the vast network of river and sea dikes that were built over the past 800 years to turn marsh and floodplain into farmland.

▶ FRIEND TESTIFIES THAT SIMPSON LIED

LOS ANGELES (AP) — He said he loved O.J. Simpson as a friend for 26 years.

He breezed into Simpson's estate with a press of the gate buzzer.

As a policeman, he even ran license plates checks for him.

But now, Ronald Shipp said he can't believe Simpson would lie about a conversation they had the night after Simpson's ex-wife and her friend were murdered.

"This is really sad, O.J.," Shipp said Wednesday as he withstood a blistering cross-examination, staring at his old friend across the courtroom.

Shipp testified that on the night of June 13, after Simpson had been interviewed by police, Simpson questioned him about how long it would take to conduct DNA tests on a bloody glove found outside his mansion.

Then, Shipp says, Simpson brought up the dreams.

"He jokingly said, 'To be honest, Shipp, I've had some dreams of killing her,'" he said.

▶ MURDER OF YOUNG CHILDREN RISING

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rising murder rates for the youngest Americans place today's children at greater risk than any generation in decades, according to an analysis of killing in America.

Pre-schoolers, pre-teens and teen-agers are currently experiencing record-setting homicide rates, the private Population Reference Bureau reported Wednesday.

"These extraordinarily high rates for teens and rising rates for young children must be taken as a clear warning signal that today's children are less protected and more at risk of violence than any previous generation over the past 40 years," the research group said in the study, "Homicide in the United States: Who's at Risk?"

Stella Ogata of the Children's Defense Fund in Washington suggested that rising deaths among the youngest children are probably a combination of being in the wrong place at the wrong time, and increasing numbers of child abuse and neglect cases.

No bones about it

Director of jazz knew trombone was his calling

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

Something magical happened the moment Dennis Wilson touched a trombone.

When Wilson, K-State director of jazz studies, was in junior high, he had not yet discovered the magic of music.

Wilson was a fast learner in grade school and quickly became bored.

That boredom soon turned into troublemaking.

That all changed when his junior-high music teacher took him to the music room and told him to pick an instrument.

Wilson said he had to choose between the tuba and the trombone.

"I didn't know which was which," Wilson said.

"I looked at the tuba and thought it was too big to take on the bus. When I touched the trombone, I knew that's what I'd be doing for the rest of my life," he said.

Wilson's life took a creative turn, and there was no looking back.

"I had a focus," he said. "I had something to do."

Wilson's talent and dedication have taken him down a road filled with one musical success after another.

Wilson graduated from Berklee College of Music and immediately began his professional career.

During his years as a musician, Wilson has played with many top bands in the nation and worked as a trombonist, arranger and musical director.

He has worked with such musical greats as Ella Fitzgerald, Tony Bennett, Frank Sinatra, Lena Horne, Mel Torme and Stevie Wonder.

In 1985, Wilson received a nomination for a Grammy Award for a vocal arrangement he created for Manhattan Transfer.

He is also a subject of biographical record in "Who's Who in Education" and "Who's Who in Entertainment."

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Dennis Wilson, K-State director of jazz studies and assistant director of bands, came to K-State in August. When Wilson was younger, he chose to play the trombone instead of the tuba because he thought the tuba was too big to take on the bus.

Wilson has been a lead trombonist for the New Tommy Dorsey Orchestra and the Dizzy Gillespie Big Band.

He has also worked with the William "Count" Basie Orchestra.

Wilson is the lead trombonist with the Carnegie Hall Jazz Orchestra and the Jazz Masters, directed by Slide Hampton.

He is also a trombonist with The Benny Carter Orchestra of New York.

For three years, Wilson has been the music production manager for the Count Basie Orchestra and has developed "The Basie Way," a musical education program of the orchestra.

Wilson is also the founder, creator and executive director of The Count Basie Orchestra Invitational Big Band Festival.

"It's one of those bands you don't quit," Wilson said.

Wilson has traveled extensively with his musical career and can speak Japanese and Spanish, but his busy schedule doesn't keep him from doing what he really loves — teaching.

In August, Dennis Wilson joined the staff at K-State as director of jazz studies and assistant director of bands.

Wilson thanks two K-State trombonists for helping him come to K-State.

Last year, when Wilson was a guest clinician at the K-State Jazz Festival, Jeff Smith and Marc Riegel, trombone players from K-State, picked him up at the Kansas City International Airport.

"On the trip home, they took a wrong turn and ended up near St. Joseph, Mo.," Wilson said.

Once the driver realized it, he turned around and started for Manhattan, only to get lost again near Emporia. Finally, they arrived in Manhattan several hours late.

The next day, Frank Tracz, director of bands at K-State, drove Wilson back to KCI to make sure no one got lost.

Tracz talked to Wilson about his future plans and the possibility of Wilson teaching at K-State.

"If anything happens, let me know," Wilson told Tracz.

Three months later, Wilson got a call from Tracz.

"Here I was doing an album with the Saturday Night Live band and boom, he called me up," Wilson said

"I knew they would call me up someday, but not three months later," he said.

"I thank those two students because they would have taken me back the next day like they were supposed to, but because they got lost, I found my way here," he said.

Wilson said he is excited to be at K-State and has high hopes for his department.

"I want to give students experiences that are unique and will have life-long value," he said.

Wilson said he wants to attract and keep quality students at K-State.

"I make great demands of my students, but if you treat them like pros, you get a pro response," he said.

Wilson said he wants to give his students something to work hard for.

"I really have to address the area of scholarship," he said. "It has to be something of significant value. I want to start a Count Basie Scholarship."

Wilson said he feels at home at K-State and is looking forward to the future.

"I look at how busy I am sometimes. I've been very fortunate. I've worked hard, but I've been fortunate," Wilson said.

Band preserves jazz, scheduled for McCain

MIKE BUNCH

The music of Duke Ellington, Count Basie, Benny Goodman and all the big-band greats has come to life again through the Smithsonian Jazz Masterworks Orchestra.

The orchestra, founded in 1990 through an appropriation from Congress, was created to perform and preserve jazz music of all styles.

"The program was chosen to show the diversity of jazz music," said John Hasse, founder and executive director of the orchestra. "We have music from the '30s, '40s, '50s and '60s — a large range of styles."

The jazz orchestra will perform at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

"We've been talking to the management and trying to get them to come here since they began planning a tour," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said. "Getting an open date and having them touring in the area made it difficult to schedule."

The Smithsonian is the only museum in the United States with a resident jazz orchestra, which made booking them more important.

"The fact that the Smithsonian is the only museum with a resident orchestra said something to me," Martin said. "Name recognition is important to draw a crowd. The Smithsonian has a name most people recognize."

The 16-member orchestra began its first tour in May, opening in Washington, D.C., and playing a variety of venues across the United States.

"We play in major and medium markets as well as a number of community concerts," Hasse said. "We also play at a number of colleges, like Columbia, the University of Iowa and K-State. Some of our performances are for music series and special concerts."

The orchestra is led by two world-famous conductors, Gunther Schuller and David

Kansas Board of Regents until March and voted on in May. He also wanted to wait for a vote until after Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, comes to speak to Senate next week.

Senate voted against moving the bill to special orders, so they will vote on the bill next week.

Senate also voted to give $1,488 to the Big Twelve Leadership Conference, which will be at K-State March 3-5.

Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator and coordinator of the conference, said student body presidents and vice presidents, state affairs officers and financial officers will discuss and compare services that each school provides.

Funds for this conference will come from the foundation account. This is an interest-bearing account where unused funds are deposited. Certain criteria must be met to draw funds from the foundation account.

Mark Tomb, arts and sciences senator, proposed an amendment to the bill, which would take the funds from the reserves for a contingencies account. Allocations to campus groups are usually drawn from this account.

"We are treating ourselves differently from everyone else," Tomb said.

Henry said he was not asking for special treatment, and his group has raised half of the money for the conference.

"I don't want to take away money from student groups," Henry said. "Since this account earns interest, the money will be paid back in six months."

The allocation passed by a vote of 50-3.

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Weekend jazz festival is golden opportunity

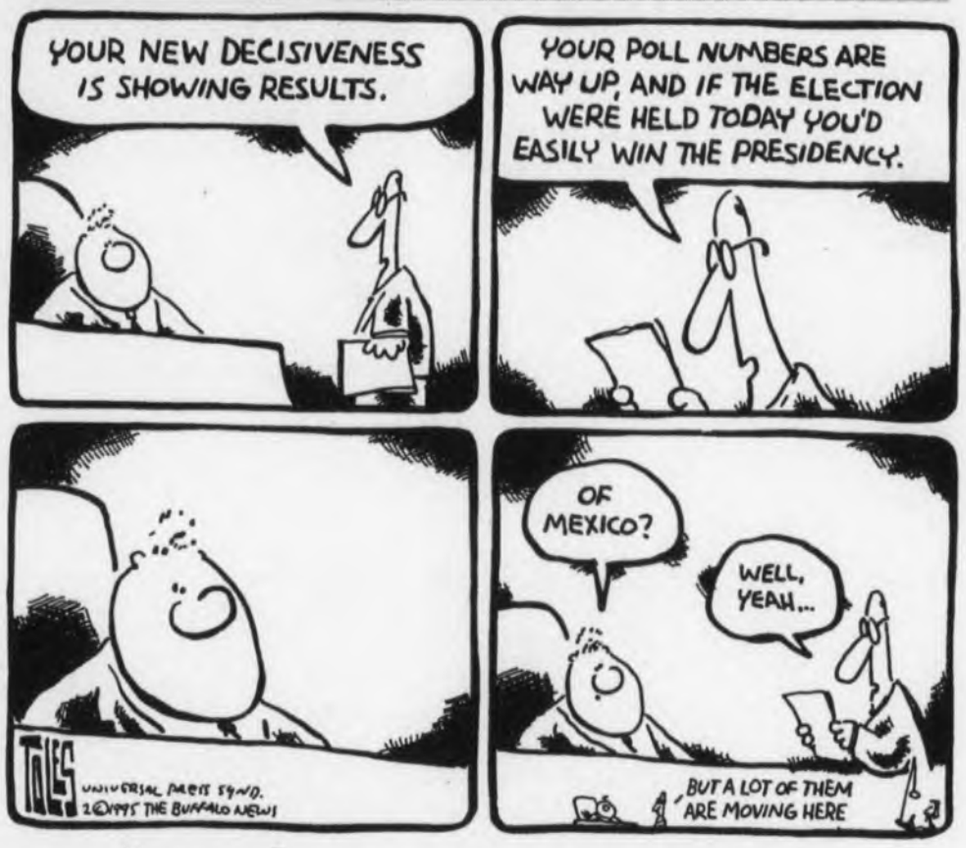
To those of you who like good music and are interested in seeing a part of what Kansas used to be, we recommend hearing these jazz greats while they are in town.

The jazz festival hitting Manhattan this weekend is an opportunity students, faculty and Manhattan residents should take advantage of.

The festival will be between 4 and 7:30 p.m. Friday and from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

All registrations must be received by 2:30 p.m. Saturday. Registration fees are $5 per person, which, especially when compared to the usual cover charged by a bar (not to mention the obligatory drinks) is an incredibly reasonable price.

The K-State Department of Music is known nationally for its commitment to jazz. It arranges jazz seminars, workshops and performances with top performers.



Leading the festival this weekend will be such world-renowned jazz personalities as Britt Woodman and Frank Foster, who will present a never-before-heard composition performed by the K-State Concert Jazz Ensemble.

Although Kansas has a rich jazz history, it has recently been hit hard by the closing of several Kansas jazz spots. This includes several in Kansas City and our own Little Apple Brewing Co. in Manhattan.

To those of you who like good music and are interested in seeing a part of what Kansas used to be, we recommend hearing these jazz greats while they are in town.

If you don't, they may not come back.

Ever lean down to pick something up and then can't remember which way is up?

I used to think it was because gravity was an animal in a constant state of PMS and she was holding a grudge against me for stunting the growth of some helpless botanical wonder in a previous life.

I figure I've done enough damage in this incarnation without tallying my eternal defects.

This is supposed to be some kind of literary entrance, or at least a warning and preface to a column nobody asked for and everybody gets.

The following revelations have little in common with each other except that I either worship the concept, or I would lobby the cosmic justice system to protest them.

This is just to introduce my uninvited self to those who would subject themselves to another Natural Born Columnist.

I reserve the right to contradict myself. (Because I can.) It's not that I lie; it's just that I change my mind a lot.

I was once convinced that Jerry Garcia was God and that all Deadheads were angels.

(Then I came down.)

My brother and twin sister are both on welfare. I'm "on" financial aid. I don't see a difference.

I'm convinced that you can determine how one will relate in relationships by the names that they give to their pets and stuffed animals.

This is based on a friend that named his dog God and his cat Bitch.

Another friend named her three birds Rage, Psycho and Zima.

Last month, my mother gave me a Macy's Kermit the Frog that looks like ToyBoy on valium. I named him Cohen, which might suggest that I am in search of a Jewish doctor, or it might not. (At the risk of disappointing my grandmother.)

My grandmother believes that I am the only "good Jewish kid" in the Midwest. Is this true?

Actually, I don't have the chutzpah to tell her I'm really just a good Buddhist kid.

She inhabits Miami Beach, the land plentiful of sunshine, celebrity real estate and Jewish grandmothers.

The gatekeepers of my personal Nirvana are Woody Allen, Frank Zappa, Ram Dass, Oprah, Dr. Seuss, Kahil Gibran, Oliver Stone, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Anne Sexton and Robert Altman.

Parasites that should die twice from a bad case of crabs are Fred Phelps, Rush Limbaugh, Michael Bolton, all disciples of Ricki Lake and Jerry Springer, and anyone who commercializes hatred or makes a market out of violence.

My mother has become just a really expensive voice to hear once a week.

The only reliable definition for HOME that I have found is that home is where all the women around you menstruate in sync with one another and you've been around long enough to notice.

The best relationships happen by accident.

Being human seems to consist of being promoted from one waiting room to the next, and the earth is the graveyard between each waiting room.

When I am attracted to a friend, I am attracted to the type that looks like they're smiling even when they're not.

When I am attracted to a relationship, I am attracted to the type that don't look like they're smiling, even when they are.

As I reluctantly grow up, I find that I cry more when I'm happy and laugh more when I'm not.

Shoes are only blindfolds for the feet.

Sales tax now lacks purpose

JEREMY STEPHENS

During the November elections, the voters of this great city voted to make many changes, and I'm not just talking about the party of "Big Brother" being replaced by the party of "It's Our Turn Now."

This party is known to some of our citizenry with too much spare time on their hands as the party of "I've Got Big Bird in my Cross Hairs" or "Let's Give Everyone a Tax Cut So We Can Keep the Little Guy Down."

However, I digress from a discussion of national politics and turn toward a peculiar situation that now embraces the lovely city of Manhattan.

The voters of this city, including the constituency of K-State, approved an increase in the sales tax known as the Economic Development Tax on the premise that it would attract developing businesses.

Before the elections, the sales tax in Manhattan was 6.4 percent, but after approving an increase at the polls it is now 6.9 percent, which gives us the dubious honor of enjoying one of the highest rates in Kansas.

To refresh your memory, the business of discussion at that time was the aircraft-industry giant Cessna, which chose Manhattan as one of five finalist cities in the running to have a new factory built in its community.

Cessna was able to expand and build another factory because federal regulations were lifted that once made Cessna liable to such an extent in court cases initiated by crashes that it could not afford to continue to produce small airplanes.

Ironically, the very tax that was theoretically going to bring Cessna to town would hurt further expansion by existing smaller businesses by increasing the tax on their sales.

In addition, there was no alternative plan for using the revenues if Cessna chose not to locate in Manhattan.

Let's stop and think about this for just a minute.

During the debate over the tax hike, did anyone ever mention specifically how the money would be spent if Cessna didn't locate here?

There was much fanfare to indicate that it would surely bring large corporations such as Cessna to this region, but nothing was said to address the possibility that Cessna wouldn't locate here or how the increase in sales tax would affect small retailers that were interested in locating here.

Now that we are stuck with paying a higher sales tax, I would like to offer a suggestion to attract businesses to Manhattan that originated with our very own Student Governing Association.

Build park benches. It's so simple; it's absurd. In fact, if the city government reacts quickly to this suggestion, there might still be time to get a group discount with SGA when they order their park benches.

In addition, I suggest starting a marketing campaign centered around the theme, "Slide Down Park Benches While You Shop." It's not very snappy, but it's a start.

It wouldn't hurt to try to attract consumers, considering that one of the few observable effects of passing this tax is that smart shoppers are looking elsewhere to purchase their products in places with lower taxes.

However, in all seriousness, as of last week city officials had no concrete plan as to what to do with the surplus tax dollars.

According to them, there is an effort under way to form a committee that will establish the criteria and objectives to determine how to spend the money.

There wasn't a definitive set of ideas presented before the election as to how the tax would be used because Cessna asked the cities not to reveal the contents of their incentive packages.

There was no Plan B, and still isn't.

Officials speculate revenues will be spent on improving infrastructure, providing incentives and expanding the economic base through job creation.

These are very lofty goals, and I hope for the sake of the taxpayers of Manhattan that they are reached, but there is no more of a comprehensive plan to achieve these things than there is for Clinton's middle-class tax cut.

Ironically, the tax that was theoretically going to bring Cessna to town would hurt further expansion by existing smaller businesses by increasing the tax on their sales.

All these things are very easy to say but hard to deliver on without a definitive plan. Unfortunately, neither of these items have one.

The lessons that can be learned from this are not many, but they are important.

First, greater taxation has never expanded or attracted business as a whole to anything or anywhere.

Companies that aren't explicitly granted tax breaks are fleeing to areas that have lower tax rates.

Inherently, taxes reduce how much consumers can spend because they add to the cost of a product, and without matching increases in income from the very businesses that are being taxed more they simply can't afford to buy the same amount of products they could with lower taxes.

Business attracts businesses, and the higher the tax rates, the less business there is.

One of the most important lessons to learn from this is to think about what or who you are voting for before you vote.

There are many occasions when promises made just don't add up, and this is especially true in the government sector.

Just because a person or a program sounds good doesn't guarantee peace on earth and goodwill toward men.

Jeremy Stephens is a sophomore in business.

▶ "THE BELL CURVE"

Reviewer was uninformed

Dear editor,

I wish to comment on the review by Kathleen Mastio in the Collegian of Wednesday, Feb. 1, titled "Bell Curve Studies Path to Intelligence."

In this review, Mastio makes a number of claims that not only fail to reflect the weight of scientific opinion on the issue of genetics and intelligence, but also illustrate her lack of preparation.

While there is little disagreement about the accuracy of the raw data that authors Herrnstein and Murray present in "The Bell Curve," there is a raging controversy over the appropriateness of their analyses of that data and the conclusions they draw from those analyses.

To state, as Mastio does, that Herrnstein and Murray's evidence is "undeniable," and that their research is "unbiased," and that the criticism of the book is "unwarranted" is to call into question the opinions of numerous experts who have publicly drawn the exact opposite conclusions in the months since this work was published. Based on her failure to cite them, Mastio has apparently not read these criticisms, although some have appeared in such popular sources such as the New Yorker and the Wall Street Journal.

"These issues are not only emotionally charged, but also highly technical."

PATRICK A. KNIGHT
Associate professor

She also apparently failed to contact any of the faculty in any of several departments in the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Education and Human Ecology, who could have helped her understand the issues surrounding genetics and intelligence. These issues are not only emotionally charged, but also highly technical.

To suggest that a layperson such as Mastio could understand and validly evaluate the data and analyses presented in "The Bell Curve" is unrealistic when the acknowledged experts in the field disagree on these points.

The issues raised in "The Bell Curve" are important, but the conclusions drawn by its authors are indeed open to valid criticism.

Mastio, while aware that this criticism exists, chose to ignore it and thereby failed to serve her audience.

Construction noise is intolerable

Dear editor,

Those of us who teach in West Waters Hall have not been able to hear ourselves or our students this week.

Does the University not realize that loud construction noise disrupts classes? Can such disruptions not be scheduled around classes?

One professor in entomology has been forced to move his laboratory because of disrupting noise; he went home with a headache yesterday because the noise is directly below his office.

This makes you wonder if construction takes precedence over instruction. I invite you to come over and check this situation.

Dear editor,

In regards to the $15 graduation fee, what can the future K-State grads expect? I'll make a bet on charging for parking out at Bramlage Coliseum!

That to me would be a sure bet on this fine University embarrassing themselves again in the future.

Smatterings

BY ANDREW TOMB

Smatterings are compiled from some stuff we found behind a filing cabinet in the newsroom.

Prozac: not just for the middle-aged anymore

The maker of Prozac said Tuesday that it disciplined two salesmen for violating company policy by promoting its popular antidepressant during a seminar for high-school students.

Eli Lilly and Co. took the action after parents of students at Walter Johnson High School in Bethesda, Md., complained that a program on depression turned into a product promotion.

"This should not have happened," Lilly spokesman Edward West said Tuesday. "A couple of individuals had a lapse in judgment."

He refused to identify the district sales manager and sales representative involved and wouldn't disclose the disciplinary action taken against them. He did not say if they still work for Lilly.

A doctor scheduled to speak was late, so the two Lilly employees were asked to fill in, West said.

While discussing depression, they handed out brochures on Prozac. They also distributed pens and paper bearing the drug's name and maker so the students could fill out questionnaires used to screen for depression, West said.

"The message was, 'If you feel sad, drop a Prozac,'" Maria Virker, an 11th-grade student, said in an interview last week with the Washington Post.

Nice to know that the bubble-gum and mousse crowd are not being excluded from having a Prozac moment.

Is that a Sheik condom? Ooooh yes, it is! It is!

A radio station will continue using a condom commercial featuring the sounds of a couple having sex even though two other advertisers are withholding their business in protest.

Meriter Hospital and Physicians Plus, both of Madison, Wis., told WZEE-FM they would not purchase advertising time as long as the Sheik Condom commercial was aired.

WZEE prepared an editorial Wednesday calling the hospital's actions morally and ethically bankrupt.

"It's just beyond my comprehension that a health-care provider would take this position," said station general manager David Graupner.

The air time previously purchased by the hospital has already been snatched up by some other moral debtors.

The Imelda Marcos Fan Club and Rocko's 24-Hour Bookie Service and XXX Video Rentals have agreed to purchase the vacated airtime.

Put that scalpel away; I'm low on sperm, honey

Men's sperm counts seem to be falling, and no one knows why.

The latest evidence of this troubling trend is a French study that found that the sperm counts of donors at a Paris sperm bank have dropped by one-third during the past two decades.

While the researchers said they could not explain their finding, they raised a variety of possibilities, including male fetuses' exposure to estrogen in the womb as well as environmental pollution and unspecified changes in diet and lifestyles.

The French have not considered the threat of Mr. Peepers being whacked off in the middle of the night and stuffed under a man's pillow.

In Los Angeles, a woman used a pair of scissors to castrate her sleeping husband.

Hot-tub parties are making a splash in Manhattan

You have a brewsky in hand, and you're sitting in simmering bubbles with 15 of your closest friends.

No, you aren't in paradise.

You are at a hot-tub party made possible by one of the two hot-tub companies in Manhattan.

Greg Biermann, Manhattan resident, said he has rented hot tubs for parties about five times in the last year and a half.

Biermann said he usually gets three kegs for the parties and about 100 to 200 people attend.

"We usually sit around, smoke, drink and talk," he said. "It's a pretty good deal. It's kind of expensive, but worth it. If you get it for two nights, they'll usually cut you a good deal. With one night, it's kind of expensive."

Biermann said a few times late at night he has walked outside to find people having sex in the hot tub.

"I've gone out, and it's like 'Oops, excuse me,'" he said. "Then you don't know whether or not to get in the hot tub afterwards, but I guess the chlorine takes care of that."

Christina Berger, sophomore in sociology and pre-law, said she has been to a few hot-tub parties while attending K-State, but said she does not get into the hot tubs.

"I guess it's because with a bunch of people I don't know, I don't want to be sitting in a big tub of water with them," Berger said.

Berger said at hot-tub parties she enjoys just watching people.

"Things would happen like girls will get in the hot tub, and the guys will try to undo their bathing-suit strings," she said.

Berger said she does not think hot-tub parties are any more dangerous than any other type of party.

"Anytime you get alcohol involved, things can be dangerous," she said.

Several fraternities on campus also rent hot tubs for parties or special events.

Sigma Alpha Epsilon rents hot tubs for Paddy Murphy, a week-long celebration during the third week of April.

Matt Lavery, SAE social chair, said hot tubs are a popular attraction at Paddy Murphy.

"Some people even have sex in them every once in a while," he said.

■ Wet 'n Wild — 537-1825. Residential rates: $125 for 8-person tub, $150 for 10-person tub. Fraternity/Sorority rates vary.
■ Wayne's Water Party — 537-7587. A 14-person tub costs $175 for Friday or Saturday, $150 on weekdays.

Lavery said the hot tubs attract anywhere from 15 to 20 people at a time.

"A lot of people try to hog them," Lavery said. "They'll get in, and then they won't get out. You have to get a place early."

Swimsuits are worn by almost everyone in the hot tub, Lavery said.

"Some girls have gotten in trouble before for not wearing swimsuits, so we ask that they wear swimsuits now," he said.

Lavery said they do have some restrictions surrounding the hot tubs.

"We encourage urinating outside of them," he said.

For the past five years, Lambda Chi Alpha has rented two hot tubs for the Festival of Gluttony in the fall, Matt Crocker, social chair for the Lambda Chis, said.

"I think it was fun having hot tubs at the party, possibly because they are not something that everyone has," Crocker said. "I'm not sure exactly why, but everyone seemed to enjoy themselves."

Besides the hot tubs, Crocker said the Lambda Chis also have a water slide set up.

"We have a lot of fun with that," he said.

Crocker said that although not everyone gets into the hot tub, there are as many as 15 people in it at times.

Loren Ray, co-owner of Wet 'n Wild with his wife, Gail, said there has been an increase in the number of hot-tub rentals since they bought the company two years ago.

"When we first started, we had about three to four rentals a month," Ray said. "Now, we have about eight to 10."

Ray said he became involved with hot-tub rentals in college as a way to earn beer money but has since decided to stay involved in the business.

Ray said there have been some humorous incidents.

"I went to the SAE house one morning after Paddy Murphy to check the chemicals," Ray said. "When I got there, there was a guy passed out in the yard with his head on the Paddy Murphy headstone, and the housemom was outside hollering at him."

The two hot tubs owned by Wet 'n Wild were built with college students in mind, Ray said.

"We took that in consideration with the design of the hot tub," Ray said. "They are pretty much college-student proof."

Wayne Frieling, junior in business management, owns Wayne's Water Party.

Last summer, Frieling built the 14-person hot tub he uses for rentals with his father and grandfather.

Frieling said one of the reasons he decided to build the hot tub was to save money for his fraternity, Beta Sigma Psi.

Frieling said he has another year to year and a half at K-State. After that, he said, he is not sure what he will do with the hot tub.

"I'll possibly sell it or take it with me wherever I go, and if it's a big enough of a city, I'll try to make a go of it," Frieling said.

One of the highlights of owning the hot tub was using it at a tailgate party with KMKF-FM 101.5 in the parking lot at Bramlage Coliseum, Frieling said.

"It was a pretty good time," Frieling said.

Frieling said he rented the hot tub about 13 times last semester. With the exception of about five renters, he said most of the people renting the tub have been college students.

Both Ray and Frieling said the majority of rentals are to people at their homes.

Ray said this is because of the trouble the fraternities have to go through to rent hot tubs.

"The IFC rules are sometimes a hindrance with getting hot tubs," he said.

Both Wet 'n Wild and Wayne's Water Party install the hot tubs and take care of water chemicals and temperature.

AQUARIUS: Happy birthday! It's time for you to cut loose. It's your turn to be in the spotlight so remind people of that. Pals are there for you this week not because they have to but because they want to. You should feel secure in all romantic involvements. Just ask and you will receive. For the weekend, be spontaneous!

PISCES: Problems at work can cause great stress — count to 10 twice. Pisces is feeling unusually social this week. Just go with it. Take time this week to dream, write and think about what lies ahead. By the end of the week, you'll have everyone wrapped around your finger, even that special someone. For the weekend, you take the lead.

ARIES: Exciting Aries prospers when dealing with people. Transformations are everywhere. Take it slow and everything will go as planned. Reoccurring problems need immediate attention. As for the weekend, don't sign any contracts.

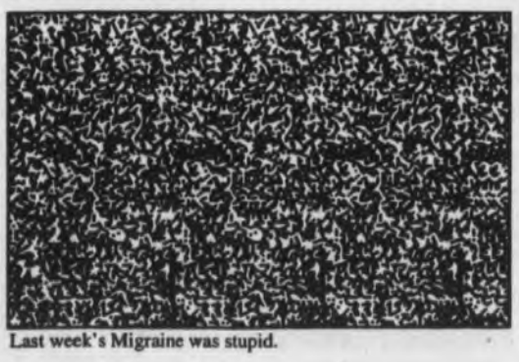
TAURUS: Sensible Taurus needs time to indulge this week. Spend money and time on yourself. Be careful not to overdo it. Also, beware of backstabbing co-workers — they'll get you every time. For the weekend, take a quick getaway.

GEMINI: This week is a time for you to focus on yourself, although that doesn't include being arrogant. Go gentle on anyone who offers any help or suggestions. They're only looking out for your well-being. Someone you didn't expect to see again appears. For the weekend, do exactly what you want to.

CANCER: News flash — it's extremely important you consider all choices before making rash decisions. Since Mars is in retrograde, keep a tight rein on finances. Venus is moving into your opposite sign, so don't expect any lasting love. For the weekend, keep a low profile.

LEO: Feeling extremely indecisive and more curious than usual? It's that crazy planet Mars causing problems again. Leo the lordly lion is in big demand this week, but the question for you is what do you have to offer? This weekend is a good time to decide if that lingering romance is really worth the hassle.

VIRGO: Misunderstanding runs rampant, so work on self-expression. Mars is in retrograde, so beware of mix-ups. Do not, I repeat, do not take any financial risks this week, or you'll be very sorry. That special someone will say just the right thing at the right time. Make this weekend a time to collect your thoughts.



LIBRA: Fitness has never seemed so fun. Take that extra jog around the block. You'll be happy you did. Love is in the air, and it's never been so bright. Self-expression is abounding this week so tell that certain someone you want to be their valentine. P.S. Don't neglect school or work.

SCORPIO: All work and no play has been your motto this week. Take a break. You deserve it. Finances may seem out of whack, so just learn how to minimize the spending. For the weekend, go outside and play on the playground. Be a child again.

SAGITTARIUS: Don't take on too much this week. You have to realize that you have limits. You have to give yourself space from people. Although Sags are known for being social, being alone occasionally isn't so bad. For the weekend, have fun being admired by all.

CAPRICORN: People will be pulling you in every direction. Go where you feel most led. Finances should move into better perspective after the weekend. Work is dominant, so remain focused. This weekend is a great time to meet that special someone you've been looking for.

K-State fans need to have more class

While the Big Eight football season was in full swing a few months ago, the Iowa State Cyclones found themselves enduring yet another winless year.

NICOLE POELL

As the losses kept piling up, the Iowa State Cyclone marching band made the news after it posted the following message on a window of its bus:

"Wanted: A football team the band can be proud of."

So why am I bringing this up now? Because I think the K-State basketball team should post a similar sign with a slightly different message at Bramlage Coliseum. I'm thinking it should go a little something like this:

"Wanted: Fans the basketball team can be proud of."

Now, it's not the number of fans that I'm talking about — that's not the problem. In fact, now that the Big Eight season is well underway, Bramlage at least attracted a respectable number of fans to its games. (Although I'd bet money that there were more people in Bramlage listening to Ross Perot than Asbury's Wildcats have seen all year.)

So what is the problem? It's the sometimes stupid behavior and complete lack of support that some K-State fans display, which translates into a negative image for our school and our team. Ironically, it took a game against the Cyclones for me to realize just how little class and support many of our fans exhibit.

Because I spend many games sitting in press row, I'm usually too focused and intent on the game to really pay attention to what's going on in the stands.

So in order to see firsthand what really takes place outside press row, I did an observation of fan behavior as a fan myself two weeks ago, when the Cats took on Iowa State here in Manhattan. Assisting me in my little project were two of my brothers, Casey and Cody.

We got our first taste of "K-State Klass" when Iowa State senior Loren Meyer stepped up to the free-throw line during the first half. To those of you who aren't familiar with Meyer, he was the Cyclone who was almost killed last year when the truck he was riding in was struck by a train.

Some of our fans remembered that, so in an attempt to be funny, they started whistling and making little train noises. Real cool, guys. I'm sure Meyer appreciated that little reminder of his brush with death.

So I guess I shouldn't have been surprised with what happened next during the halftime show.

As the Bud Light Daredevils performed an impressive acrobatic routine (which was a step up from most halftime shows), one genius seated a few rows down from us yelled, "You suck!" after one of the Daredevils missed a dunk. Pretty classy. Boy, am I proud to be going to the same school as you.

Things didn't improve much as the game wore on.

While the Cats kept plugging away, threatening to take the lead at any time in the second half, they sure didn't get much encouragement from many so-called fans. You would think that with the Cats so close to victory, the energy level in "The Purple Palace" would have the place rocking.

Sadly, this wasn't the case.

Instead, the fans would cheer a little bit with each K-State basket, then quickly quiet down when the Cyclones answered back. Call me crazy, but I was under the impression that this was the time a team needs support the most, not the least.

In fact, my brother Casey made an interesting observation as we heard more and more cheers for the Cyclones.

"I'll be damned if the Iowa State crowd was just as loud or louder than the K-State crowd," he said.

I couldn't agree more.

Then, as if the fans' enthusiasm couldn't get much lower, some of them just got up and left.

Left.

With almost five minutes left in the game, many people had given up on the Cats and weren't willing to stick around. Boy, I'll bet our players were encouraged when they looked up to see lines of purple leaving the building. I'm sure that does wonders for team morale. If the fans were already giving up, why shouldn't they?

Luckily, our players don't give up, and although they lost the game, they played tough until the end despite the lack of support.

So what can be done to improve this situation? I've got a few ideas.

Maybe a cheesy applause meter would help get the crowd a little noisier during the crucial times.

Maybe the K-State pep band could add a few more crowd-pleasing selections to its three-song repertoire.

And maybe, I know this is asking a lot, people who call themselves fans could start acting like them.

K-State signs 23 recruits

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

The K-State football team announced that 23 incoming student athletes will be joining the Wildcat program.

The recruiting list is made up of five junior-college transfers and 18 high-school players from all over the nation.

"This may be the most diverse recruiting class that we have had to date. We've got a little bit of everything: size, speed, toughness, talent, character and some uncertainty," said three-time Big Eight Coach of the Year Bill Snyder.

Florida was kind to K-State with the signing of seven players from that area. The Kansas region was next with four signees, and Missouri and Texas filtered out three each.

California signed two, and Colorado, Illinois, Louisiana and Oklahoma signed one student athlete each.

"We were somewhat pleased with the improvement of our in-state recruiting," Snyder said. "We also held our own in Florida and Missouri but did not have the success in Texas and Oklahoma that we had hoped for."

With the loss of 17 seniors from last year's 9-3 team, the K-State program went after recruits with multiple talents and skills.

"Several are capable of playing competitively at two or more positions. We were able to recruit at the junior-college level to meet immediate needs created by graduation," Snyder said.

"These are all good young people who we believe want and will work hard to achieve a quality education."

The focus of this year's recruiting class was at the lineman position on offense or defense. Ten of the 23 total signees play on the front line.

The Wildcats recruited four linebackers — three players at quarterback and receiver positions. Only two defensive backs with the starting defensive backfield are returning next season.

James Garcia, a punter from Victoria High in Texas who averaged 42.9 yards per punt in his high-school career, will be joining the Cats.

"Although we will not accurately be able to assess this recruiting class until it has been in place for a couple of years, we are pleased with the distribution by position except at the running back position, where we were unable to hold on to early commitments," Snyder said.

"We'd like to believe that the talent level has improved with the class. That remains to be seen."

These new 23 student-athletes will get their first taste of Division-I football on Sept. 2 at Temple University.

Cats to battle Tigers

TODD STEWART
Collegian

A second chance.

After last month's horrendous shooting performance in Columbia, Mo., that is exactly what K-State's basketball team will get in an afternoon showdown tomorrow against Missouri.

The Jan. 14 game saw the Cats miss 29 of 35 shots in the first half en route to a 16-point half. That kind of a half won't help a K-State win tomorrow, but head coach Tom Asbury said he liked how his team is playing of late.

"We've played pretty well. We've been in every game with the exception of Nebraska," Asbury said. "I've been encouraged by our effort."

Asbury said he is also pleased with the team's offense.

"Our offensive productivity has gotten a little better as time's gone by," Asbury said. "We have just executed better."

Trying to limit the Cats' offensive production will be the stingy Tiger defense, led in part by junior twin centers Sammie and Simeon Haley.

"Those big guys cause you some problems; they got 10 fouls between them," Asbury said.

But for the Cats to win, their defense must perform as it did in the earlier season meeting in guarding Missouri senior guard Paul O'Liney.

The Cats were able to limit the offensive firepower of O'Liney to a quiet 15 points.

Asbury said he knows a key in the game tomorrow is stopping O'Liney.

"He's real dangerous. He gets on a roll, and you're in trouble," Asbury said.

Tomorrow's match-up will be the sixth consecutive game in which the Cats have taken on a team ranked in the Top 25.

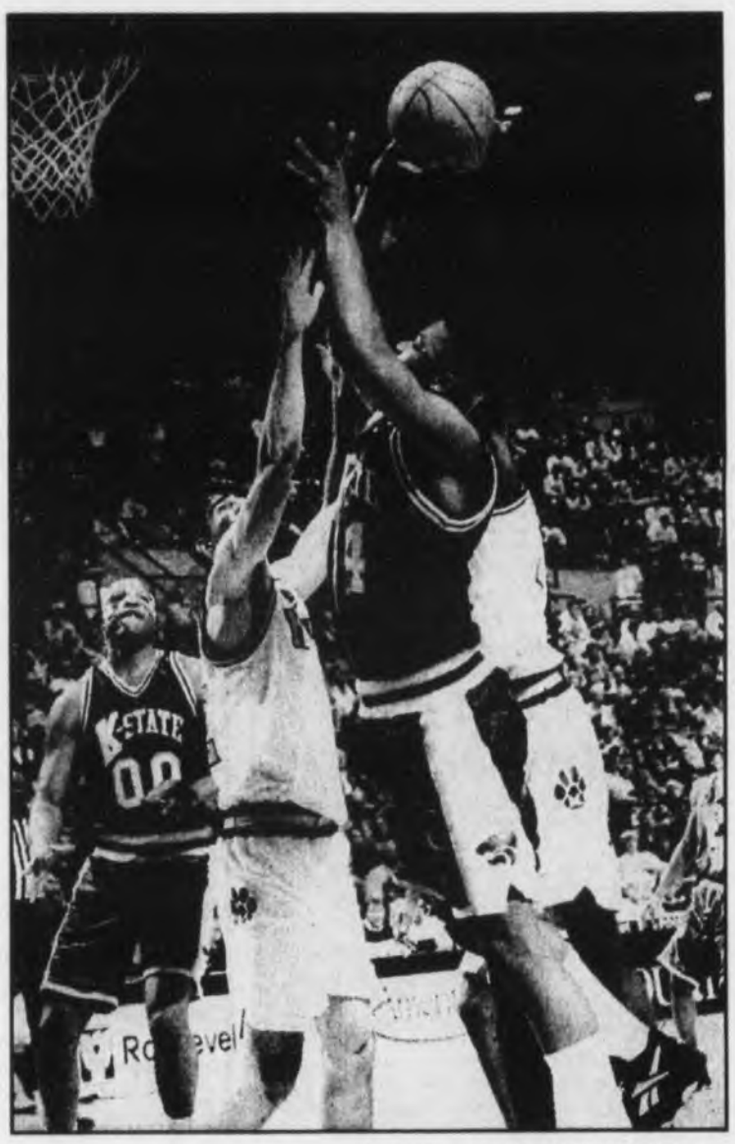
Despite dropping five of those six games against ranked opponents, the Cats' two lone Big Eight Conference victories have come at home.

This one-week layoff between games is the Cats' first extended playing break since late December, a break Asbury said came at an opportune time.

"This week comes at a good time for us," Asbury said. "We just need to stay mentally sharp this time of year."

After Missouri, the Cats jump right back into Big Eight play when they travel next week to Norman, Okla., to face the Oklahoma Sooners, a team they defeated earlier this season 87-77.

But for now, the focus is on the Tigers, who come into the game as the 18th-ranked team in the nation, despite having to replace all five starters from last year's undefeated conference champions.



"Missouri has done an unbelievable job this year," Asbury said. "That's just an incredible job Norm has done with this group of guys."

Asbury also said his team might be playing better than initially expected. He admitted that when he took the job, postseason play seemed almost unrealistic.

"I thought the NIT would have been a stretch," he said.

With 11 K-State wins already under his belt this season, Asbury has set 15 victories in his mind as what it would take to get into postseason play.

"We can make some noise in the Big Eight tourney, if not earlier," Asbury said.

Clones, Huskers to invade Bramlage during weekend

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

With the Big Eight season half over, K-State returns home this weekend for a two-game home stand.

The Wildcats will face Iowa State at 7 p.m. and will be host to Nebraska at 2 p.m. Sunday.

The Cats defeated both teams on the road in January for their only two conference wins of the season.

"We need to get some confidence with some successes," said Wildcat coach Brian Agler. "When we get that, we'll take another step forward, even better than we were before."

Despite Iowa State's 0-7 conference record, Agler is not discounting the Cyclones.

"They're going to come in hungry, and they've played almost everybody close," Agler said.

Iowa State will bring in a high-scoring front-line lead by freshman forward Jayme Olson. Olson's 14.9-point average is the team high for Iowa State.

"Iowa State is a physical team. They are going to look to pound the ball inside, then take it to the basket," Agler said.

Senior post Shanele Stires said the Cats are used to playing against bigger teams.

"We've been playing teams bigger than us all year, and that isn't going to change," Stires said.

The Cats won the previous meeting in Ames 63-51.

Nebraska will bring a different look to Manhattan, adding an outside threat to its solid post game.

"Nebraska is really balanced," Agler said.

"They have good three-point shooters, and they'll show a good inside game."

All five of Nebraska's starters average at least 9.9 points per game, led by 6'4" center Prya Aarden, scoring 14.2 points per game.

"They are going to come in hungry, too," Agler said.

"Nebraska played five of their first seven games at home, and they know how important a game like this can be."

The Cats will be counting on a big game from Stires, who leads the Big Eight in scoring with 22.4 points per game in conference play.

"She's important, but we've got to have people other than Shanele coming through," Agler said.

"Andria Jones and Lisa Gaitor can really make a difference on our team.

Wentland to compete in New York

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

The track team will be one member short when it competes at the Kansas Invitational today.

Gwen Wentland, who holds the world pentathlon high jump record, will be competing in the Melrose Games in New York City.

She bettered her own record of 6 feet 4 inches at the Winter Pentathlon with a leap of 6'4-1/2" at the Wildcat Pentathlon.

"She's just a better athlete than a year ago," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said after the Wildcat Pentathlon.

"There's no secret to this — she just works hard."

Wentland has also been named the Big Eight Trackster of the Month.

She ranks in the top 10 in four categories of the Big Eight Season Best Performance list. Wentland ranks first in the high jump, first in the pentathlon, second in the triple jump and fifth in the long jump.

"She's so much stronger than last season," Rovelto said.

"She's proven herself as one of the best in the nation again."

The Melrose Games are a part of the Grand Prix of Track Circuit and are one of three or four events on the circuit series.

▶ KUREGIAN ADVANCES IN 1ST ROUND

K-State all-American Karina Kuregian advanced against Tyler Junior College's Laura Nhavene, 6-2, 7-5 Thursday in Dallas.

"Both players were nervous to start the match," said K-State coach Steve Bietau.

"There were a lot of mistakes on both sides of the net."

Kuregian will play Jennifer Poulos of the University of California today at 10:30 a.m.

Drunken dialers will not make friends

Dear Cassie,
My ex-boyfriend and I broke up about a year ago, and he wants nothing to do with me. I still want to be a part of his life as a friend. I call him up often, especially when I am drunk. He always ends up hanging up on me and never calls me back. Is it wrong to want a "friend" relationship with an ex?
Signed, Drunken Love

Dear Drunken Love,
No, it is not wrong to want to remain friends with your ex, as long as that wish is desirable to you both. It sounds as if your ex has no wish to stay close. And, as painful as it may sound, you're just going to have to respect that and let him go.
Signed, Cassie

Slackjaw, MU330 capture crowd at Berlin

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

A strange storm seemed to escalate around Berlin Wednesday night when Lawrence's Slackjaw and St. Louis' MU330 ruptured an otherwise insignificant evening with a heavy dose of funk and rage.

Slackjaw consecrated the night like dictators with a vindictive wall of nihilistic oblivion.

Skinny D on vocals, Josh Brewer on bass, Dave Melody on drums, Shane Murray on guitar and Bob Cutler on lead guitar demanded a deep attentiveness and energy from the crowd.

The band, now in its fifth year, captivated the crowd with a merciless aggression.

"We have to get aggravated," said Cutler, who is currently running for city commissioner of Lawrence. "If you're not aggravated, then you're not paying attention, and you're being taken advantage of."

Socio-political antagonism seems to be the underlying theme of most of the band's songs, although you'll have to take their word for it.

Their volatile rapture inhales the lyrics and redistributes them as an animalistic eruption of unintelligible soul-sucking rage.

"I think sometimes we scare people," Melody said.

They're intimidating on stage, but behind the scenes they radiate a wit and humor that is humble and embracing.

"Sometimes the only way men can really express themselves to each other is by beating the shit out of each other," Cutler said.

Mild moshing, stage dives and a wave of stale cloves circulated as Skinny D asked simply, "Are you satisfied?"

MU330 baptized the house next with a rare outburst of pure and undefinable ska. They converted the stage to a playground of an unapologetic spastic goofiness. The band is John Skavanaugh on trumpet, Dan Potthast on guitar, Chris Diebold on bass, Ted Moll on drums, Rob Bell on trombone and Matt Knobbe on sax.

Despite some technical problems with sound, the nocturnal funk seemed to inhibit all inhibition and brew a playful but explosive adventure.

According to Bell, it is live music that must be appreciated.

"It's raw," Bell said. "It's the rawest thing. You can feel the energy coming through each member. It is the only way to find out what a band is really like."

From a winding and sly brashness to a tenacious hysteria, MU330 sustained a flirtatious and vibrant pulse that was constant and contagious.

Very few remained still. The groove demanded the grooving. It was wound. It was like a two-step-polka-mosh.

The bands shared two songs together that entranced the crowd like a tipsy tug-of-war.

The respect and admiration between them seemed to feed the other with an enduring energy that was ornery and all-encompassing.

"We'll be back," Moll said. "When you get a crowd like this, you have to come back."

Clown includes body language, audience in show

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

McCain Performing Arts Series has something for everyone, including children and families.

Avner the Eccentric, a silent clown, will perform at 3 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

"Some of the things on the series aren't for children," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said. "They may disrupt the performance because they don't know how to behave. We have this as entertainment for people with children. It allows them to go as a family."

Avner has performed all over the world, including France, Canada and Israel, and had a successful Broadway show of his own for a season.

"I first saw him perform 10 or maybe 11 years ago in New York City," Martin said. "There were a lot of young people in the audience with their parents, and everybody had a wonderful time."

"I saw him again a couple of years ago again in New York at an arts conference," he said. "He kept more than 700 arts administrators entranced, and arts administrators are often a tough crowd."

Avner studied theater and went to Paris for a year to study mime, but he isn't a stereotypical mime performer.

"Some people are turned of by the word 'mime' because they have a traditional view," Martin said. "Most people think of the white face, like Marcel Marceau."

SILENT CLOWN

Avner the Eccentric will perform at 3 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium. Tickets are $15 for the public, $7.50 for students. Reservations can be made for the children's party by calling [illegible]

"He is a mime only in the sense that he doesn't use speech. He uses body language in his skits," Martin said. "Avner is more like a silent clown, not a mime."

A strong interest in children makes Avner popular with the young crowd, but he performs for people of all ages.

"He is working at a school right now," Martin said. "It is nice to know he likes to work with children because they offer good insight on things, but he likes to perform for a mixed crowd."

A variety of skits are part of Avner's program, including some audience participation.

"He usually finds someone in the audience and has them come up on stage to do something," Martin said.

In addition to Avner's performance, there will be a special party, sponsored by McCain Children's Committee, at 1:13 p.m. Sunday for the children in McCain's lobby.

"The time was chosen deliberately so people will notice it and remember it," Martin said. "Typically we have activities appropriate for the age of children

▶ MULTICULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS

New coordinator redirects office's focus

SHELLY FOGEL
Collegian

A united-by-diversity slogan is tacked on her bulletin board. Moving boxes stuffed with belongings for her new office are stacked in the corner.

Dina Bennett, new coordinator of multicultural student organizations, is settling into her office, and her new coordinator position. She began her new job Jan. 18.

"We are trying to refocus the office to provide the best service that we can," Bennett said.

As coordinator, Bennett will supervise multicultural student organizations including Black Student Union, Hispanic American Leadership Organization, Asian Americans for Intercultural Awareness and Native American Student Body.

All of the organizations have faculty advisers, but each multicultural organization is under Bennett's auspice, she said.

Bennett will also coordinate the publication of the Alliance newspaper, which highlights multicultural events and is distributed to more than 1,500 students.

Like the slogan in her office, Bennett said she thinks people have more similarities than differences.

"Even though we are all different, there are common threads that unite all of us. We strive for many of the same things in life," Bennett said.

Before becoming coordinator of multicultural student activities, Bennett was a graduate assistant at the multicultural student organizations office. She completed her master's degree at K-State in student counseling and personnel services in 1992.

Bennett also earned a bachelor's degree in communications studies with a minor in psychology from Washburn University.

One of the main purposes of multicultural student organizations is to be a support system for the students, Bennett said.

"Sometimes, students do not feel like they fit in. Multicultural organizations serve as a connection to the University," she said.

Jawwad Abdulhaqq, president of BSU, works closely with Bennett.

Abdulhaqq said he believes multicultural organizations, and a coordinator for the activities, are essential.

"Who would do programming for Black History Month? It is a necessity, but it is not always taken as a necessity," he said.

Abdulhaqq also said he hopes Bennett will help BSU achieve its goals.

"BSU hopes she will help us improve skills within the organization and bring about our goals in a more efficient manner," he said.

In addition to her work as a graduate assistant, prior to becoming coordinator Bennett worked with Upward Bound and the Academic Assistance Center since July 1993.

She has also been the adviser to Minority Assembly of Students in Health at K-State and is a member of the Black Faculty and Staff Alliance.

Committee challenges image of men as brutes

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

The sensationalism of sexual offenses in the media prompted a committee chair of Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls to combat this image stereotype of men, Paul English, chairperson of Education on Campus Issues, said.

"I feel that rape has been kind of a slap in the face to men," English said.

Education on Campus Issues plans to develop a poster featuring some prominent, male campus figures condemning rape.

Scott Hagemeister, escort chair for Haymaker Hall, said the media tend to dramatize a sexual offense, which hurts men in the long run.

"It's kind of sustaining a stereotype of men being very brutal, almost animalistic in some aspects," he said.

"Those few sex offenders, because they are glorified, make it seem like there's more than there really are."

English said the poster will be similar to one that was created at Rutgers University, which was titled "The Real Men of Rutgers."

"I'm not going to say that this is going to stop rape," he said. "What I'm hoping for is that this is going to begin to change things. What I would like to change is the attitudes and images that a lot of men have towards women."

The poster distributed at Rutgers consisted of photos of 12 male student leaders accompanied by a brief biography and a comment condemning violence against women.

English said he has sent letters to student government leaders, to the speech department, various fraternity leaders, Coach Bill Snyder and Coach Tom Asbury.

"I asked them if they could pass the letter on to someone who could represent the ideals of the poster," he said.

English said he is optimistic that the poster will gain financial aid from campus organizations.

"We're pretty confident that we can get some good sponsorship from a lot of different people," English said.

"I know that Lafene and a couple of other places have offered to give some financial support, but ARH, right now, is footing the bill."

English said he hopes to have 100 to 200 posters distributed on campus and throughout the residence halls after spring break.

"I'm hoping to have this done by the end of March," English said.

In addition to the poster, Education on Campus Issues has been involved with presentations and open forums addressing the issue of rape.

"Basically, we break it down as a control issue," English said. "Men need to take control over their lives. I still think there are men out there who think 'no' means 'yes.'"

Professors would buy computers for K-State with patent earnings buildings in an earthquake, but it also protects the contents of the building.

"In an earthquake, the stories of a building shift. With this design the entire structure will move as a unit. People inside the building during an earthquake will still feel the motion, but damage to the building and the contents should be eliminated," Kirmser said.

The invention was disclosed to the KSU Research Foundation in 1990.

Since then, the KSU Research Foundation has been helping Kirmser, Hu and Swartz patent their design. A patent already exists in Taiwan and the United States. The patent will be effective Tuesday. Applications are also pending in China and Japan.

The next step is to find someone to build a structure in an earthquake zone so that they will have a record to prove their predictions.

"We would also like to find a design firm that would incorporate it in the design of major structures," Kirmser said.

Hu said part of the problem with finding a firm to use it is proving to them that it really does work.

"We have strong confidence in the design. But other people want to see the physical evidence, such as a structure standing after an earthquake," Hu said.

"Proving that our design works would promote it worldwide. We want to promote it and market it to help K-State buy computers and lab equipment."

Communications expert stresses need for leaders

The E in the acronym was for effort.

She said effort needs to be exerted in the right places by both parents and children.

Her next point was attitude.

"We need to have more positive thinking," Kern-Foxworth said.

D stands for defeat, she said.

"We will all suffer defeat," Kern-Foxworth said. "If you have not suffered defeat, you have never taken a risk. When you suffer defeat, realize you can come back."

The second E in leadership was enthusiasm, which is essential to everything she does, she said.

R stood for respect.

"We don't have respect for ourselves," she said. "We don't have respect for our elders. We don't have respect for each other."

Kern-Foxworth said respect is promoted through a strong spiritual foundation, a foundation she believes is void in many people's lives today.

The next point was success.

"As a race, we need to decide what success is to us," Kern-Foxworth said.

Whether success means making more money, getting children off drugs or getting high-school students out of gangs, some measure of success needs to be defined, said Kern-Foxworth.

The H should mean to help others, Kern-Foxworth said.

People need to ask themselves whether they have done anything or said anything that has made the world a better place, she said.

"You have to realize you haven't done anything on your own," she said.

Kern-Foxworth said that all African Americans before her have helped open opportunities to African Americans today.

Her ninth point was initiative.

"We are in a very desperate time in history," Kern-Foxworth said. She said African Americans need to take the initiative to make their world a better place.

Kern-Foxworth said the last letter, P, was for perfectionalism.

In terms of a national leader to unify African Americans, Kern-Foxworth said she thought Jesse Jackson would be the best person.

She said his past involvement running for president helped to strengthen him as a national leader for the African American community.

Following the speech, Kim Hamilton, K-State alumna, said her senses felt revived by Kern-Foxworth's speech.

"She gave us a lot to think about considering the future of African Americans," she said.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, said Kern-Foxworth has a unique way of getting a message across without being too direct.

"She's a very creative writer who has a way of using symbols and stories we can all relate to," Franklin said.

"Rush Limbaugh's vision of the anti-Christ might look a lot like Reno" (Steve Parks, Newsday). This New York-based writer and solo performer has been compared to Bette Midler in mechanic's drag; to Lily Tomlin, if all her characters were fused into one high-energy package; and to Woody Allen, if he actually enjoyed performing. She's been featured in Rolling Stone, had an HBO comedy Special, performed at Lincoln Center's Serious Fun Festival, and done a cameo in Robert Redford's Quiz Show. Join her for a side-splittingly funny (and R-rated) look at America today.

"Rev this baby up and let 'er rip. Reno is a souped-up comedy machine, road tested and designed for foot-to-the-floor excitement." (Austin American Statesman)

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

Halls prepare for semi-formal

KSUARH sponsors winter dance; higher attendance expected

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

It's time to get dressed up and go dancing.

The annual residence hall Winterball will be from 8 p.m. to midnight Saturday at the K-State Union Ballroom.

The ball, which is sponsored by Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, is open to all residence-hall members and their guests, said Lin Bliss, KSUARH president and junior in pre-med.

The semi-formal event is free. Refreshments will be served, and people can go either with dates or alone.

"I think it will be a lot of fun. The committee has done an outstanding job putting it all together," she said.

KSUARH has been sponsoring this event for more than 15 years, Bliss said.

Marcia Hellwig, junior in accounting, attended the ball last year.

"I had a really good time. It's the one time of the year that everyone can get together," she said.

Past balls have averaged about 300 people in attendance, but a higher number is predicted this year because there has been more advertising, said Julia Trowbridge, social chairperson for KSUARH and sophomore in architectural engineering.

Michelle Cortese, sophomore in animal science, said she is excited about this year.

"All of my friends went last year and had a great time, so I thought I would join in this year," she said.

Lunar Tunes will be providing a variety of music, Trowbridge said.

The theme of this year's ball is Enchanted Winterland.

The decorations will be complete with a walk through the park and street lamps overhead, Trowbridge said.

The committee, which has representatives from every residence hall but Edwards Hall, has been planning the ball since the beginning of December.

"We've all put in a ton of time. We've had five official meetings, and some were three hours.

"Then we split up some of the duties and made phone calls," Trowbridge said.

But all the hard work gives the residence-hall members a chance to enjoy themselves.

"It's a nice opportunity for the residence halls to have a chance to get dressed up and come. The greeks have their formals, and this is ours," Trowbridge said.

Hellwig said she hoped this year's ball would be no exception to the balls of the past.

"The Winterball comes off beautiful every year. Even if you're not a socialite, you will have fun," Hellwig said.

Concert to feature jazz selections

Baker, along with occasional guest conductors.

Both are accomplished performers, directors and writers in the jazz music field.

"They use two conductors to balance out personal schedules and tour locations," Martin said. "Loren Schoenberg will be the conductor for our performance. Schuller was originally scheduled, but for health reasons he can't perform, so Schoenberg was invited to conduct."

Musical selections are taken from two collections at the National Museum of American History at the Smithsonian, the Duke Ellington Collection and the Jazz Masterworks Editions.

"The music in the collections is fundamentally big-band selections," Hasse said. "In the Duke Ellington collection, there are 200,000 pages of music. The amount of music is just staggering."

The Ellington collection, most of which was unpublished, was donated to the museum in 1988 by Ellington's sister and his son.

Of the 2,000 different Ellington compositions, only four were done as a complete musical score. The museum has been working on the music and trying to complete scores to recreate the authentic sound.

"We have about 200 pieces transcribed for the orchestra," Hasse said. "There are only about 20 people in the world who can do this type of work well."

Musical selections for each performance are taken from a playlist containing the works of 10 major big-band orchestras.

"They will be playing authentic pieces of big-band and swing-jazz music," Martin said. "I think people will enjoy it. These are first-rate musicians. There's no doubt about their musical abilities."

To vary each performance, the conductor sets the program for each evening from the playlist.

"The selections are taken from the list, allowing the conductor to tailor the program for the audience and himself," Hasse said. "This places a heavy demand on the players, because they have to master the styles of 10 different orchestras done all in one evening. This also shows off their technical ability."

Grab a cowboy hat and some boots and get ready to hear some live country music this weekend.

Midnite Run, a band from Topeka, is going to perform at the Silverado Saloon at 9:30 tonight and Saturday night.

Jon Farrell, owner of Silverado's, said Midnite Run is one of the bar's best bands.

"It draws a crowd, is very professional and plays a wide variety of music," Farrell said. "They can come in and play all the great Top-40 country, then turn around and do KISS and Van Halen."

Farrell said Silverado's brings Midnite Run in at least every six or seven weeks because the students love the band's ability to play a range of music.

Anthony William, Midnite Run lead vocalist and acoustic and electric guitarist, said Silverado's is Midnite Run's favorite place to play because of sentimental reasons.

The band has played on and off at Silverado's since they first got together.

"This is our crowd," William said. "They have watched us grow from a mediocre band to a really good one."

He said some Manhattan residents follow the group on the road.

Because Silverado's is in a college town, it is ideal for Midnite Run, which is geared to the 21- to 30-year-old age group, William said.

"They have a good rapport with the audience," Farrell said.

During breaks between their usual four sets, the band mingles with audience members and will get them signed up for Midnite Run's free newsletter.

Midnite Run formed three years ago, William said. However, William said he's the only remaining original member.

Wiz, Midnite Run's bass guitarist, is the newest member. He began three months ago after having left Submytion, a local alternative band, William said.

"Now we have the right four," William said. "Some people just want to play worse than others."

Midnite Run likes to play modern country, William said.

"We usually take the Billboard list and go," William said.

He said the band tries to get a hold of singles to perform even before they are released.

Sawyer Brown is the country group that Midnite Run is most patterned after, but the band is also influenced by bands such as Little Texas and Diamond Rio, William said.

Midnite Run is trying to make the jump into the big time.

The group has been seeking some dates at larger clubs and has opened for several big acts, William said.

William said Midnite Run automatically gets to open for any big acts that come to Silverado's.

"Getting opening-act jobs is very important," William said.

Midnite Run opened for Ricky Lynn Gregg at Incahoots in Wichita on Jan. 26 and has also opened for David Alan Coe and Confederate Railroad, William said.

SHOW TIME
Midnite Run will perform at 9:30 tonight and Saturday at Silverado Saloon.

William said the band hopes to get noticed by a prominent record label and get a contract.

"It's hard to make a living at this level," William said.

Because performing is the only thing the band members do, they have to do shows four or five nights a week to survive, William said.

William said the band hopes fans will be able to purchase a Midnite Run album this summer around July.

With seven original songs, Midnite Run is almost ready to make an album, William said.

▶ LEGISLATURE

Bill proposes pet restriction

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

The ownership and sale of lions, tigers and, yes, even grizzly bears may soon be more strictly regulated if the Kansas Legislature passes an exotic animals bill.

The bill, which would require licensing for both exotic animal sales and purchases, is geared toward inherently dangerous livestock and pets, William Skaer, a Wichita veterinarian, said.

"Now you can own a lion or tiger without any regulations," Skaer said. "It is needed before some child is seriously injured."

It was a combination of Skaer's master thesis in environmental studies at Friends University about the need for stricter regulations on exotic animals and the attack of two Butler County children by a pet lion that initiated the writing of the bill, sponsored by Sen. David Corbin, R-Towanda, Skaer said.

Corbin was unavailable to comment on the bill at this time.

Animals included in the inherently dangerous list include large carnivores and wolves, Skaer said. Iguanas and other popular exotic pets are not the concern of the bill.

The bill would require the purchase of a license from the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, the agency that would be charged with administrating the bill.

With a license, people would still be able to own exotic animals.

Wildlife and Parks will also be responsible for making sure the owners meet caging and maintenance standards, Skaer said.

Darrell Montei, special assistant to the Secretary of Wildlife and Parks, said while the department favors the idea of controlling dangerous animals, it has some problems with the bill itself.

"It doesn't take many kids being mauled to decide if something needs to be done," Montei said.

As the bill is written, a person operating an exotic livestock business would be required to buy a license with a cost of up to $375. Annually, an operator will be required to pay a renewal fee of up to $150.

A person who owns, maintains or has a caged, dangerous animal would be required to buy a license costing up to $500, with a renewal fee of up to $250.

Montei said people have complained that the price of the licenses are too high; however, even at the present levels, the income from the fees are not enough to cover the cost of the program.

After the second year, the department will still be $40,000-$50,000 too short to cover the price of regulating these animals, Montei said.

In this case, the department would be forced to take money from hunting and fishing license funds for the program. These funds go toward regulation and conservation of native species and state parks.

Montei said the department does not feel it is proper to take money from these licenses because it would be forcing hunters and anglers to pay for a program to regulate the exotic animal industry.

A better solution, Montei said, would be for more agencies to be involved than just Wildlife and Parks.

"I think we need a joint effort for a better approach," he said.

Don Wixom, director of Sunset Zoo, said the problem with owning exotic pets is people do not know how to properly care for them.

"People buy these pets like a dog or a cat not realizing the special requirements," Wixom said.

STAFF/Collegian

Sitting on the sofa, Cody Palechek, 7, gives Tae Hopple Yarrow, the family pet cougar, a scratch on the chin. (Below): Tae Hoppie Yarrow, pet cougar, suns herself on the hood of a car.

Llama s and donkeys and cougars, oh my!

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

Cougars prowl the plains of north-central Kansas, but not as freely as one might think.

The Palecek family, of Munden, owns two cougars and an ark full of other animals.

While the family's sheep, goats, llamas, donkeys and an occasional orphaned raccoon would not care about Senate Bill 47, a bill to regulate the ownership of exotic pets, the family does.

Despite their love of animals, Kim Palecek said if they would have had to buy a license on top of the cost for the cougar and the $1,000 of initial veterinarian bills, they would have probably never got their female cougar, Tae Hoppie Yarrow.

Cody Palecek gave his wife, Kim, the cougar for her birthday four years ago after paying $800 for it.

If Senate Bill 47 is passed by the Legislature this spring, owners like the Paleceks would have to pay as much as $500 up front and $250 a year to own exotic pets.

While she can see the need for regulations of exotic wildlife, Kim said she feels exotic pets can be cared for responsibly.

"I feel like there are a lot of other problems than this stupid bill they are trying to get passed," Kim said.

After buying Tae Hoppie Yarrow, the family bred her with another cougar, and she gave birth to Tigger and Sarah, cubs they never planned to keep.

Sarah had a genetic heart defect and died after her first birthday.

They ran ads for the male cub and received a lot of calls, but they never found a good home for him.

"We averaged four to seven calls a day," Kim said, but they never found another family they felt were ready for the responsibility of owning a cougar cub, so they kept him.

When they first bought Tae Hoppie Yarrow, they fed the cub

Chris Reeves, a K-State student who was beaten by a group of attackers two weeks ago, is running for student body president.

Reeves announced his candidacy Saturday at a press conference at the Kansas Rehabilitation Hospital in Topeka.

He said he had decided to run for president before the night of Jan. 22, when he was walking home from a computer lab on campus. A group of men pulled up in a car and got out.

They beat the 5-foot-6, 105-pound Reeves almost to the point of death, Lu Reeves, Chris's mother, said.

"All the doctors told us Chris came within five minutes of losing his life," she said.

Dr. Joseph Nora said Reeves had multiple contusions and a skull fracture of the right proximinal lobe and the left temporal lobe.

He was beaten so severely that when he would turn his head directly after the attack, blood

Accessibility forces center to move

WADE ANDERSON
Collegian

The FONE Crisis Center was forced to relocate from the UFM building to Building K of Jardine Terrace Apartments in order to comply with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

"It would have had to shut down if another place wasn't found," said Chris Ginn, sophomore in secondary education and FONE liaison for Student Senate.

The Jardine location is temporary. If the location is needed by any handicapped person wanting to live at Jardine, the FONE Crisis Center must give up its room to that person, said Bill Poteet, coordinator of the FONE Center.

He also said the rental agreement was only until August.

Tony Jurich, member of the advisory board for the FONE Center, said the telephones were not accessible for wheelchairs at the old location in the UFM building.

"UFM was given the option to correct the problems," he said.

To comply, UFM not only would have to add a ramp but also widen the door.

"Widening the door would have caused a major structure change," he said. "They decided they couldn't afford it."

The center had until Feb. 1, but moved Jan. 27. No calls to the center were missed, Poteet said.

"There was no interruption of our services," he said.

Poteet said the rent changed slightly from $200 to $175 plus utilities.

"We won't need any more money," he said.

Jardine picked up the phone costs in the rental agreement, Poteet said.

Ginn said the center is still on last year's budget.

"Student Senate didn't have to reallocate any new funds to the FONE Crisis Center," he said.

Senate passed a resolution saying they wanted the University to try to find a temporary location on or off campus and eventually have a permanent location on campus, Ginn said.

▶ CAMPUS

ADA compliance prompts new renovations

JASON DURANDO
Collegian

Concern about compliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act and fire safety codes has prompted University officials to plan some renovations in Calvin Hall.

Calvin Hall has been under construction since summer 1994, said Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect.

"The Board of Regents has taken a request to the Legislature to increase funding for University projects," he said.

"K-State's share would be around $74 million. That money would go both to current construction projects as well as major renovations and upgrades to existing buildings."

Calvin's ground floor was renovated to add a stairwell and an elevator to increase access.

An alert system was installed in conjunction with the fire alarms. This system has 13 stations and will display the location of anyone who accesses the system in an emergency.

The interior of the building was also upgraded and remodeled. The new stairwell still retains the original stairway railing from the grand stairs that were in the center.

"We are now completing the third phase and getting started on the fourth and final phase of the state-funded construction, which involves some work in the attic," Carter said. "Our No. 1 goal in the renovation was to add interior fire stairs and to remove the outdated exterior metal stairs."

▶ 20-YEAR-OLD STUDENT STUDYING ABROAD KILLED IN BUS ACCIDENT

K-State student Heather Stewart was killed in Spain Saturday as she was exiting a tour bus after returning from a weekend trip to Muros, Spain.

The 20-year-old from Emporia studied human development and family studies at K-State.

She arrived in Spain Jan. 9 to spend a semester at the University of Satiago De Compostela with the intent of becoming bilingual, Sharon Stewart, Stewart's mother, said.

The accident occurred at 7:30 a.m. Central Standard Time after the student had exited the tour bus she was riding when the tour bus struck her as she was passing in front of it, Carla Jones, assistant dean of student life, said.

Stewart was the only K-State student of eight students picked to participate in the University of Kansas exchange program to Spain.

Max and Sharon Stewart said their daughter's main goal in life was to help and love other people, and one reason she wanted to become bilingual was to enable her to help more people.

"She just loved people," Stewart said.

Before traveling abroad, Stewart spent two summers as a day camp counselor and a resident assistant at YMCA Camp Jones Gulch in California.

Stewart

"She still gets letters from the children she counseled and from other counselors," Stewart said.

At K-State, Stewart was active in the Alpha Delta Pi sorority, Big Brothers-Big Sisters of America Inc. and was a rush counselor.

"She absolutely loved K-State," Stewart said, "and she almost literally lived for her friends."

In Emporia, Stewart was also a member of the First Presbyterian Church and graduated from Emporia High school in 1992.

Stewart said her daughter had a beautiful smile.

"If anyone knew her, they were enchanted with her smile from the very beginning," Stewart said.

Stewart is survived by an older brother, Bob Stewart, 24, who graduated from K-State and is now a sophomore at the University of Kansas medical school.

There will be a service at 7 p.m Wednesday at the First Presbyterian Church in Emporia.

▶ LONG-TIME EMPLOYEE CHOSEN PRESIDENT OF ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Hail Madame President.

The appointment of the only female executive officer of an alumni association in the Big Eight Conference and the new Big Twelve Conference was announced at K-State Friday.

Behind the closed doors of executive session, the KSU Alumni Association Board of Directors voted unanimously to select Amy Renz as the next president of the K-State Alumni Association.

Renz will take charge of an alumni association with an alumni population of 114,000, the highest membership percentage population in the Big Eight.

"Amy has given 17 years of dedication and loyal service to Kansas State University," Lee Borck, national chairman of the Alumni Association board of directors, said.

"As the association's vice president since 1988, she was responsible for membership and revenue programs that annually raised $750,000. The Alumni Association is at the forefront of the Big Eight in terms of our size largely due to her outstanding efforts," Borck said.

Renz was chosen from a field of 20 applicants from across the Midwest.

"She definitely filled the position," Borck said. "We feel we have hired the best person."

Renz, a third-generation graduate of K-State, has served as the interim president since the resignation of past president Fred Thibodeau, who resigned in December.

Renz

"She epitomizes professionalism," Patty Clark, vice president of the Alumni Association board of directors, said.

The direction that has been started in the interim period by Renz pleased board members.

The cooperation among the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, KSU Foundation and K-State administration is at an all-time high, Borck said.

President Jon Wefald said that relations between the Alumni Association and the University have been excellent.

Renz is the best choice, Wefald said.

"Amy understands and has worked with every program area of the Alumni Association. We are confident she will serve the University well, especially as we look forward to K-State's involvement with the Big Twelve universities and all the exciting opportunities that will give our alumni," Borck said.

The Black Student Union named its Ms. and Mr. BSU for 1995 Saturday evening.

Syreeta Johnson, junior in electrical engineering, and Johnnie Montgomery, junior in psychology, were crowned in front of a filled Union Station in the K-State Union at the annual Mr./Ms. BSU pageant.

BSU has had the pageant annually since the establishment of BSU in the 1960s, Jawwad Abdulhaqq, sophomore in political science and president of BSU, said.

The pageant is a chance for people of all races to come and experience an example of African American culture, said Terrence Brotherton, sophomore in life sciences and disc jockey for the pageant.

Usually, there are from six to nine people who sign up as contestants for the pageant, Abdulhaqq said.

There were four contestants this year, but more had originally signed up and dropped out, Darrol Walker, sophomore in fine arts and last year's Mr. BSU, said.

The contestants were tested on poise during their introduction, feeling and expression during their talent portion, elegance during their formal-wear portion, and by their answer to a question-and-answer section.

Last year, the BSU had the pageant in the Union Little Theatre, but it was moved to Union Station so it would get more exposure, Abdulhaqq said.

Next year, BSU plans to have the pageant during family weekend, Abdulhaqq said.

The theme for this year's pageant was "Keeping Strong, Lasting Long."

Johnson read two poems for the talent portion of the pageant, one of which she wrote herself. The other was introduced to her in an African American women studies class, she said.

"I put a lot of effort into it, and it paid off," Johnson said.

Montgomery sang an a cappella rendering of the gospel "Anticipation."

"I gain strength through my Christianity," he said. "It was the first time I sang in public."

During the intermission between the talent and formal-wear sections of the pageant, Anita McCallister, graduate student in theater, performed three dramatic monologues assisted by her daughter.

The first monologue explained that "no man can say 'baby' like a black man."

The second was a story of a little girl with her mother on a march in Alabama.

The last was the story of a person who was addicted to crack cocaine.

▶ COMPUTING

Matt closing means no more public use

WADE ANDERSON
Collegian

Matt said its final goodbye Saturday when Computing and Network Services discontinued it for public use.

Matt was part of the main Unix computer system at K-State.

Users' accounts on Matt have already been moved to other sections of the Unix system, ABC, CBS, NBC and FOX, said Betsy Edwards, Computing and Network Services publications editor.

"There are about 10,000 Matt user IDs," Neil Erdwien, Computing and Network Services application support specialist, said.

The popular Matt was named for Matt Dillon from the TV series "Gunsmoke."

The new computers — named after television networks so Computing and Network Services will have something to call them — will provide the same functions that Matt did.

ABC, CBS, NBC and FOX have been available on the Unix system for some time.

Erdwien said you should log on by typing unix.ksu.ksu.edu into the computer. He said if people do this, usage will be evenly divided among ABC, CBS, NBC and FOX.

He also said if people log on by typing matt.ksu.ksu.edu, they will get a message telling them that Matt is no longer connected. The wording of the message may be different depending on who set up the computer.

Erdwien said some people who use K-State's computers from their home PCs will need to reconfigure their computer.

"If people don't reconfigure their machines, they have the potential for having trouble," he said.

Directions for reconfiguring are on the back of the Computing and Network Newsletter, or people can get help reconfiguring or with any other problems by calling the CNS Consulting Office in Nichols 126D at 532-7722.

If mail is sent to your Matt account it will still be delivered, Edwards said.

"There are equivalent services available on those other machines," Erdwien said. "It's not that big of a change."

Rick Summerhill, CNS assistant director, network and systems manager, said Matt was a computer people could log on to and run Unix commands. Unix is an operating system like DOS, Windows or Macintosh.

"The manufacturer, Solbourne, is no longer supporting this older system. This, combined with the decreasing cost of newer Unix systems compared to Matt's increasing maintenance costs, makes this move desirable at this time," Edwards said.

Teacher evaluations should be made public

Student senators said they hope to make the teacher evaluations we all fill out available to the public.

It is a great idea.

Faculty Senate will look at the proposal Tuesday and start contemplating its answer.

Scott Rottinghaus, chairman of Student Senate's academic affairs committee, said he thought published evaluations would recognize teachers with high marks and encourage teachers with low marks to do better.

However, he said, there is opposition in Faculty Senate, which sets the policies that control teacher evaluations.

Matt Soldner, chairman of the ad hoc Student Senate committee formed to look into evaluations last fall, said many members of Faculty Senate felt it would cause grade inflation as teachers tried to pander to students for better evaluations.

He also said they worried about the fact that many students do not take the evaluations seriously.

The problem with all of this is that we pay more than $1,000 a semester to take classes from teachers we can only assess from gossip and hearsay.

Students always try to figure out what teachers are like before taking a class. The only way to do that now is to ask friends.

It would be in the teachers' best interests to stop rumors before they start.

It is in the students' best interests, when the end of the semester rolls around, to take the evaluations seriously.

▶ BASKETBALL

Fans could use some help

Dear editor,

In the six years I have been attending K-State, the men's basketball team has seen its highs and lows, and attendance has too, but this year's student body is truly lifeless! For my first four years, I was privileged enough to be in general admission, which I dearly miss. This season and last, I have been 18 rows up in reserved, which brings me to my point — the students have lost the tradition that used to be K-State basketball. I know we retired Ahearn Field House, but I have seen Bramlage come to life when the fans start yelling.

It seems this year the student body is not "pumped up" for any game; they have no clue what to do. Example: You're supposed to sit down and shake newspapers when the visiting team is being announced. At the Oklahoma game, a friend and I brought a stack of old Collegians to be passed around, but the way it looked, they only made it as far as a few people.

I do want to commend the people that occupy the first five or six rows in general admission. They also have shown the much-needed life to spark our Cats past those close games. Additionally, the fans that sit near me — Section 21, Row 18, Seat 13 — can verify that I am yelling on every trip down the court.

Home-court advantage is a great motivator for our players, but when they see the crowd quiet down and give up on them, I know I would be disgusted! I plead for the student body to be active during the game, especially Section 20. Maybe you should try getting there before the tip! Remember that we have Missouri on Saturday and Kansas the following weekend! Bring those Collegians and shake away!

If you do not have one, I have plenty extra. Go Cats!

▶ BOOK REVIEW

Book lacks scientific basis

Dear editor,

In Wednesday's Collegian, Kathleen Mastio praises the bell curve as an impeccable scientific method. Ms. Mastio is obviously a journalist, not a scientist. She asserts the book "is to submit research to society as a whole for consideration." She leaves out that the authors are pushing a social agenda. Regardless, they rely on Richard Lynn, who in turn assigned (!) IQs according to a study done by Ken Owen, who never intended it to be used to gage intelligence. In fact, the test required Zulu children to have a working knowledge of electrical appliances and microscopes, including "western types of ladies accessories." (Leon J. Kamin Sci. Amr. February 1995) This sort of misuse of recycled information is the core of this book's troubles, but is by no means the full extent of them. The authors then mire themselves inextricably by confusing correlation and causality. This is an example of advocacy research. If the authors had set out to learn something, we would be better off. This they did not do, and "science" is none the wiser for it. 'BELL CURVE' should be read by everyone — as a high school text on bad arguments and poor rhetoric.

▶ PARKING

Memorial Stadium should stay

Dear editor,

The University Parking Task force should be recommended for some of its proposals. Reduced parking spaces for state-owned vehicles and reserved stalls would certainly help to alleviate a dilemma of colossal dimensions.

However, I have some very deep concerns about a proposal to place a parking garage within the walls of Memorial Stadium.

That structure is a memorial to the United States veterans of World War I. Even though the proposed parking garage would not involve the destruction of the memorial, it would certainly desecrate its purpose.

Imagine, if you will, a single parking spot placed in the middle of the current Vietnam veterans memorial. That would be preposterous, of course.

Yet try and envision a day in the future when few people are living who remember who experienced the Vietnam era in our nation's history.

One can only speculate as to what "practical" uses may lay in store for that beautiful monument.

Memorial stadium is a tribute to the war veterans of this country. Within the walls of this great tribute lies some of the tiny portions of natural landscape remaining on this campus.

Fortunately, the memorial already has a "practical" use which insures its survival.

Many individuals as well as groups use the "Old Stadium" for recreation and exercise. Why not build a parking garage north of St. Isidore's Catholic Church where there is not grass, no war memorial and has already been designated as a parking area?

In trying to come up with a plan that may look cost effective and relatively simple to build without interfering with existing conditions as they relate to the parking problem, the Task Force may destroy one of the gems of this campus.

K-State does have gays

I'm gay.

KEVYN JACOBS

A queer. A homo. A fag. Fruit, queen, sissy, poof, fairy, sodomite, nellie, swish, maricon, deviant, confirmed bachelor, faggot, flamer, invert, friend of Dorothy, "that way," switch hitter, homophile, uranian and a hundred other euphemisms and terms of approbation you could throw at me as a homosexual male.

I just wanted to get that out of the way up front — first of all to set the tone of this column — I didn't want there to be any doubt in anyone's mind where I stand.

But more importantly, as a result of this column, I will probably have a few of them thrown at me, and I wanted to make sure that you spell them correctly. There is nothing sadder than a bigot who can't spell.

As in any political issue, it's very important to encourage public discourse, to present all sides of the issue. It's clearly not just a "bedroom issue."

So now that I have established what I am, the next question is why am I writing about it?

"That's fine if he's gay, but why does he have to flaunt it? Why can't he keep it in the bedroom where it belongs, instead of shoving it in our face? Why does he need to write about it in the Collegian?"

So why SHOULD The Collegian have a regular column on homosexual issues at K-State?

I can give you several good reasons.

■ POLITICAL DISCOURSE

Homosexuality is arguably the second biggest hot-button political issue in the United States today (only abortion is more contentious). As in any political issue, it's very important to encourage a public discourse, to present all sides of the issue. It's clearly not "just a bedroom issue."

John Hart has made his point of view on this issue well known on these pages for a long, long time. What better way to present a homosexual point of view, than from a real, live, homosexual K-State student?

Please note that I said 'A' homosexual point of view, not 'THE' homosexual point of view. There are as many homosexual points of view as there are homosexuals. The only thing that holds homosexuals together in our movement is the commonality of sexual orientation and a shared sense of oppression.

If you think there is some 'monolithic gay movement' where we all believe the same thing, you are sadly mistaken. We are so diverse that we often oppose each other over ideological differences. Gay democrats have different issues than gay republicans. What a European American college student like myself has to say may be totally alien to an African American working-class lesbian. Why, at the 1993 March on Washington, we had the Gay Animal Rights Contingent protesting the Gay Rodeo Contingent! Not exactly what I would call "unified!"

■ EDUCATION

The truth is, there is a lot of ignorance out there about issues of sexual orientation. Myths abound, misinformation is rampant, and issues are misunderstood. It's my job to explain many of these issues to the K-State community, both heterosexual and homosexual. People are so often afraid to talk openly about gay issues. I'm here to change that.

■ OUTREACH

There are a LOT of LesBiGay people in the K-State community. Estimates place the numbers anywhere from 2 percent to 10 percent of the population (I tend to favor somewhere around 6 percent). That being the case, there are a lot of 18 and 19-year-old freshmen out there who are from small-town Kansas, who have never been given any information about queer issues and who are really confused about these feelings they are having toward members of the same gender. It is my intention to make sure that they do get to hear a voice that says, "You are OK" and "You are not alone." Many others experience the same thing you do. And believe me, I know what it is like to be alone on a college campus and think you are the only one who feels the way you do.

■ EQUAL TIME

How often do we see information about heterosexual relationships in the Collegian? More than you think.

With Valentine's day coming up, look at how many ads make reference to heterosexual love. See how many columns are written about dating, love and marriage. Read 'Dear Cassandra' on almost any day of the week, for crying out loud! Heterosexuals abound, flaunting their sexual orientation! But where are the representations of the same-gender relationships in the Collegian?

But gay relationships and marriages do exist here on the K-State campus, and it is my intention to make sure they aren't totally invisible.

I hope to balance that invisibility out a little bit by making sure that gay voices are heard, too. Naturally, since heterosexuals outnumber homosexuals at least 10 to one, there will be lots more straight content than gay content here. But gay relationships and marriages DO exist here on the K-State campus, and it is my intention to make sure they aren't totally invisible.

■ TO CONTINUE KELLY KLAWONN'S LEGACY

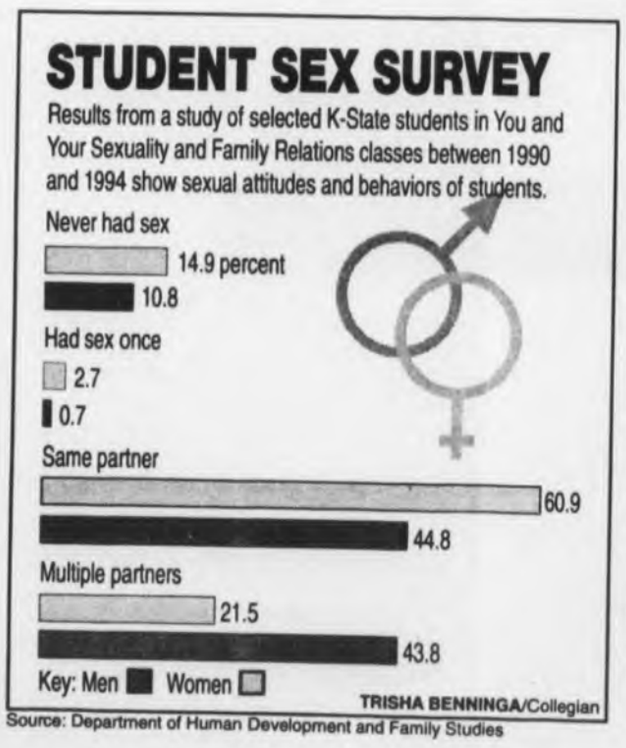
I am not the first queer-issues columnist the Collegian has had on staff. That honor goes to a good friend of mine, Kelly Klawonn.



Many of you don't remember Kelly, but a couple of years back she broke the ground that I am now treading with a regular weekly column on lesbian and gay issues.

Kelly has since graduated and moved on, but she has not been forgotten by those here who saw her as an inspiration. Her courage is a legacy to all gay people at K-State.

Kelly, this one's for you.

Kevyn Jacobs is a freshman in art.

Sexual promiscuity will lead to irreparable consequences for some

Source: Department of Human Development and Family Studies

Promiscuity is on the rise at K-State, and it is time to address it as the problem it has become.

Every sexual engagement poses some risk to students and their welfare. Premarital sex needs to be identified for what it is. Premarital sex is glorified Russian Roulette.

When playing Russian Roulette, you load one bullet into the chamber of a gun, spin the chamber, close it, put it to your head and fire. Engaging in promiscuous sex is exactly the same. With the spread of AIDS on the rise, forming sexual relations is Russian Roulette. It is a risk every time.

During a half decade, condom use has skyrocketed under the pretense that they can protect against the HIV virus. This is extremely misleading. Condoms are susceptible to human error as well.

This haphazard risk-taking is hardly worth the satisfaction. One night of sex won't look so great from a hospital bed when dying from AIDS. When you consider having sex, stop and think; this could be death you're sleeping with.

KATHLEEN MASTIO

Consequences are a harsh reality, and with HIV infection lurking around the corner, the stakes are getting even higher. It is good to know that some K-State students are choosing to remain abstinent. Almost 15 percent* of females from 1990-1994 have chosen to remain abstinent. Of males, 10.8 percent* chose to remain abstinent during the same period. The most encouraging part of these statistics is the fact that 95 percent* of them chose abstinence not because of fear, but because of their moral values.

Unfortunately, the percentage of students who have multiple partners is on the rise. Engaging in sexual relations with more than one partner is very risky. It is an emotional risk and a physiological risk. Sex is meant to be more than just physical enjoyment.

About 11.5 percent* of the students at K-State who are sexually active have contracted a sexually transmitted disease. Both men and women are contracting diseases, but these diseases do discriminate. People who are sexually active get sexually transmitted diseases, not people who are abstinent.

Another tragic statistic from the world of indiscriminate sexuality is the increase* in the percentage of female students who felt regret or fear after their first experience with sexual intercourse. The percentage of students who engaged in their first act of sexual intercourse while under the influence of alcohol is also on the rise. Of women, 10.6 percent* had intercourse for the first time under the influence of alcohol. 15.6 percent of men were under the influence of alcohol when they had intercourse for the first time.

Alcohol is a powerful influence; it alters thought patterns and judgment When deciding to have sex, all your mental faculties should be functioning. Sex is risky, but sex and alcohol is twice as dangerous.

A partner may be someone known well or someone met at a bar, but nothing is 100 percent certain. Sometimes the people we think we know best are the people we know the least.

We all need to carefully consider the risks we take. For a large number of students, the risk seems worthwhile, but the repercussions may eventually change our minds.

Unfortunately, that is often too late. Hindsight is 20/20, so don't let self-reflection be an image too painful with which to live.

*Statistics are from Study of Sexual Attitudes and Behaviors of Selected K-State University Students in You & Your Sexuality and Family Relations classes 1990-1994.

Long-distance love

Story by Melinda Carter ❤ Art by Mike Marlett

If you've ever found yourself in a close relationship, then you know that as little as one day apart from your sweetheart can seem endless.

Military spouses have to spend weeks and even months away from their significant others.

Lisa Taylor, senior in architecture, and Valerie Hernandez-Bell, freshman in English, both are married to men in the U.S. Army, and neither live with their husbands.

Lisa Taylor, formerly Lisa Dann, met her husband, Specialist Shane Taylor, in May 1993 while she was a student at K-State and working at the Silverado Saloon. Shane was stationed at Fort Riley.

Shane came in the bar one night and asked Lisa to dance. The couple didn't have very long to get to know each other because Shane was sent to the field for a month for training.

Lisa said she didn't know if the relationship would continue, but when Shane came back, they picked up where they left off.

Lisa married Shane a little more than a year later in July 1994.

Since Lisa has known Shane, he has had to leave for military assignments many times.

"He was gone about one week out of every two months, and then once a year he'd be gone for a month," Lisa said.

After only five months of being together, the couple had to be separated again. This time it was Lisa who had to leave.

Lisa moved to Wichita, where she is living now and working as an intern for Gossen Livingston. Lisa needed the internship to fulfill a requirement for her degree. Shane is still living in their Manhattan apartment.

Lisa said dealing with Shane's absence is difficult.

"I miss cooking with Shane because that was the one thing we got to do together. But we still get to see each other on the weekends, so it's OK," Lisa said.

Lisa said she and Shane rent a lot of movies and go out to dinner sometimes.

"We pretty much stay home together and be bums," she said.

When Lisa was here in Manhattan and Shane had to go away, she spent most of her time catching up either on school work or with friends.

"I would basically keep extra busy in studio, which really isn't too difficult to do," Lisa said.

"Now that I'm here (in Wichita), I spend my extra time trying to stay busy. I work out, talk on the phone and watch our wedding video."

The couple also keeps in contact over the phone. They talk every day.

Although this may sound like a lonely life, Lisa said it's not that bad.

Being married to a military person has benefits too, Lisa said.

"They (the military) try to get the wives really involved in what their husbands are doing," she said.

Lisa and other military spouses attended a field day at the fort. She was able to fire a cannon like the one Shane is trained on.

There is always the threat that Shane might be transferred from Fort Riley.

Lisa said if Shane was transferred, she would stay in Manhattan until she graduates. But she said she thinks, or rather hopes, that this won't be an issue.

"Shane can decline or refuse his first set of orders (to be transferred) but if they issue him a second set, then he'd have to go," Lisa said.

Lisa said Shane is due to get out of the military in November of this year. Despite the time they have to be apart, Lisa said Shane will try to re-enlist until she graduates.

Valerie Hernandez-Bell also lives apart from her husband, Raymoan, but he is the one who had to move.

Valerie's husband is stationed in Alaska, where he has been for more than a year.

Valerie and Raymoan have been married since November 1991. They also have a toddler named Valentino "Tino" Bell.

"Raymoan and I basically live separate lives because that's how it has to be," Valerie said.

In addition to Tino, Valerie has also cared for her young niece and nephew since her sister, Debbie Morales, drowned at Tuttle Creek during the floods of 1993.

Morales' children were temporarily in Valerie's custody, which made it difficult for her to go with her husband to Alaska.

Valerie said her days are pretty routine.

"I get up, take Tino to day care, go to class. Then I come home and clean house and try to do homework," she said.

Trying to be a good mom and a good student at the same time can be very difficult, Valerie said.

"It's really hard if Tino gets sick because then he can't go to day care," she said.

The most frustrating thing, Valerie said, is trying to make a doctor's appointment at Fort Riley because she has to make same-day appointments.

If that means missing class, it's just too bad, she said.

Attendance was the hardest part about being a student last semester, Valerie said.

Valerie said she'd get good grades on her tests but missed many classes because one of the children would get sick.

Valerie's husband is scheduled to be in Alaska for another two years. Until their family can be together again, they have occasional visits.

"The last time I saw Raymoan was in July, and I'll see him again either in April or at Christmas," Valerie said.

MU slams K-State

TODD STEWART
Collegian

Perhaps Wildcat freshman guard Mark Young put it best.

"We just got whooped – that's about it," he said after his team's 77-60 loss to the Missouri Tigers.

Mizzou 77
K-State 60

It was, in essence, a tale of two halves.

The Cats shot 50 percent from the floor in the first half and took a 42-41 lead into the locker room at halftime. In the second half, the Wildcats would only put 18 points on the board and would miss 27 of 33 shots.

But the game didn't all go that way.

After Missouri jumped out of the gates to a quick 15-5 lead, K-State responded, led in part by the Belvis Noland show. In the first 94 seconds, he was in the game. Noland scored seven quick points, including a deep three-pointer and a crowd-pleasing, slicing, left-handed dunk.

Throughout the first half, Noland continued to find ways to get open, and he continued to let the threes rain from downtown. Noland connected on four of five first-half attempts from behind the arc, six of 10 for the game.

It was Noland's three-pointer at the 5:26 mark of the first half that gave the Cats their first lead and sent the crowd into roaring pandemonium.

Asbury said after the game that he could not figure out what happened at halftime, but it was obvious a totally different team took the court after the intermission.

In the first 57 seconds of the second half, Missouri hit two three-pointers to put them ahead 47-42.

"They come out and get a couple of threes, and we just panicked," K-State coach Tom Asbury said.

Those two three-point goals sparked Missouri on their way to a 10-0 run to start the half before junior center Tyrone Davis got the Cats their first field goal on a short jumper in the lane.

The normally reliable Davis would go on to miss nine of his 12 shots in the game.

The Cats would go on to shoot 18 percent in the second half..

"We just stopped playing at halftime," Asbury said.

"We let our shooting woes carry over into the rest of our game. We stopped rebounding. We stopped defending."

Mizzou rebounded the Cats by 13 in the second half alone, including five offensive boards for junior forward Julian Winfield.

And unlike he did in the first half, Noland could not light the fire for the Cats.

He missed five of his eight second-half attempts, including an airball from 25 feet out that prompted Asbury to yank him from the game.

The Cats scored consecutive baskets on only one occasion in the second half.

The road to postseason play does not get any easier for the Cats.

They travel Wednesday to Norman, Okla., to face the Sooners. It will mark the seventh straight game in which the Wildcats have taken on a ranked opponent.

Young said the Cats, who shot 33.8 percent for the game and 18.2 percent in the second half, just quit in the second half.

"We quit — plain and simple," he said.

For Asbury, it boiled down to one thing: lack of effort.

He said he knew what the team had to do to be successful in the upcoming games.

"This isn't rocket science," he said. "We'll just come back and go do what we got to do."

Poor 2nd half loses game for Cats

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

In the second half, the Cats just disappeared.

After taking a one-point lead at halftime, the Cats faltered in the second half and scored a paltry 18 points en route to a 77-60 spanking from the Missouri Tigers.

K-State coach Tom Asbury said evaluating the loss was simple.

"We just stop playing at halftime," said Asbury, whose team dropped to 11-9 and 2-6 in Big Eight play.

"We let our shooting woes carry over into the rest of our game. We stopped rebounding. We stopped defending. It's not a lot more complicated than that."

The Tigers used a 10-0 run at the beginning of the second half to jump out to a nine-point lead, until Tyrone Davis hit a 4-foot jump shot to pull the Cats within seven.

That was as close as the Cats got as the Tigers outscored K-State 36-18 in the second half.

"Don't ask if there were any bright spots because there weren't," Asbury said.

The game at Bramlage Coliseum and the game in Columbia had one glaring dark spot – bad shooting halves.

In Columbia, the Cats shot 17 percent in the first half but recovered in the second half to make a game out of it.

In Manhattan, the Cats shot 50 percent from the field in the first half but could only manage 18 percent in the second half.

"We competed real hard. We just shot 17 percent there," Asbury said.

"We just stopped competing in the second half. That's the bottom line."

Freshman guard Mark Young agreed with Asbury's comments.

"We just quit playing in the second half," Young said.

Junior forward Julian Winfield led the Tigers with 18 points and 12 rebounds, including six offensive boards.

"I thought that Julian Winfield was Hakeem Olajuwon the way he was getting the offensive boards in the second half," Asbury said.

"It seemed like he had 16."

Senior forward Belvis Noland said Winfield's offensive rebounds really hurt the Cats in the second half.

"Julian Winfield had a lot of stick backs that really hurt us," Noland said.

Despite the Cats' poor shooting, Noland tied his career high with 24 points, which included six of 10 from behind the arc.

Noland said the Cats' second-half play was easy to assess.

"We just stunk it up," Noland said.

"We played hard, but we just didn't do the things we need to do to win."

Young said loss was simple to explain.

"We just got whooped. That's about it," Young said.

Asbury said Monday's practice will be one that the players won't forget.

"It will be a spirited practice on Monday," Asbury said.

"It's too bad I don't let you all in because that would be fun to see."

K-State took no breaks in training in order to compete at the Kansas Invitational Friday.

In a meet where some athletes on the squad didn't compete at all and others ran in events they don't normally compete in, the Cats managed to squeeze in two NCAA provisionally qualifying marks.

"This was basically a train-through meet," Jill Lancaster, assistant coach, said. "We practiced on Saturday after the meet.

"This was an individual meet. No team scores were kept."

Karissa Owens captured first in the 55-meter dash with a time of 6.97 seconds, good enough to place herself among the provisional qualifiers.

"I think I will have to run at least 6.95 or 6.94 to get into nationals," Owens said.

Owens was entered in the 400-meter dash for the first time in her K-State career, and she delivered with a second-place finish in a time of 57.43 seconds.

"It's been a couple of years since I've run a quarter," Owens said. "I didn't feel too bad running it, but I still would rather run the shorter races."

Belinda Hope also ran a longer race than she is used to but came up with familiar results. Hope won the 600-meter in a time of 1:24.31, a full three seconds ahead of second-place Amy Cook from the University of Kansas.

"Basically I'm in better shape and I'm just into it more mentally this year," Hope said.

"I felt strong."

Itai Margalit equaled his season-best mark of 7 feet 1 inch in the high jump from earlier in the season and took first in the meet as well.

Both jumps provisionally qualify him for the NCAA Indoor Championships March 10-11 at the Hoosier Dome in Indianapolis.

Ryan Clive-Smith captured first-place in the 5,000-meter with what he said was a disappointing time of 14:49.8.

"I wasn't very happy with my time," Clive-Smith said.

"I was hoping some more runners were going to race, but they didn't."

Cats sweep Huskers and Cyclones during weekend series at Bramlage

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

K-State snapped a five-game losing streak this weekend with wins over Big Eight foes Iowa State and Nebraska. The Wildcats routed the Cyclones 54-38 and then pulled out a tight one against Nebraska 53-50.

"We played extremely well defensively," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

Iowa State played the Cats close in the first half. The Cats went to the locker room leading 24-21.

But the Wildcats dominated the second half, steadily building a lead that would reach 18 points, while holding Iowa State to just 17 points on 6-of-23 shooting.

"We were really active in the post defensively in the second half, and that's something we've really emphasized," Agler said. "Lisa Gaitor had a great defensive game."

Gaitor's seven rebounds led the Cats.

The Cats were paced by sophomore Missy Decker's 16 points. Jacobson also reached double digits with 10 points, all in the second half, while junior Carlene Mitchell set a career high with eight, all in the first half.

On Sunday, K-State won an up-and-down battle with Nebraska. Neither team led by more than five in the first half, with the period ending in a 21-21 tie.

The Huskers broke the game open in the second, running off nine unanswered points in the first 2:31. But Nebraska was forced to sit center Pyra Aarden down with three fouls, leading to a 10-2 run by the Cats.

"She's a factor," Agler said. "When Aarden is in the game, they can really get creative defensively. They'll just stick her in the lane and not guard somebody."

After returning, Aarden tied the game at 50-50 with 1:25 remaining.

But a 17-footer by Mitchell with eight seconds on the clock put the Cats up for good. Nebraska's Kate Galligan traveled with two seconds remaining, and Jacobson's free throw with 0.3 seconds left sealed the game for K-State.

"I'm not really excited about how we played," Agler said, "but I am excited about how we kept our composure."

Stires led the Cats with 14 points, followed by Decker with 13 and Jacobson with 12.

DIVERSIONS

Today's Meditation

Even though it's illegal to do, I can still fantasize about parking in a reserved spot. It's not like I'll actually do it or anything. I am a human with human needs. One of those needs is a place to park. Maybe one day when I'm K-State President, I'll not only have a place to park on campus but a cool house, too. For today, I'll dream.

Students sniff sugar, hope for high

Dear Cassandra,

We're in search of a harmless addiction. We crave lethal, self-destructive outlets to give us a rush. We are not interested in breaking the law, spending a fortune on destructive substances or inflicting permanent damage to our minds, bodies and GPAs. We want to find a substitute for more dangerous drugs and get the same effect. Recently, we discovered a slight rush from sniffing pure cane sugar from a straw. Do you have any idea what the effects of our little habit could be?

Signed, Confection Confessions

Dear Confection Confessions,

My advice is that you eat vast amounts of the sugar instead of sniffing it. It provides a rush and is addictive and isn't as painful as sniffing it would be.

Jazz dazzles audience at McCain

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

McCain Auditorium lit up with toe-tapping bedazzlement when the Smithsonian Jazz Masterworks Orchestra performed classic, big-band jazz Friday night.

Such luminous jazz names as Count Basie, Tommy Dorsey, Duke Ellington and Benny Goodman were present and accounted for in the evening's repertoire.

The Smithsonian Jazz, which performs jazz in its original format, was formed in 1990 in honor of jazz and its importance in American culture, said John Edward Hasse, founder and executive director, who introduced the evening's conductor.

Due to illness, Gunther Schuller was unable to conduct. Loren Schoenberg filled in for Schuller, and what a job he did.

Schoenberg was loose and relaxed, offering a hip stage presence to parallel the music. He joked, he sang (rather excusably, in Jimmie Lunceford's "Margie,") and he informed the audience about the immense history behind each band or piece of music.

A highlight of the evening was the medleys of two songs the Orchestra would play. The fifth song of the evening was Billy Strayhorn's "Chloe: Song of the Swan." After finishing it, the Orchestra played Bill Finegan's version of "Chloe."

How interesting it is to understand, and hear, how two different composers can take the same style of song and recreate it for their own or another orchestra. The evening could have been a simple no-name orchestra, but Schoenberg took the time to introduce each member. Besides that, each member had a solo at one point in the program.

Particularly memorable was Joe Wilder's soft, mellow version of Louis Armstrong's, "What A Wonderful World." Stage moments like these make an audience fall in love with the performers.

Fletcher Henderson's song, "Wrappin' It Up," written for the Benny Goodman Orchestra, was a splashy, makes-you-want-to-dance number that reverberated all the way to the audience's knees. Heads were a'bobbing and legs were a'shaking as the whole joint heated into snappy delight.

Britt Woodman, trombonist, said there aren't many opportunities to play in big bands anymore.

Woodman said there are around three orchestras in New York City, but not near as many as there were during the glory days of his career with Duke Ellington (1951-1960) and Lionel Hampton (1946-1948).

He said most younger jazz musicians don't have as many opportunities in the United States as they do in Europe.

Woodman, in another special moment, treated the audience to a trombone solo. This was just another wonderful moment in an evening of standout performances.

Rounding out the great songs of the evening was the Casa Loma Orchestra's "Casa Loma Stomp," which Schoenberg described as "a memorable tune you will be humming like root-toot-tooty-toot."

The Smithsonian Jazz was marvelous. Filled with jazz legends and playing jazz greats, this Orchestra can treat K-State anytime.

Hard work pays off for band

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

They grew up as four guys in Brooklyn with tatoos, long black hair and a passion for music.

Thirty years later, the dark and brooding musicians are in the spotlight with some of the hottest industrial and heavy-metal bands in the business.

Type O Negative, which is on a nine-week tour with Pantera, has opened for such groups as Nine Inch Nails, Danzig, Jackyl and Motley Crue during the five years of their existence.

"We don't mind who we open for just as long as they're decent to us," guitarist Kenny Hickey said. "Pantera are real down-home Texans and drinkers. They're really friendly."

Type O has not only opened for sold-out shows, but the group has also released three albums including "Slow, Deep and Hard," "Origin of the Feces" and "Bloody Kisses."

Johnny Kelly, the new drummer, said the sales for the band's new release, "Bloody Kisses," are going well.

"The album is having its best sales weeks since Christmas," Kelly said. "Once it dies down, we're going to do another album."

Mike Amato, road manager for Type O, said he's pleased with the success of the compact disc.

"'Bloody Kisses' has already sold 300,000," Amato said. "They're on their way to big things."

Kelly said the band's first album was released before the band even landed a record deal.

"We sent the record company our demo tape, Peter got money for it, and then the company released our demo as the first album," Kelly said.

Kelly said vocalist Peter Steele and keyboardist Josh Silver knew each other since childhood. He said he met Hickey in a neighborhood thrash band in New York.

Amato said the band members treat each other like brothers.

"They get along great," Amato said. "They give constructive criticism and praise where praise is due. They don't walk around with swelled heads. It's really neat."

Hickey said the band has undergone a radical change through the years.

"There was more anger in our first album," Hickey said. "'Bloody Kisses' is more dark and sensual."

"Bloody Kisses" has two women kissing on the cover, Dr. Kevorkian in the gratitude list and the quote "Don't mistake lack of talent for genius" on the back of the CD.

Hickey said the individuality of his band is what got it noticed by the music industry.

"I think a band has to be original, have foresight and be anti-trend," Hickey said. "What's made us a success is that we're not trying to be anything that's happening right now."

Kelly said the name of the band was originally Sub Zero, but they were forced to change it when they discovered a band existed in Queens, N.Y., with the same name.

"They all had tattoos with a zero with a slash through it, and since they already had the tattoos, they changed it to Type O Negative," Kelly said. "Since I'm the new sucker in the band, I got one also."

Hickey said he prefers opening up for bands to performing as the main attraction in bars.

"I'm naturally very lazy, so I like opening up for bands because you only have to play for a half hour and then you're out of there," Hickey said. "When you play in a bar, you have to wait until 12 p.m. and sweat like crazy. I like the easy way out."

To control stage fright when he's performing, Hickey said he envisions the mass of people in the audience as one entity.

"It's easier for me, and it makes it less personal," Hickey said.

Kelly said when he's playing the drums in front of thousands of people, there are two things on his mind.

"I hope I don't make a mistake and try not to get hit by anything," Kelly said.

Kelly said he enjoys playing live and watching the crowd's response.

"At the beginning of the set, they don't know what to expect, but in the middle, they seem to like it," Kelly said.

Kelly said he's been playing the drums since he was 13 years old.

"I was playing the drums before I even hit puberty," he said. "I didn't play because I wanted to meet girls or make a living by it. You play music because you want to play music — not because you want to be a rock star," he said.

Kelly, a former oil mechanic, said he enjoys making a career out of being a musician.

"It's a lot better than having to work all day and play at night," Kelly said. "I get to wake up every morning and all I have to do is play the drums."

Kelly said he loves playing drums as a career, but life on the road can be a monotonous routine at times.

"There's not much of a life," Kelly said. "You get on the bus, do a show, get on another bus, do another show."

Hickey said the band's home is a bus equipped with four bunks and a VCR while they're on tour.

"We live in close quarters, and when you're on the road, it can get kind of hairy sometimes," he said.

Hickey said the long road trips are a drawback to life on the road as a musician.

"There are some nights when you don't want to go out there but go anyway," Hickey said.

To break up the routine, the band gets to sightsee in cities along the tour. Amato said he gives the band members a break by stopping at his parent's home in Kentucky for a seven-course Italian meal or stopping in Florida to go scuba diving.

Amato said the band has toured across the United States five or six times and is ready to travel overseas after the tour with Pantera.

"We've covered all the markets we need to cover in the U.S.," Amato said. "We've covered the full spectrum."

Amato said the band not only has a following in the United States but also has fans in other countries.

"They're one of the biggest bands in Australia, and the Japanese would just love them," Amato said.

Safety, Union expansion on candidate's platform; injuries not a problem would run out his ear.

At the press conference, Chris Reeves stood in a purple K-State T-shirt as he answered questions. He said he felt fine and was ready to come back to K-State.

"I do remember everything, including the attack," he said. "I will be ready to get back in the swing of things."

Five men were arrested last week in connection with two attacks that occurred the night of Jan. 22. Reeves said the evidence was clear against his attackers.

"If you do something wrong, you're going to get busted," he said. "

Sorry, guys, you made a mistake."

Referring to the campaign, Reeves said his perspective on safety had changed as a result of the attack, but there were more important issues that needed to be addressed in this year's elections.

"Safety is important, but I'm more concerned with the economic situation of the K-State Union," he said.

Reeves said he disagreed with elements of Union expansion.

"The problem is that it drains money from KSU, and a lot of people end up paying for services we didn't use," Reeves said.

Reeves said his experience with the K-State Forensics Team helped him to decide to run for president. The team tries to have a candidate each year, he said.

His parents said they were surprised with Reeves' announcement to run for president. They also said they were impressed with the work of the Riley County Police Department.

"We never expected them to catch anybody," Lu Reeves said.

Ron Reeves, Chris' father, said that Chris has made progress in healing after the attack.

"Chris was so active mentally, and that had a lot to do with his initial recovery," he said.

Chris Reeves will be in a rehabilitation program at the KRH for several weeks, Ron Reeves said.

Basic bed rates at the hospital are $460 per day, and a three-week pain-management program costs $6,600, according to a brochure.

The family is accepting donations to the Chris Reeves Recovery Fund in order to help them pay Reeves' medical bills.

Oblivious to the location of his hat, Avner Eisenberg looks for it in his pants during the beginning of his act Sunday in McCain Auditorium. Eisenberg, better known as Avner the Eccentric, was a silent clown who did no speaking, except for in the second half of the show, when he talked through a kazoo.

Silent clown entertains audience

MIKE BUNCH

Avner the Eccentric kept children and adults laughing through two hours of magic and physical comedy Sunday afternoon at McCain Auditorium.

As a silent clown, Avner the Eccentric, or Avner Eisenberg, performed his one-man show to a crowd of all ages.

"He is a mime only in the fact that he doesn't talk. A 'silent clown' is a better description," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said. "He has a strong interest in children, but he doesn't exclusively perform for them. He likes to perform to a mixed crowd."

During the first half of his act, Avner had a difficult time picking up and holding objects, constantly keeping the crowd laughing.

The first skit, one of the crowd's favorites, was typical of the first half of the program. It involved Avner trying to light a cigarette.

Avner came out and dropped all his cigarettes. He then tried to pick them up. Finally dumping them in a pile, he tried to light a cigarette and instead dumped the matches all over the stage.

He finally lit a match and couldn't find his cigarette. While searching, he allowed the match to burn his fingers. He gave up, sweeping the entire pile off the stage with his broom.

Avner ended his first skit by picking up paper he forgot to sweep off the floor and "magically" changing it into a sign announcing "The show starts in five minutes."

He used a large clock the rest of the show to keep track of the minutes remaining until show time, and time definitely did not drag during his program. Laughing and jumping around, Avner enjoyed himself as much as the crowd did.

"I think I probably enjoyed it more than they did," Avner said.

Crowd participation and a kazoo played big parts in the second half of the show. Wandering through the audience, Avner chose a lady to come up on stage and assist him.

He had her sit on a chair and hold a roll of toilet paper while he wadded it up and did sleight of hand in front of her eyes. The crowd could see what was going on and where the paper was going, but she couldn't.

Each time she missed it, Avner would scream through his kazoo, "She missed it."

For an encore, Avner brought out a table and sat down to eat. The main course was paper napkins, served with a glass of what appeared to the crowd to be red wine.

He ate the plate of napkins and drank half of the glass, then pretended to cough up the napkins. They came out white, then turned red and then green. The napkins were all tied together.

After the show, Avner met the children and signed autographs. One girl asked him how he ate the napkins and brought them back up.

"Can you keep a secret?" Avner asked her. "So can I."

Avner wasn't the only entertainment at McCain for the day. The McCain Children's Committee sponsored a party for children before Avner's performance.

"This year was our largest crowd ever," Sally Anderson, committee chairman, said. "We had about 120 children here this year."

The committee tries to organize one or two parties a year.

"The children's programs are based on the number of programs McCain has," said Karen Rogers, committee adviser and member of the Kansas Arts Commission. "We usually do one or two a year, based on if a program is appropriate for children."

"We do a lot of research and try to reflect the theme in each activity," Rogers said. "Sometimes we serve a meal, sometimes just snacks. It all reflects the theme of the party."

The committee had a variety of entertainment for the children, including learning how to juggle scarves, two magic acts and a table where children could learn how to make slime.

One of the magicians was Manhattan resident Bill Minihan.

Minihan, a 1994 graduate of Manhattan Christian College, tours the area performing his comedy and illusion act.

"I average between eight and 10 shows a month," Minihan said. "I've been performing about four years, doing birthday parties, church parties and a variety of different things."

Another popular station was the slime table, which was made possible by the K-State chemistry department.

Here students could actually create a green slime like what is seen on television. When they were finished, they could take the slime home with them.

with a bottle and took it with them everywhere. They even let her sleep with their five children until she became too big.

"She loves to go riding in the car. She loves people," Kim said.

Once, Kim found her nursing their domestic cat's kittens.

"She was mothering them," Kim said.

She said they keep the female in the house or on a chain in the yard, but the male, with whom they were not able to spend as much time with as a cub and grew more aggressive, must be penned at all times.

The female has been declawed, Kim said, but they decided not to defang her.

"If she ever got away, she would need a way to protect herself," Kim said.

Sunset Zoo Director Don Wixom said owners often will have their exotic pets declawed and defanged.

"Once you rip their fangs and claws out, they are defenseless against their own kind," he said.

Zoos do not declaw or defang their animals.

Kim said while her family has never had any problems with their cougar attacking a human, she can never forget they are not ordinary house cats.

"They are wild animals."

Kim estimated her female cougar weighs 90 to 120 pounds while the male weighs 120 to 150 pounds.

She said the two animals eat a whole deer about every 3 to 7 days.

Even with the family's other pets around, Kim said the cougars have never killed one of them, but she said the female has played aggressively with baby sheep and chickens.

"Eventually, she'd probably kill one if she could," Kim said.

Renovations to cut down on noise, reduce crowding

Sondra Visser, budget director for the College of Business Administration, said there have been few problems with safety for the students and faculty in Calvin.

"The biggest problems have been mostly noise-related. Most people are willing to overlook that considering the improvements that are being made," Visser said.

The improvements in the attic are also designed with the students in mind. Once completed, the attic will become a study and meeting room for students and faculty, Visser said.

"Right now students have to use room 9. Most of the time there are enough people that groups crowd each other," she said.

Carter said the estimated cost of the Calvin renovations and repairs will be $1.7 million. Of that money, $500,000 is from private funds raised by the College of Business.

The ADA requires public institutions, programs, services and activities to be accessible. In order to meet those needs, many K-State buildings will need remodeling.

Although many buildings on campus are undergoing renovation in order to comply with the ADA, the construction going on in Calvin is mostly due to the new requirements.

"There have not been any concerns with accessibility to buildings or events as of right now," Jennifer Kassebaum, senior assistant University attorney, said.

"The city of Manhattan has had some problems with the requirements. The fact that there is not any overlapping to the University indicates that we have been responsive," she said.

These changes are not new to the University. Section 504 of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act laid out accessibility requirements for institutions that receive federal funding. The ADA does not require that every floor of every building be accessible, but that the building itself is accessible.

Dr. Martin de la Rosa points to the area of Chiapas on a map Monday evening during his lecture at the Union Little Theatre on a Mexican Indian uprising against the Mexican political establishment.

Indian groups in Mexico ask for recognition

STACEY HAGER
Collegian

The Indians of Mexico are asking for equality under the country's constitution, said the mediator between the government and the Indians who led Mexico's 1994 armed rebellion.

Martin de la Rosa, a professor at Universidad Iberoamerican at Tijuana, spoke last night in the Union about the effects of the armed rebellion in Mexico.

"This is a very important movement. Mexico has changed more in a year than in the last 20 years. Hopefully, the rebellion will succeed not only for Chiapas, but for all Indian groups," he said.

de la Rosa said one reason the Indians started the rebellion was because they do not exist in the country's constitution and they are asking to be recognized by the government.

"Maybe we are wrong. Maybe we need to make changes. The creditability of the government is at stake. The Indians do not trust them," he said.

de la Rosa also gave an account of the activities that are taking place in the Mexican state of Chiapas. He said the deep political and economic crisis of the state is another thing that forced the Indians to rebel.

There is a difference between wealth and poverty, and the state itself is not poor even though it is believed to be, de la Rosa said.

"There is a lot of wealth and natural resources in Chiapas," he said.

de la Rosa said 21 percent of crude oil production is done in Chiapas, and various coffee plantations are located there.

de la Rosa said the state of Chiapas has a population of about 3 million, and 75 percent is of Indian origin.

The state is not in poverty, but the residents are, de la Rosa said.

"They are an important producer of electricity, yet many homes within the state are without electricity," he said.

In Chiapas, 88 percent of the children are starving from malnutrition; 37 percent of the residents are illiterate; and 59 percent of the children do not have access to a public school.

"Minimum wage is only $2 per day," he said.

Brian Becker, senior in anthropology and wildlife biology, said he understands the rebellion was the result of one group opposing the election.

Becker said what happens in Chiapas will be an indication of what is going to happen in the rest of Mexico.

"The upcoming election in the next week will be key to the changes brought about by the rebellion," he said.

Student opinion mixed

Representatives offer pros, cons on parking garage

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

An uneasy air grips Student Senate as it tries to discern the student body's opinion of the Parking Task Force's recommendation Wednesday to construct a parking garage within Memorial Stadium.

"As a student senator, I would like to hear more student opinion," Liz Ring, Student Senate vice chair, said.

Also concerned about the students' opinion of the parking garage, Chuck Haynes, business administration representative, said he would like to hear more student opinion before the recommendation is passed by President Jon Wefald.

"The reason I have concerns is because the students I have talked to have all been negative," Haynes said.

He said one effective way for students to express an opinion would be to submit letters to the editor at the Collegian.

As part of the Parking Task Force and Chairperson of Parking Council, Darell Edie said he has only heard a positive response from students.

"The reactions have been positive," Edie said.

"Many students like the idea of actually completing Memorial Stadium, and I am hoping that we can really do something about a grassy spot in the south Union parking lot," he said.

Kent Swanson, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and animal science, said he objects to the placement as a rugby player and because he knows the stadium is used by a lot of people, not only for its grassy area but also for the track and stairs.

"There definitely is a parking problem, but I think too many people and organizations are using it," Swanson said.

He said he would prefer the parking garage to be constructed north of St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center and built a level higher than recommended.

Student Senate engineering representative Philip Mudd said he thought constructing the parking garage within Memorial Stadium was a great idea.

Mudd is also a member of the Parking Committee organized by Student Senate.

"I think it's a terrific idea because it is not covering an existing parking lot, it is out of the way, and it is a great location to reduce traffic problems at the Anderson and Denison intersection," Mudd said.

John Potter, business administration representative, said putting the parking garage within Memorial Stadium does make sense the way it was presented to Student Senate.

However, he said it makes more sense to build it north of St. Isidore's.

"It seems like it would lose part of its meaning and effect by tinkering with the memorial," Potter said.

Edie said that if students would like to express an opinion there will be an open forum at 3 p.m. April 13 in the Union Big 8 Room, and planning for other forums is being considered.

STUDENT OPINIONS

"Wonderful. I guess campus needs more parking spots for students, and the Memorial Stadium location is very close to campus."

Dario Narvaez-Corrales graduate student in plant pathology

"There is still enough room for students and staff to park in the back lots, and it doesn't bother me to walk."

Carla Hebert
senior in pre-veterinary medicine

"I don't think a parking garage is really necessary, and I think it is degrading to the memorial."

Kent Swanson
sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and animal science

▶RAPE AT FRATERNITY HOUSE REPORTED

A K-State student reported a date rape at the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity house Saturday morning.

A woman was allegedly raped at 2021 College View Road at 4 a.m. Saturday, Capt. Robert Wild of the Riley County Police said. She reported the rape at 9 p.m.

"The suspect is an acquaintance, and both parties appear to be students at K-State," Wild said.

Damon Herbst, Pi Kappa Alpha president, said he was unaware of the rape as of Monday evening.

"When I get a report, appropriate action will be taken," Herbst said.

▶MEMORIAL SERVICE FOR STUDENT TONIGHT

There will be a memorial service for K-State student Heather Stewart in All Faiths Chapel at 6 tonight.

Stewart, a 20-year-old from Emporia, was killed Saturday when she was struck by a tour bus in Spain. Stewart had just exited the bus and was crossing in front of it when it struck her.

The memorial, organized by Alpha Delta Pi, is open to all students and the public.

"The reason ADPi chose to have it was there were so many people who knew her on campus and through the organizations she was involved in," ADPi president Amy Vaughan said.

Besides being a member of ADPi, Stewart was a rush counselor and worked with Big Brothers-Big Sisters of America Inc.

Stewart was in Spain to spend a semester at the University of Santiago De Compostela through an exchange program with the University of Kansas.

Vaughan, a junior in marketing and advertising, said the sorority is trying to deal with Stewart's death by talking about it and remembering the good times they shared with her.

Stewart

"We've had counselors come in and talk to us," she said.

Vaughan said she thinks Stewart will be remembered fondly.

"We wanted to have a tribute to her because she was such a special person. We all loved Heather, and we will all remember her. Above all, we will remember her smile," Vaughan said.

Robert Goodwin, USD 306 superintendent, gives reasons and possible pitfalls involving the Quality Performance Accreditation policy as Clarke Reinke, associate superintendent of Manhattan School District, listens during a debate over QPA. To keep or not to keep Quality Performance Accreditation.

While members of the Senate Education Committee debated this question in Topeka Monday, students in the College of Education heard both sides of the issue in a debate between Clarke Reinke, associate superintendent of the Manhattan School District, and Robert Goodwin, superintendent of USD 306.

About 50 students attended the discussion, which was sponsored by the K-State chapter of the Kansas-National Education Association.

QPA is an accreditation program for Kansas school districts that is based on student performance on statewide testing, as opposed to accreditation based on inputs such as teacher certification.

▶ FORT RILEY SOLDIER'S DEATH BEING INVESTIGATED AS A HOMICIDE

JUNCTION CITY (AP) — Authorities were investigating as a homicide the death of a Fort Riley soldier whose body was found at the former military marina of Milford Lake.

Two fishermen found the body of Pvt. Robert O'Neil Brown, 23, of Kinston, N.C., Saturday afternoon along the shore of the lake in an area adjoining the post, Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said Monday.

An autopsy was conducted Saturday, Deppish said. But he wouldn't release the cause of death, only saying it was clear to investigators Brown hadn't drowned or taken his own life.

Releasing other information might jeopardize the investigation, he said.

The death was being investigated by the Sheriff's Office, the post and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, Deppish said.

The former military marina is now public but doesn't get much use, Deppish said.

It wasn't immediately known what Brown was doing at the marina or if he was with anyone, he said.

Brown's body was found near the bank, partially submerged, Deppish said. It appeared he had been dead less than 24 hours when his body was found, he said.

Brown, who had been stationed at the fort less than a year, apparently was on leave over the weekend, Deppish said. He was last seen about 8 p.m. Friday at the post.

Milford Lake borders Fort Riley and Junction City. The part where Brown's body was found is less than a mile from the post's property line, Deppish said.

▶ CITY COMMISSION TO VIEW PROPOSAL TO BUY LAND FOR NEW PARK

A proposal to purchase land for a new park in the Northview area of Manhattan will go before the city commission.

The Manhattan Parks and Recreation advisory board voted Monday to suggest to the city commission the purchase of 78 acres of land east of the Dix addition on the south side of Knox Lane.

The vote was 6-0 with one member absent.

"We have a high population in the Northview area that is underserved in park services," board member Ethel Steichen said.

That population continues to grow, and children account for much of that growth, Steichen said.

This plot was selected because it has a willing seller and the right soil type, board member Jim Lindquist said. The size and proximity to the neighborhood also make the land attractive, he said.

About 40 acres of the land should be developed as a community park.

The remaining area could be used for various other facilities, such as an indoor pool or recreation center.

Three potential methods of paying for the purchase were mentioned. Leasing, a bond issue and budgeting money for the land were the possibilities.

Steve Pfister, Manhattan resident, said that using City Park as a model, he figured a community park will cost more than $2 million.

Terry DeWeese, Manhattan Parks and Recreation director, said a price tag cannot yet be figured. He said all parks are going to be slightly different because of their facilities. For instance, the new park probably wouldn't have a swimming pool because City Park has one.

The city commission will have the final say on how the purchase is financed, DeWeese said.

Planning of the park will come later, Lindquist said. Input of the community will be important in deciding the content of the park, he said.

Because the land is outside the city limits, it would be annexed if purchased, DeWeese said.

If the commission pursues annexation, the process should be easier than usual because no residences would be affected, he said.

▶ VOTING COULD CHANGE WITH IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED BILLS

TOPEKA (AP) — Two elections bills introduced in the House on Monday could change the face of elections in Kansas.

Rep. Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville, introduced a bill that would allow voters to vote for none of the candidates listed on the ballot.

Rep. David Heinemann, R-Garden City, and Rep. Greta Goodwin, D-Winfield, introduced a bill that would allow voters to vote in primary elections regardless of party affiliation.

Under Garner's bill, a line for none of these candidates would be listed following the candidates' names on the ballot. The bill applies only to races for statewide, congressional and legislative offices and for presidential elections.

"I think it's an option voters would like to have," Garner said.

Garner said allowing voters to choose none of the candidates would force the parties to be more responsible in selecting candidates for office.

Garner used the Louisiana governor's race between former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke and Gov. Edwin Edwards as an example of when a similar law could have been used.

"Given the example, I think it's an idea whose time has come," Garner said.

Nevada already has a similar law, but it uses the none of these candidates choice only as an opportunity for voters to sound off, Garner said.

"In order to be a meaningful election, there ought to be quality candidates," he said.

Under Garner's bill, if none of these candidates receives more votes than any candidate on the ballot, a special election for the office must be called within 30 days.

Garner said he did not see any problem with having a second election. Because there would be only a short time between the elections, voters would not be inundated by negative campaign advertising, he said.

Kevin Rahn, owner of Bombers, said he hopes to create an atmosphere that appeals to all types of patrons.

Graduate gives bar new appeal, hopes for larger crowd

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

If you haven't spent a night at Bombers recently, formerly called DowBow's, you might be in for a surprise.

K-State graduate Kevin Rahn acquired sole ownership of the establishment in August and was ready to give the place a face lift.

Rahn graduated last semester with a degree in life science but decided to explore a different career avenue.

"My first job when I came to college was as a bouncer for Kite's," Rahn said. He worked for several other bars and before long was bitten by the "bar bug."

Now that he's out of school, Rahn said he has more time to concentrate on making Bombers a success.

He has already replaced the old vinyl dance floor with a new all-wooden one, added wooden trim for decoration, upgraded the sound system, put in more DJ lights for dances and said he will soon have a jukebox so people can choose songs on evenings when there isn't a DJ.

Club Scene

Scotty Adams, graduate student in electrical engineering, said he's a regular customer at Bombers.

"The DJ usually plays good music, like the classics people can dance to. I think that's the kind of music the student body likes to listen to in a bar," Adams said.

For those who aren't interested in music or dancing, Bombers has four televisions, two of which are big-screen, and three pool tables.

Within the next month, Rahn said he hopes to install a kitchen and serve pizza and sub sandwiches.

Rahn said he wants to establish a relaxed and laid-back atmosphere like the former Kite's.

"I want to be as diverse as possible and cater to whatever people want," Rahn said. "People can dance, watch television, play pool and drink," he said.

Rahn said he hopes Bombers will be a place a lot of people will feel comfortable. He said he sees a mixed crowd, but the majority of patrons are college students.

To help bring a larger crowd into Bombers, Rahn is planning to have live music twice each month.

"I would have more, but people just don't want to pay a cover charge for live music very often. People only want to go see a live band about once a month," he said.

KMKF-FM 101.5 will also conduct a live remote in the first week of February and give away tickets to a Megadeth concert.

Another way Rahn is hoping to get people through his front door is by offering special nights and drink deals.

Rahn said he's still in the process of experimenting with special offers throughout the week but has already decided Wednesday night is Ladies' Night with no cover charge and $1 drinks. On Thursdays, there will be no cover charge until 10 p.m., and all drinks will be $1.

"People are scared of a $3 cover charge even if they can buy any drink they want for only $1," Rahn said. He said he's ready for the crowds.

"Bombers is set up so there can be a DJ and dance one night and a live band the next."

▶ AIR FORCE ROTC

Electronics students offered altered program

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

The Air Force ROTC program at K-State has been shortened to one year for electrical engineering majors to enlist people educated in the field of electronics.

Maj. Paul Vavra, commandant of cadets, said the Air Force lacks people who can operate the communication and computer systems and the satellite operations.

"We've developed a need for electrical engineers, so they opened up the program for them, as well," Vavra said.

In the past, the Air Force has also offered shortened programs to nurses and lawyers to fill these shortfall areas.

Students interested in the program must first pass the Air Force Officer Qualifying Test, similar to the ACT or SAT, and a physical.

"They have to pass a physical and be physically qualified," Vavra said.

Vavra also said the students can't be older than 25 years upon completion of the training and must be U.S. citizens.

"You don't have to be a U.S. citizen to be in the military, but you do have to be one to be an officer," Vavra said.

Qualified students will receive a scholarship that will pay for tuition fees and books and will also have a $150 monthly allowance. The scholarship cannot exceed $9,000 per year, Vavra said.

Duty for the cadets will begin this summer during a six-week field training camp.

Vavra said they will earn four credit hours at the camp while learning the structure, organization and history of the Air Force.

"They're in academics or studying for about five hours a day," Vavra said.

The cadets will then be enrolled in ROTC classes for two semesters at K-State and can earn their commission as second lieutenant in 12 to 15 months, Vavra said.

"It's a great opportunity to get your last year of school paid for, and it's a guaranteed job," Vavra said.

"Starting salary is about $25,000."

They owe four years of active duty to the Air Force upon completion of their training, Vavra said.

"After their four years of active duty, they should be a captain and can make about $40,000 per year," Vavra said.

Mike Krier, senior in electrical engineering and Air Force ROTC cadet, agreed with Vavra.

"Anything that gets you where you want to be is a good program," Krier said.

Krier said the experience is great, and a military career is not his only option.

"I look at ROTC as getting me into the military," Krier said. "Then, I look at that as a vehicle to where I want to go."

Michael Didio, senior in electrical engineering and Air Force ROTC cadet, is enrolled in the four-year program.

Didio said he didn't resent the fact that the Air Force was shortening the program for electrical engineers.

"They still have to go through the basic officer training," Didio said.

"Overall, I think it's great. The Air Force needs them."

Second Lt. Marc Scantlin, K-State graduate, expressed the convenience of having a guaranteed job.

"Grads look for jobs," Scantlin said.

"Once you're in the military, the military looks for you."

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Campus, city safety issues need answers

Unfortunately, this program only services a fraction of the students needing an escort from campus to their homes at night.

An alleged date rape occurred in a fraternity over the weekend.

In addition, two rapes were reported last semester in Manhattan.

Recently, a male was attacked in City Park.

Gunshots were reported last weekend at the Ecunemical Ministries Center.

Each of these events involved K-State students.

No longer can anyone with a clear conscience deny that violence is a problem in Manhattan.

The difficulty is finding a solution.

Through the use of an escort service, the residence halls have designed an effective program in which each student living in the residence halls can be walked from anywhere on campus to a residence hall or to anywhere else on campus.

Unfortunately, this program only services a fraction of the students needing an escort from campus to their homes at night.

The time has come for safety in Manhattan to become a priority.

One solution is for Student Senate to help expand the escort service that already exists or design a new one targeted toward off-campus students.

Student elections are coming up in May. Safety should be a main issue.

Another K-State student should not fall victim to an act of violence before work is done to find a solution.

TOLES

More K-State voters could reshape city

ANDY TOMB

Why is it that college students are always touted by our political leaders as the future of the country, yet largely refuse to participate in the only system that gives them a voice in the way our government is run?

It's sad but true, but college students just don't vote, and it makes the local governments of college towns like Manhattan really happy that they don't.

Having a large, transient population that spends money in your local businesses and fails to vote is better than any Cessna plant could ever hope to be.

If those students started voting, why, the local government would be actually forced to listen to their concerns and use some of the money they contribute in ways that actually benefit the university.

If they refuse? We could just elect our own representatives. If we wanted it bad enough, we could elect the entire city commission from the third floor of Haymaker Hall.

If you didn't already know it, you have everything to gain by registering to vote here in Riley County. You will be able to vote in city elections and elect the people who will spend the money you already contribute through local taxes.

In addition to tax revenue raised for the Manhattan area by the rent most students pay 12 months out of the year and the supplies bought at local stores, we now pay taxes on purchases made on campus, thanks to the annexation of K-State into the city of Manhattan.

Not having your say in how this money is spent is taxation without representation.

Two hundred and nineteen years ago, the founders of this country fought a bloody war over this exact same principle.

The solution comes in two parts.

First, walk into our own Office of Student Activities and Services on the first floor of the K-State Union and register to vote. The process is really quite simple. They ask for some identification, you'll fill out some paperwork and be on your way. Better than a day at the Department of Motor Vehicles.

The second part is a little more difficult, as you have to actually go out and vote on election day. This may take a little research on your part, as you will need to inform yourself about the candidates, issues and polling places for the election.

This election should be of particular interest to students, as K-State student Justin Kastner is running in the city commission election. The primary election is Feb. 28, and the deadline to register for the primary is Feb. 13.

While Kastner assures me he will not be a token K-State commissioner, he will be a valuable asset to the campus.

By electing him as our city commissioner, we will be able to strengthen the bond between the city and the campus. If students become a major constituency, they will be able to have more influence on how the city spends our tax dollars. It could mean improved lighting in areas off-campus, parking and transit solutions and an easier route to passage for the City-University Projects Fund, the money given for joint projects by the annexation of K-State into the city.

VOTING INFO

Feb. 13 is the last day to register to vote in the upcoming elections. You may register in the Student Activities and Services office in the first floor of the Union. Election day is Feb. 28.

Kastner is confident in his ability to represent the people of Manhattan. He will offer a fresh voice to the city commission, as he is the recent product of the community they represent.

K-State needs to come together with the community and elect our peer to the local government. Could you imagine the uproar that would be created if K-State delivered 20,000 registered student voters to the polls in the city commission primary election?

I'm sure the county clerk's office is not expecting it. Let's surpass their every expectation by participating in this important election in droves.

K-Staters should praise worthy staff

ERIN MANSUR-SMITH

When I was 13 years old, my family and I moved into a homeless shelter called the Catholic Worker House.

I remember the first time I saw the place. It was like something out of a Dickens novel. It was raining, and I stood outside on the front porch, holding all of my clothes in a black plastic garbage bag, looking up at my new "home."

It didn't look like any shelter I had ever seen. Warm and friendly, it was a far cry from the family-violence shelter from where we had just come, without its locked doors and security guards.

Upon entering, I was introduced to an older gentleman smoking a pipe. He looked like some English duke, calm and patriarchal, dignity surrounding his head like a wreath of smoke.

His name was Jim Harrington, and he was a retired social worker who had practically designed the laws and ethics by which the social-services system of Iowa worked. He had given it all up, disgusted by the ineffectuality of the system, and joined the Worker community to help people on a more personal level.

At first sight, I was determined to hate him. He seemed too serene, too kind, too helpful. Five years later, I mourned his death from cancer as I would cry for a father.

I have been thinking about him a lot lately as the anniversary of his death passes this week. Mostly, I have been contemplating what he showed me about myself and the system under which I live. He was a passionate and intelligent man. Jim cared about what the leaders of this country espoused and how closely they followed their own rules and regulations.

Jim cared about the people who came to the shelter. He bothered to find out about their lives and circumstances.

He taught me to treat human beings as individuals and to demand, in turn, that I be given the same courtesy.

Most importantly, Jim influenced me to find heroes in the men and women around me, instead of turning to more distant media hogs and bad boys. In becoming the father I never had, he showed me how many father-figures surrounded me.

When he died, I thought there would never be another man who could inspire such respect from me and the people he worked with.

I was wrong.

Since I have been at this University, many men have reminded me of Jim and have taught me the lessons I think he would have had he not died.

I find myself surrounded by gentlemen of quiet (and not so quiet) strength, intelligence and dignity — men who care and inspire other students like myself.

Men like Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, and Alex Delgadillo, formerly in the Department of Housing, and others like Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, Dr. Harry Marsh, Ben Nyberg and Gary Clift cannot know how rare they are.

They and the many others I have not named might never know what kind of difference they make every day.

They might get tired of the lack of good pay, the constant administrative duties and hassle of dealing with students who don't care.

They might not think we see what kind of effort they put into helping us, or feel as if they are unappreciated or not respected. But for many of the students who work with them, they are what Jim was to me.

We will carry what we have learned from them for a long, long time.

Erin Mansur-Smith is a senior in pre-law, theater and English.

Fans, band respond plenty

Dear editor,

This letter is in response to Nicole Poell's column in Friday's Collegian. I am a fan of your column and agree with most of what you say. Unfortunately, you offended me this time. I was doing OK, wondering if maybe you weren't picking on not enough issues to be disappointed with our crowd, but when you bashed the band, I was sure you hadn't spent enough time listening or watching. The few incidents were done by a small number of individual students. In a crowd of four or five thousand people, that is not enough to make a fair judgment.

Now, the issue of the pep band. I'm sure that in all your observations, you notice that we are involved in almost every game in Bramlage. That includes women's and men's games. You probably notice that we show up 45 minutes before the game to practice. I'll bet that you even notice that our folders consist of 65 songs. Granted, we don't play all 65, but we play more than three!

You should also notice the headphones which are on our director's head. Those headphones are connected to the scorer's table and tell us when we can play.

Maybe you should watch the crowd and the band a little more next time before you make a judgment. I've been to many games where the crowd was very active (Oklahoma) and not just "a disappointment." Try finding something positive about this University instead of just something negative. How about the fact that there were fans there screaming? It's been a long time since I've see some positive write-ups about our crowds.

By the way, if you feel that our level of peppiness isn't up to your standards, grab an instrument and jump in. We've always got room for people who criticize us without living it first. Thanks for the suggestion, though, and we'll give it our best shot.

▶ PARKING

Garage is poor choice

Dear editor,

I am a recent graduate of K-State, and I read the Collegian over the Internet. I was appalled by the decision to build a parking garage in Memorial Stadium. The parking problem has been stretched and overly exaggerated. Last semester, I lived next to the parking lot west of Memorial Stadium. I have never seen it full to where there was no more room for any more cars. This just goes to show you that people are just too lazy to walk to class. They would rather sit in the Union parking lot fighting for the next open space instead of driving to the west parking lot and walking. There is no need for a parking garage that will probably never get used in the first place. The students will still line up in the close lots fighting for spaces.

By living close to Memorial Stadium, I have seen it get used every day. If the University wants to build a garage, put it over by the art museum. I fairly doubt it will get used either. I personally think this whole parking thing is just some people trying to keep their jobs. Who is paying for this great garage? I sure hope nobody calls me during the telefund asking for money. The parking committee needs to get out and actually look at the parking situation west of Memorial Stadium. I think they will find that the last six months have been a waste of University money and there really is no problem if people would just walk 20 minutes to class.

▶ BOOK REVIEW

"Bell Curve" lacks facts

Dear editor,

Kathleen Mastio's review of "The Bell Curve" leaves one with the impression that the only criticism of Herrnstein and Murray's work is that it is unpopular and "politically incorrect." Mastio writes that the "scientific method behind the study is impeccable," and that their "evidence is undeniable." However, the scientific community's criticism of this book is not that the conclusions are unpopular, but that the authors misused and misrepresented data.

We are asked to read the book, then form our opinions. This is certainly the best way to proceed when evidence is presented honestly.

However, before making up one's mind about this book, one would do well to read the reviews by T. Beardsley (Scientific American, Jan. 1995), L. J. Kamin (Scientific American, Feb. 1995), and S. J. Gould (Natural History Vol. 104, No. 2, and New Yorker, Nov. 28, 1994). These reviews point out the book's failure to separate causation from correlation, the use of language- and culturally-biased tests, the omission of data that do not support the authors' claims and the use of non-I.Q. tests to make unwarranted guesses about I.Q.

"The Bell Curve" is not a popularized presentation of data from refereed journals. It is an attempt to cloak the authors' opinions in the guise of science. For those interested in a history of the use of pseudoscience to advance racism, I suggest "The Mismeasure of Man" by S. J. Gould.

▶ BOOK REVIEW

"Bell Curve" is racist

Dear editor,

I am a loyal reader of the Collegian and an African American male. So it was with utmost shock that I read the book review in the Feb. 1 issue that gave a favorable review to the book "The Bell Curve" by Charles Murray.

It is an utter insult to applaud a book that seeks to undermine years of progress made by African Americans.

What's next: two thumbs up to "Mein Kampf"?

As an educated African American male, the theories that are exposed in "The Bell Curve" would seem to categorize me as an oddity. Shame on you, Collegian, for favoring such a book at the very beginning of Black History Month. Talk about adding insult to injury. It is my sincere hope that the Collegian exercises better judgment in the future.

▶ LIQUOR LAWS

Sales on Sunday possible

Revisions pass in House, advance to Senate for vote

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

The Kansas House of Representatives voted 63-61 Thursday to make state liquor laws more liberal.

If the bill makes it through the Senate, it would be the first major revision of Kansas liquor laws since 1986.

The changes proposed include liquor sales on Sundays, allowing liquor purchases through credit cards and allowing sales on Independence Day, Labor Day and Memorial Day.

Under the changes, liquor stores would be open from 1 to 8 p.m. Sundays, but not everyone favors the change.

"Personally, I enjoy my Sundays and holidays off," Kent Dean, owner of Dean Retail Liquor, said. "This could go either way to me, but it's nothing I'm gung ho about."

Dean said he wasn't sure if Sunday and holiday sales would be cost-effective for retailers.

"On Sundays, people are done partying and are trying to get things done," he said. "The amount of sales may not warrant being open. It is like New Year's Day — we are open but only see a fraction of our normal sales."

Opponents of the bill said the state shouldn't make an abused drug like alcohol more available.

Rep. Jene Vickrey, R-Louisburg, said young people already find it easy to get liquor on the weekends and this would just increase the opportunity.

Credit-card purchases for liquor are currently possible in restaurants. The new bill would allow people to use their cards to buy from a liquor store, creating another sore point for opponents of the measure.

Rep. Don Meyers, R-Derby, asked if Kansas really needed drunk people short on cash buying more liquor with a credit card.

Not everyone thinks credit cards will be a problem.

"The idea behind it is to increase sales and make it available if they want to purchase it," Dean said.

"It is ridiculous to say that credit-card purchases will cause overconsumption. Who is more likely to overuse a card? The person drunk in the bar, not the sober person who comes to pick up some alcohol," he said.

Credit-card sales may not be feasible for all liquor stores. Dean said accepting credit cards would cost money, taking away from the profit margin.

"Lowering the margin could hurt smaller liquor stores," Dean said. "We don't have a large margin like stores, so I'm sure smaller outlets could have to compete with retailers who accept credit cards. We would probably accept cards with a stipulation, like a minimum purchase of $10 or something."

One of the provisions in the bill states that counties would be responsible for enacting these changes on their own.

"To get the bill passed around here, I think a band of retailers would have to get behind it," Dean said. "I think this law was designed to help out border counties in Kansas, to help prevent losing business by people crossing state lines for alcohol."

Changes in Riley County might not be very noticeable to most people, Al Johnson, director of the Riley County Police Department, said.

"Both liquor and beer are currently available on Sunday through restaurants and other establishments," Johnson said. "I don't know what effect liquor on Sundays will have, but it will probably involve a few more incidents of intoxication. Of course, any time there are changes, it will add somewhat to our work, but probably not very much."

LOOSENING STATE LIQUOR LAWS

The Kansas House of Representatives approved a bill last Friday that would loosen state liquor laws. They have not been changed since 1986, when restaurants were permitted to sell liquor by the drink. Kansas has been conservative in regulating liquor and had prohibition for 68 years (1880-1948).

Among the provisions of the bill:

- Allow the sale of packaged liquor on Sundays from 1 to 8 p.m. after a county approves such sales in an election.
- Allow packaged liquor to be purchased with credit cards.
- Allow liquor sales on Independence Day, Memorial Day and Labor Day.

Local educators debate program, voice concerns about structuring

Kansas Legislature, the program has been debated by members of the education profession and state legislature who question its effectiveness.

Goodwin, an advocate of accreditation reform, said his concerns with QPA are based on essentially four issues.

"First, how much is QPA really costing us? My district has spent $20,000 in the past four years just to prepare to go through the QPA process," he said. "That is a lot of money."

Goodwin said his second concern is with the nature of the testing.

"The accuracy of this testing is highly debatable in itself," he said. "How can we as state educators be held responsible for a child's education when the testing methods are questionable?"

"My third concern is with the issue of who should make the decisions regarding the outcome of the testing." he said. "Should it be the teachers, the school board members, the parents?"

Goodwin said he is also concerned with the lack of evidence that similar programs in other states have been successful.

"I'm not saying we should throw QPA out the window, but I think we do need to overhaul it," he said.

Reinke said while he shares Goodwin's concerns, he believes it is too early to assess the results of the current QPA program.

"For QPA to be effective, we must also make some systemic changes in the school districts, like changes in curriculum and in the structure of the staff," he said. "These are changes I haven't seen in schools since the adoption of QPA."

Reinke said he believes the current QPA program serves as an important framework to which school districts can look to measure and improve the quality of education they are providing.

"QPA provides us with leadership leverage points on which we can take a proactive stance on challenges facing education in this state," he said.

In an ideal world, the state wouldn't need to be held accountable for the dollars spent on education, Reinke said.

"But in the real world, there needs to be this system of accountability," he said.

Stephanie Chitwood, sophomore in elementary education, said she appreciated this opportunity to hear both sides of the accreditation issue.

"This was the first time that I had really been exposed to the debate," she said. "I think it was important that both viewpoints were represented."

Asbury tells the story like it is

Think you had a grim Monday?

The K-State men's basketball team can probably associate with your anxieties.

DEREK SIMMONS

If some players aren't in class or roaming the campus today, don't be surprised.

The Wildcats could still be smarting from what Coach Tom Asbury said would be a "spirited" practice on Monday.

Spirited might have been too kind.

If Asbury was serious — and I'm sure he was — snooze buttons and SportsCreme tubes were abused this morning.

Asbury was brief and blunt in his press conference following K-State's 77-60 loss to No. 18 Missouri Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

"I'm not going to be around long for this one, because this one won't take long to summarize. So get it fast," he said.

Why would the first-year coach be so bitter?

Maybe it was because after a 42-41 halftime advantage, K-State failed to come out of the locker room to contend for the victory.

The impostors in the white jerseys who did emerge after the first period scored just 18 points while shooting a measly 18 percent from the field. All this after a solid first half in which the Cats shot better than 50 percent.

"That was a game we expected to win," Asbury said during his Monday press conference. "I don't know if anyone else in America did, but we really expected to win."

With time to ponder the setback to the Tigers — the Wildcats' sixth-straight game against a ranked opponent — Asbury's stingy attitude on Saturday afternoon seemed subdued.

"There are probably a lot of teams that have had three bad halves since Big Eight play started. And that's all we've had," he said. "So we can't dwell on it too long. If you take that second half into Wednesday night, it snowballs."

But after the game on Saturday, Asbury was livid about the Cats' performance and certain reporters' silly questions.

Consider the following as three examples:

■ Reporter: When you said 'stop competing,' what did you mean by that?

Asbury: What does that sound like? Don't ask dumb questions tonight. We stopped playing hard. Can I make it any more simple than that?

■ Reporter: Is this the first time you can say the team got on their laurels and ...

Asbury: What laurels? We don't have any laurels. None. Zero.

■ Reporter: How disappointing was that — what happened in the second half?

Asbury: Pretty disappointing. Come on. I'm pretty patient with the press, but let's not ask those now. What would you think if you were coaching them? You coach those guys for a minute and ask that question — at home and get your butt drilled like that. Come on. Come on.

Whew.

I wasn't about to interject one of my questions. But in the defense of sports reporters, it is sometimes our job to ... well, act stupid.

When writing a game story, we often reach an audience that doesn't see the game. In other words, we have to relive the game on paper. That's our job.

However, I can clearly see reason for Asbury's approach to such questions. It's frustrating enough to lose a game you need to win, but to then have to explain it to everybody moments afterward could try your patience.

One thing I've noticed about Asbury is he tells it like it is, straight up — sparing feelings or sidestepping an issue won't float.

When first selected as K-State's 19th coach, Asbury dogged on Allen Fieldhouse, saying, "I don't think that Allen Fieldhouse is that great of a place to play. I kind of like Bramlage Coliseum."

That brought about some interesting cross-statements from Jayhawk coach Roy Williams. Asbury then teased about playing Williams in a game of one-on-one before K-State's game at Kansas.

And then there was the Billy Tubbs incident.

Asbury called the former Oklahoma coach an idiot, a jerk, a negative recruiter and an overrated coach. No big surprise here. But to think it and to say it are two different things. He later apologized but maintained the humor.

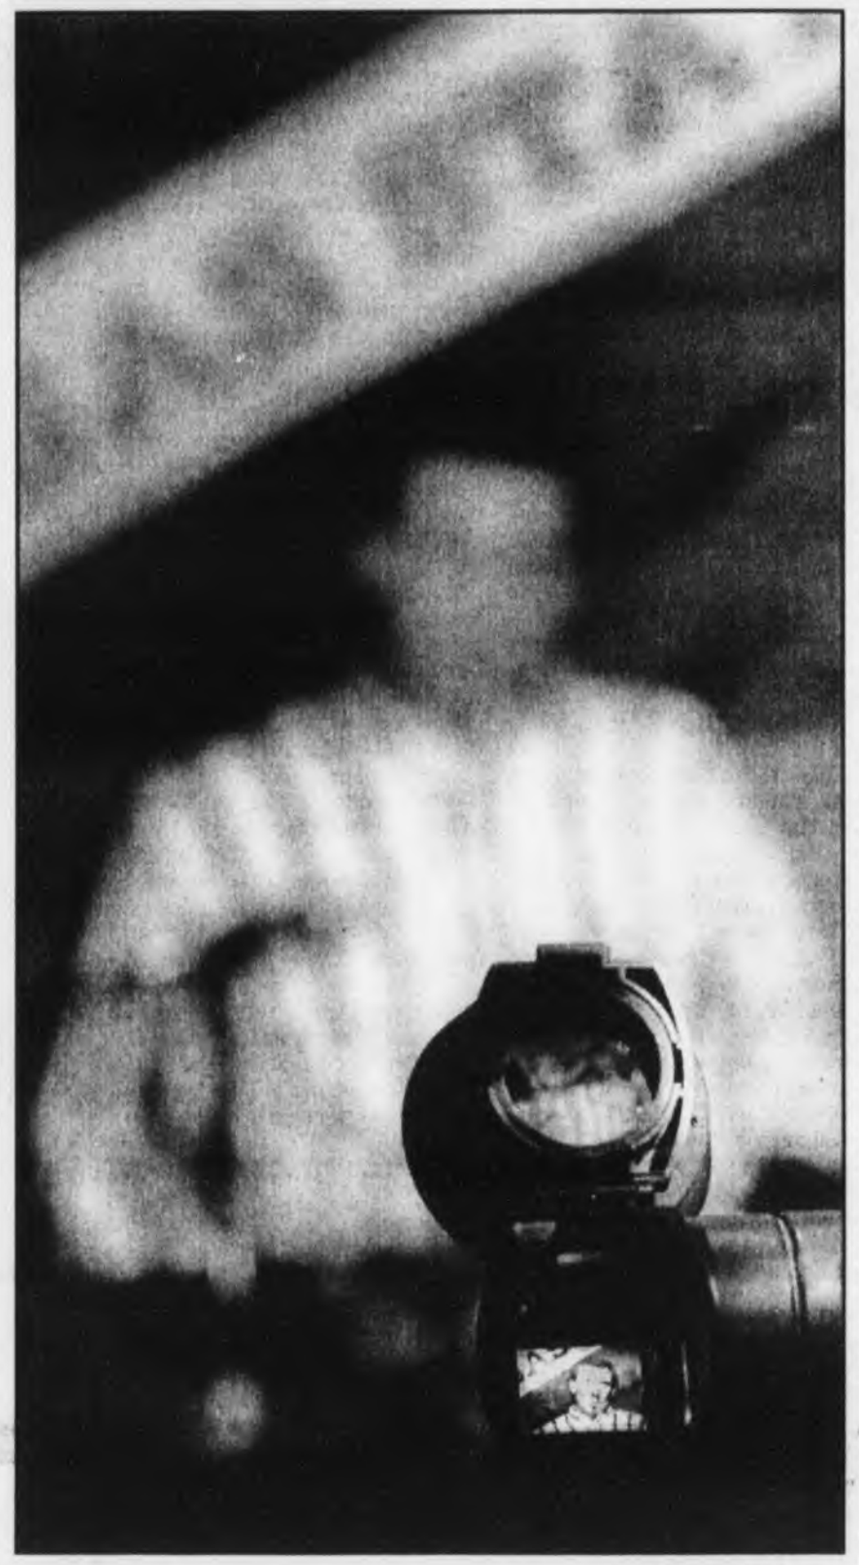
In the following press conference, he said his daughter Megan, a sophomore at Pepperdine, called him from Hollywood after hearing about his comments.

"She says, 'Dad, I've got you the lead in a movie.'"

"I said, 'Really?'"

"She said, 'Yeah, Dumb and Dumber, Part II. You're going to get to play both parts.'"

Asbury said his daughter told him he needed to quit saying things about other coaches. He said he agreed.



His wit and straightforwardness are refreshing, considering former K-State coach Dana Altman's even temperament. Asbury has an uncanny knack for edging people to the front of their chairs.

Altman is a good coach and a good man, but his disposition was colorless, at least in his dealings with the media.

And coaches don't necessarily have to be dynamic — it's not their job. Their duties entail winning games and keeping a clean program — not exactly a simple task.

"I probably don't have a tendency to maybe take it as seriously as some people would like you to or as some coaches do," Asbury said of his comments toward Tubbs. "It's just my nature.'"

Humor and candor aren't prerequisites in this game. But their presence adds flavor to the bland reality of the responsibilities of those who coach it.

Players impress K-State coach

TODD STEWART
Collegian

When Tom Asbury took the basketball coach's job at K-State, he was used to being the coach of his conference's No. 1 team.

That isn't the case this year, but Asbury said he is handling it.

"I'm fine. I don't get dizzy or anything like that," he said.

Saturday's 77-60 loss to Missouri dropped the Cats' record to 11-9 and 2-6 in the Big Eight Conference.

Asbury said the team falling apart in the second half was the main reason for the loss.

"We just had pretty much a deterioration in the second half," Asbury said.

He said the players must put the loss behind them and move ahead to the next game.

Up next for the Cats are the Oklahoma Sooners, a team the Cats defeated earlier this season 87-77.

Asbury said he thinks the Sooners will come out trying to wipe out the memory of their Jan. 25 loss in Bramlage Coliseum.

"They'll have the home crowd, the emotion and the revenge factor, so we have to go out and play hard and smart," he said.

One player who impressed Asbury with his hard play against Missouri was freshman guard Aaron Swartzendruber.

Swartzendruber broke a tooth off early in the Mizzou game when diving for a loose ball.

Swartzendruber stayed in the game, and throughout the rest of the contest he continued to dive on the floor after balls, trying to spark the struggling Cats.

"All coaches love guys like that," Asbury said. "I really, legitimately, don't think he could have cared less where his tooth was."

Swartzendruber's all-out effort didn't show up in the box scores, but senior guard Belvis Noland's hot shooting did.

Noland tied a career high with 24 points, including six three-pointers.

Asbury said he had no problem with Noland's fancy for heaving up the three-pointer.

"All a guy has to do in my opinion is shoot 33 percent on his threes, and you're helping the team," Asbury said.

For the season, Noland is shooting 38 percent from behind the three-point arc.

"If he can dropkick them from mid-court and they go in 33 percent of the time, that's helping the team," Asbury said.

As the season wears on, K-State fans have seen Noland shoot some of his three-pointers from not much closer than that spot.

"He's got great courage," Asbury said.

"He has to to shoot those kinds of shots."

Asbury, a former Western Athletic Conference player of the year, sees nothing of Noland in himself.

"I absolutely wouldn't have the guts to shoot some of the shots he does," Asbury said.

Asbury said Noland was given a great gift.

"Shooting a three's about as fine a motor skill as you can find," he said. "You better be right on. There's not a big margin of error."

There also isn't a large margin of error for the team members if they want to play in the postseason.

"We might not be in a position now to get into postseason play."

Kuregian loses in the 2nd round of Rolex

TODD STEWART
Collegian

"It wasn't one of her better performances."

That's what K-State women's tennis coach Steve Bietau said after junior Karina Kuregian's second-round loss at the Rolex National Indoor Tennis Championships.

The 3-6, 6-3, 6-1 loss to Jennifer Poulos of California came in the third leg of the ITA Collegiate Grand Slam, one of the most prestigious events in the country.

To qualify for the Rolex National Indoors Tennis Championships, Kuregian had to reach the finals of the Rolex Central Regionals.

Bietau attributed Kuregian's second-round loss against Poulos to Kuregian not putting her opponent out when she had a chance.

Kuregian

"She started out well at 5-1 and had a chance to break the game open," Bietau said.

But Kuregian did not put Poulos out, and instead Poulos rallied in the last couple of games before Kuregian finally won the set 6-3.

Bietau said Poulos played a great match and that her confidence rose after the small comeback at the end of the first set. However, Kuregian could not stop the tide from turning.

"She started attacking, and that put Kuregian on the defensive," Bietau said.

Kuregian said she agreed.

"I let her feel a little bit more relaxed," she said.

Kuregian said she can take some things from the match.

"I learned my lesson," she said. "I'm unhappy, but it will help me see my mistakes."

Kuregian said she took this loss like any other loss.

"Of course I am upset, but all 32 girls there are good," Kuregian said.

Bietau downplayed the loss as well.

"She's disappointed any time she loses," he said. "It's not the end of the world."

Kuregian already has her sights on this May's NCAA championships.

"It's by far the biggest meet of the year," she said.

For the rest of the season, including the NCAA championships, Kuregian said she just wants to play well.

"I need to play as good as I can play," she said.

Kuregian and the rest of the team jump back into competition this weekend with a triangular in Utah against Brigham Young, Weber State and Utah.

New recruit compared to 49ers' Deion Sanders

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

College football experts say that speed is the key to winning.

When K-State announced the signing of defensive back Issac Harvin on Wednesday, the Wildcats took another step toward solidifying that theory.

Harvin, a defensive back from Cape Coral High School in Fort Myers, Fla., has a 4.21 time in the 40-yard dash.

He also owns national records in the 100 and 200 meters from meets last year.

These feats led Cape Coral coach James Hale to say that Harvin is the fastest runner in the country.

"He's got the fastest time in the country," Hale said. "He is the fastest in the country. He's a great kid, and I believe that he has the raw talent to play on Sunday."

However, Harvin's accomplishments aren't limited to the track. Harvin was also selected to Florida's all-state team as a running back.

"We ran a split veer, and Issac played running back," Hale said.

"He can play free safety or cornerback with his speed."

Hale said Harvin has more talent than San Francisco 49ers' cornerback Deion Sanders did in high school.

"Deion Sanders played at our rival high school, and Issac has more speed than he did. He's also bigger than Deion," Hale said.

"No doubt at all, he is the gem of their class."

VALENTINE'S

Tidbits

Saint Valentine was a Roman Christian priest who was Martyred in approximately 270 A.D. His association with love reflects the near-coincidence of his feast-day, Feb. 14, with the ancient Roman fertility festival of Lupercalia, which is celebrated on Feb. 15. The tradition of sending cards on Valentine's Day dates back to the 19th century.

LOOKING FOR AN 'I DO'

Students say Valentine's Day is the most romantic time for a marriage proposal

CORI CORNELISON
Collegian

Editor's note: Mike Smith's name has been changed so his surprise proposal will not be spoiled.

What better way to romance your sweetheart on Valentine's Day but to get down on a knee and pop the question.

John Bartlett, K-State alumnus, did just that when he proposed to his wife, Gina, on Valentine's Day two years ago.

"I had always thought that Valentine's Day would be a cool time, and we were to the point in our relationship that we both were ready for marriage," he said.

John said he was ready to carry out his intentions but was thrown for a loop when Gina called and said she was sick and wouldn't be able to go anywhere that evening.

Gina Bartlett, senior in elementary education, said she was feeling better but decided to trick John into thinking she was still sick and surprise him when he came over.

"When he came over, he expected to see me pretty sorry-looking in sweats and sick, but I fooled him," she said.

John said he was going to put off the proposal until Gina was feeling better, but when he went to her house and Gina was ready to go out, she took him by surprise.

He said he carried out his original plan and made dinner at his apartment for the two of them.

Then they drove around Manhattan and ended up at the Manhattan letters.

While listening to Eric Clapton's "Unplugged," which Gina gave John for Valentine's Day, John proposed.

The song they were listening to was "Running on Faith," which was the first song they danced to on their wedding night.

Gina said she was so shocked when he asked her to marry him that instead of saying yes, she asked, "What would you say if I said yes?"

She said that John then pulled out a ring and replied, "I'd give you a ring."

"I was pretty flabbergasted because I did not expect it whatsoever," Gina said.

John said there was no doubt in his mind that Gina would not turn him down.

"I didn't think she would say no, but I did not know how long she wanted to wait until we got married," he said.

John and Gina were married June 11.

Mike Smith, a student at K-State, said he is planning on proposing to his girlfriend of four years this Valentine's Day.

He said his girlfriend is a senior at the University of Kansas, and they have been dating on and off for four years exactly this Valentine's Day.

Smith said he doesn't think his girlfriend has any idea that he is going to propose to her.

"She thinks it's going to be next Valentine's Day," he said.

Although Valentine's Day is a week away, Smith said he doesn't have exact plans for the night yet, but said he does have some ideas.

He said he will definitely have roses, candy, wine and maybe champagne.

One thing Smith said he knows for sure is that she will get a $1,200 diamond engagement ring that he has been making payments on.

"As far as specifics, I'm still working on it," he said.

Cards describe history, memories of day

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

Reading antique valentines is like opening a history book.

"They paint a historical and cultural portrait of society in a given time period," Edna Williams, collector, said.

"They describe how people talked, what people did and how people dressed. It's really an education," she said.

Williams started collecting valentines when she was a child.

"I still have the ones I got in grade school during the war years," she said. "I've always been interested in them because of the stories that they tell."

Williams said she has acquired many of the valentines in her collection at auctions.

"I suppose I have a couple thousand total, so I've become pretty selective as to what I'll buy," she said. "But when I find one that tells a particularly interesting tale, I'll buy it and add it to my collection."

In her years of collecting valentine cards, Williams said she has grown particularly fond of valentines from the Victorian era.

"They really were quite fancy," she said. "Some had three or four layers of paper lace, and many were covered with flowers, hearts and ribbons."

In her book "Holiday Collectibles," Nancy Rosin described valentine cards produced during Victorian times as "heavily embellished with lithographed doves, flowers, bow knots, swags and layers of lace."

In addition, many of these valentines were created with movable parts.

For example, doves had fluttering wings, shutters on windows opened, and hearts sprung up as the card was opened.

"The valentines that people gave back then really were dressed up compared to the ones we exchange today," Williams said.

According to Rosin, the custom of exchanging valentine cards in this country began in the middle part of the 18th century. Early cards were made from brightly colored paper designed with hearts and verse.

Another popular form was the foldup letter or puzzle.

These cards were decorated on both sides and had the corners folded into themselves to form an envelope.

More elaborate valentines did not appear until the turn of the 19th century, when Pennsylvania Germans began to design cards containing cutouts of trees, birds, cherubs and hearts.

The custom of exchanging cards reached its height of popularity during the early 20th century when German manufacturers began to produce valentines in mass quantities.

Valentine's Day has become Chocolate Day

SARA SMITH
Collegian

It's no accident that red, heart-shaped boxes of chocolates are a symbol of Valentine's Day.

Boxes of candy are a tradition, but Valentine's Day isn't the type of holiday people plan for in advance, Karen Brown, manager of Rod's Hallmark Shop, said.

"Men traditionally shop on the last two or three days," she said.

Brown said chocolate sales are normal so far, but she never expects sales to pick up until the few days before Valentine's Day. She said if she hadn't been selling candy for years, she'd be worried, but she knows that men always wait until the last minute.

"We got in hundreds of boxes of candy, and we will sell the majority of them in the last few days," she said.

Brown said she sells a lot of heart-shaped boxes of chocolates, and men seem to like those best.

"I think it's kind of a traditional gift," she said. "We also sell a lot of stuffed animals."

Mark Frame, director of marketing and new product development at Russell Stover Candies, said he agreed.

"Chocolate's a sign of affection, especially in a heart-shaped box," he said.

Frame said Valentine's Day is an important holiday in the candy industry, but it's hard for him to gauge how successful sales will be.

"It ranks third behind Christmas and Easter for us," he said. "The selling period is a bit short because of men's shopping habits. They always wait until the last minute."

Brown said she keeps track of when she sells out of a certain box of candy, and she knows she didn't buy enough of those boxes when she sells out before 4 in the afternoon.

Last-minute panicked gift-buying doesn't stop as the gifts get more expensive, said Cindy Barcomb, salesperson at Godiva Chocolatiers in Kansas City, where the chocolate goes for $29 a pound.

Barcomb said she watches men buy candy frantically more and more as Valentine's Day approaches. Most of her customers are men.

"They're fun. You can hand during the '20s and '30s in exchanges at school.

"They cost five or 10 cents apiece and were very pretty with lots of lace and frills," she said. "You just don't see valentines like that anymore."

Today, these valentines can range in value from $2 to $25, Jean Bigbee Hill, owner of Tuttle's Antique Market, said.

"People buy them to decorate their homes," she said. "Some people do send them, but most people buy them to display."

Diane Long, collector, said she enjoys displaying her collection on her piano.

"I usually buy them throughout the year and put them out in January," she said. "I just like them because they are each so different. No two are alike."

Collectors purchasing valentines should wait for those in original condition, Rosin said.

"There is an overwhelmingly large quantity of early- and middle-20th-century valentines, so it is a good idea to refrain from buying cards that are stained, folded, creased or dirty.

"In contrast, do not hesitate to buy if the love token is addressed or personalized — this adds to the sentimentality of the treasure," she said.

them anything, and they don't care. They power shop. They're good."

Barcomb said Godiva is next to a lingerie shop, and she watches men hit both places in about 20 minutes.

"They run over to Victoria's Secret, and then they run here," she said.

Men buying expensive chocolates like Godiva are generally professionals above the age of 30, but Barcomb said she does see some students, usually men, who spend more around Valentine's Day.

She said most women coming into Godiva will spend much less money than men, who tend to be in such a hurry they don't care.

"It's a little token with women, whereas men will buy a $75 heart," Barcomb said.

Giving brings back memories

"I'm not a hopeless incurable romantic, but for me, it is the one day that people can show each other that they love each other and that friends can show each other that they care."

LAURA WILLIAMS
freshman in pre-physical therapy

CHARITY WOODSIN
Collegian

Remember Valentine's Day in grade school? You got to exchange valentines with classmates, have a party during class and give a valentine to that special someone you had your eye on all year.

Growing up seems to change all that for some students, but the memories of past Valentine's Days are still special to many.

"I liked making the valentine boxes for class every year," Stacey Chapman, freshman in elementary education, said. "We used to judge them, and I remember a huge, 3-D heart-shaped one I made with my dad that won one year."

Some students said the giving of valentines also stands out as an important memory.

"When I was a little girl, I loved to give people things," Laura Williams, freshman in pre-physical therapy, said. "It was a time to give everybody in your class something. You could let everyone know you cared."

Shawn Poland, freshman in mechanical engineering, said he doesn't remember the giving aspect of Valentine's Day as well as the receiving aspect.

"I loved getting the candy and treats that always came with Valentine's Day," Poland said.

Some agreed that you grow out of the novelty of Valentine's Day about the time you hit high school.

"In high school, we didn't do anything," Cindy Augustine, freshman in engineering, said. "We were so busy looking forward to being grown up that we didn't think giving valentines was the cool thing to do."

Williams, however, said she doesn't believe she will ever grow out of Valentine's Day.

"I'm not a hopelessly incurable romantic, but for me, it is the one day that people can show each other that they love each other and that friends can show each other that they care," Williams said.

Chapman said Valentine's Day for college students is definitely different.

"Now it is more romantic," Chapman said. "In elementary school, you pretend you liked everyone, but now it is mainly a time for you and your significant other."

Some students are doing things this year to bring back the excitement.

"My residents thought it would be fun to do things like they did in grade school," said resident assistant Shari Peterson.

"Everyone on the floor will get to decorate a bag and hang it on their door to collect valentines in," Peterson, junior in animal science and industry, said.

It might be important to keep memories of Valentine's Day, but Williams said it is also important to focus on the meaning of the day.

"It is the one day of the year that love is everybody's focus," Williams said.

Ex's dependency causes problems

Dear Cassandra,
My ex-girlfriend recently told me that she was an alcoholic. She told me that if it weren't for me and her mother, she would kill herself. I don't know how to help her anymore. I still love the person she used to be, but I hate what she's become. Your advice is greatly appreciated.
Signed, Pinball

Dear Pinball,
If you feel like she is holding you hostage with the weight of her dependence on you, I suggest you very carefully distance yourself from the situation. If she asks you why, explain that you still care for her and will encourage her through the phone and letters, but that you need to concentrate on some more aspects of your own life.

To submit poetry, call the Collegian at 532-6556 or e-mail afz@ksu.ksu.edu. Poems must be typed with the author's name, major and year at the top and must be between 200 and 450 words.

Muddy Lady

Bare carpet floor, paths spreading.
Gone are the needles between my boots.
Green scent clearing passageways, oxygen gasping, on labor my lungs.

White caps, rivers of ice, explosive ash and soot. Absent are river trout leaping; no bears smacking lips and water, having such fun.

Pikas scurrying, creeks whisper tales of time. Cool canteen sips fight dehydration, fatigue, light-headed, dizzying sways.

High above, no smog or filth to speak of, before active days.
Well, that was before St. Helen sighed, then shrugged.

"She blew out, not up," that's what the expert said.

Now tall columns, nature carved,
lay waste as far as senses dare.
Moss climbing, deer nipping, overhead, eagles wheeling.

Mouths agape, I stare.

Cast Out

My mind cringes in jumbled confusion
and my soul is cracked, painfully ajar.
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

Penance can lead me to my salvation,
but virtue can lead me only so far.
My mind cringes in jumbled confusion.

Dazed and lost, I come to the conclusion
that shouting my feelings is my savior.
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

Nowhere to run, nothing to hide under,
I brave myself, the dear dreaded scholar.
My mind cringes in jumbled confusion,
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Quoc Nguyen, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, reads a poem Monday evening during a poetry reading at the K-State Union Art Gallery. Nguyen started out by reading poems from Pablo Neruda, a poet from Chile who won the Nobel Peace Prize for Literature in 1971. Nguyen's friends from Goodnow Hall came to listen to him read.

Poets gather to share art

Record audience assembles to hear student readings

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

A record number of poets and poem-lovers gathered last night at the Union Program Council's monthly poetry reading in the Union Art gallery.

A group of about 50 semi-Shakespeares and young Bukowskis met to hear the work of about 10 students.

"We're seeing the best attendance ever here," UPC program adviser Sharon Willits said. "We don't know what the change is, but the committee is very excited to be able to provide an avenue like this on campus."

Student readers said they appreciated the forum UPC was providing.

"It's a chance for us poor, unpublished authors to showcase and get reactions from the general public that we wouldn't otherwise get," Scott Huggins, poetry reading coordinator and junior in English and Russian, said.

The poets were a diverse crew.

"Poets have a different way of putting things, and this is a forum where we're not just pickin' at each other all the time," said Lisa Kay Blume, junior in secondary education and women's studies.

Beyond a contrast of styles, the poets' influences were equally distinct.

"Shel Silverstein was my God when I was growing up," Blume said. "Now my influences are the people at the readings. I like to hear what my generation has to say."

Pete Hoeman, senior in creative writing, has been a regular at the readings for almost three years to read his own poetry and to see what others are writing.

The poets aren't the only ones who enjoy the readings.

"I love the readings," said Chrissy Hathaway, UPC Arts Committee chairperson and major in Spanish, art and education. "Poetry is a wonderful opportunity for expression."

The poets seemed to share a mutual sense of light mockery for their own "poethood."

Jonathon Miles, junior in computer engineering, read "Hypocrisy in Action" from a series he called "Poems Jon Wrote About Three Hours Ago."

Stalking the gathering from behind a column, he half-whispered, "Just look at all these poets, see? Do they not understand that we hate this thing called poetry?"

For those who missed the reading Monday, another gathering will be organized on the first Monday of next month. A second reading will be offered in collaboration with the multicultural council on March 14.

▶ LEGISLATURE

Law would make parents pay

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Should parents be forced to pay for the criminal damage their children do?

The Senate Judiciary Committee is considering a proposal that would do just that.

Lawmakers acknowledged Monday that the idea would be popular with voters, but they wondered whether it would be practical.

"Politically, it has great appeal," said Sen. Tim Emert, R-Independence, the committee chairman. "There are enormous ramifications."

The committee is considering a bill that would allow a juvenile court to order a young offender who is 13 or older to pay restitution to their victims as a civil matter. That would allow a judge to require juvenile offenders to continue to pay restitution even after they have been released from court supervision.

Presently, once a juvenile offender is no longer on court-supervised probation, a restitution order cannot be enforced.

"A juvenile system of restitution is in place. It just doesn't work for the victim," said James Clark, lobbyist for the Kansas County and District Attorneys Association.

In most cases, Clark said, the court loses jurisdiction over juvenile offenders before the restitution is paid, he said.

He offered an amendment that would require parents or legal guardians to pay for the damage their children or charges do.

"The purpose of this is parental responsibility," Clark said.

The measure would not force the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to pay restitution for juveniles in the department's custody, however.

Emert said present law permits judges to order parents to pay restitution of up to $1,000.

Sen. Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said he is concerned about people who adopt troubled teenagers who have been in SRS custody.

▶ STUDENT SENATE

UFM may lose Senate funding

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

Members of Student Senate proposed cutting UFM's salary funding from $10,350 to nothing for 1995-96.

Patrick Carney, arts and sciences senator, presented an amendment that would cut all Senate funding for UFM salaries.

"We want to place the burden of salaries back on administration where they belong. Honorariums should be paid for by student fees, not salaries," Carney said.

The reasoning behind the suggested amendment is because student fee reserves are low, and UFM has other funding sources, Carney said.

"Three options are being considered if the administration will not take over the funding: institutional advancement, the president's reserve or UFM raising its class fees by two or three dollars," he said.

The Senate voted to table the bill and amendment until the K-State administration has a chance to discuss providing the funding.

Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said UFM receives funding through class fees and other campus funding.

"We do not ask student government to fund a large part of our organizations," she said.

Without the money from Senate, Teener said she does not think that the administration will provide the needed resources.

"If we could get some student advocacy, some of it might be picked up by the administration," Teener said.

▶ ELECTIONS

Voter registration deadline nears

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

K-State students don't have to leave campus to register to vote in Riley County elections.

Students can register to vote at the Office of Student Activities & Services in the Union. Students already registered in another county can change their registration to Riley County in the office.

"Any student, or anybody, can register at the Union for Riley County as long as they are 18 years old," Derek Kreifels, chairman of State and Community Affairs Committee, said.

The deadline for registering for the primary elections is Feb. 13. The primary election will be on Feb. 28. The deadline for the general election is March 20, with the election set for April 4.

Ilene Colbert, Riley County clerk and elections officer, said the positions to be voted on include Manhattan City Commission, Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board and Pottawatomie County USD 384.

"Riley City will also have a primary for mayor," Colbert said.

There are no polling stations at the Union for actual voting, but students who live on campus can vote in the basement of Derby Food Center.

Fulfilling a dream

After 67 years of wishing, an art museum for K-State is finally becoming a reality

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

After more than 130 years of operation, K-State, the last Big Eight school without an art museum, is getting one.

For 70 years, various people employed by K-State have driven campaigns for a museum, yet none were successful.

In the late 1980s, a group of ambitious visionaries organized an effort that was finally successful.

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art was the result.

The Beach didn't blossom from nothing, but rather a complex seed involving an arduous season of informing, fundraising, planning, design and finally, the phase we are currently witnessing, construction.

The public opening of the Beach is planned for March 21 or 22, 1996. The staff will be in the building 60 days before the opening.

This is the story of an art museum.

Not many people know a vibrant, expanding art collection exists on this campus. Started in 1928 by K-State architecture professor John Helm and Lindsborg artist Birger Sandzen, the collection mainly focuses on American regionalist artists. John Steuart Curry, Thomas Hart Benton, Grant Wood and Sandzen are featured in the collection.

Helm, an artist himself, organized the Friends of Art, a fund-raising organization intent on purchasing art for the collection.

Though successful in collecting art, Helm could not raise the attention or money to get an art museum built.

So, the art collection has gone publicly unseen, though some pieces have been installed in various campus buildings for years, and others have toured in exhibits.

Jon and Ruth Ann Wefald, who came to campus in 1986, were alerted to the lack of a campus art museum through a letter-writing campaign by Charles Stroh, professor of art. Ruth Ann Wefald then took up the art museum as a personal project.

"The more I found out about the collection, that it was an important and significant collection, and to have it not shown any place was really a disservice," Wefald said.

"Furthermore, the fact that K-State doesn't have an art museum, to me, there was something missing in the liberal arts education that was being offered to students here," she said. "Every major university has an art museum."

The first thing Wefald did was to inform the public a collection existed.

"The first commitment we made was to do a statewide tour and take a show out to talk about the importance of art at K-State," Wefald said.

Besides performances by students and lectures by K-Staters, slides were shown of the significant works in the collection.

"Our goal was to let them know the arts were an important part of K-State," she said, "but we do have an area of unmet need. We have a beautiful collection, but nowhere to show it."

After the initial tour, Wefald began to see a growing interest in the museum idea by Kansans. The next time Wefald and company hit the road, the goal was to raise money.

The Museum Development Committee, chaired by R.M. Seaton, who was also a significant contributor to the Beach, orchestrated the fundraising. Wefald asked Marianna Kistler Beach, K-State graduate in journalism and mass communications and Hays resident, to sit on the committee, and she agreed.

"We had Ross (Beach) and Marianna at the house for a meeting, and we asked them for a lead gift — a naming opportunity gift — and they agreed," Wefald said.

"At that point, it was determined the museum would be called the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art," she said.

The Beaches have given $3 million to the museum, which also includes an endowment to pay for exhibits.

"They are a very important part of the K-State family," Wefald said.

After the Beach gift, other families and individuals came forward with money.

The museum cost is between $5 million and $6 million.

With the fundraising in place, the drive for the museum turned to finding an architect and creating a building.

When Nelson Britt, director of the Beach, joined K-State in September 1992, there was no formal program statement devised to give to architects.

Britt was chosen as director because of his extensive experience with museum operation and construction. Before coming to the Beach, Britt was director of the Greenville Museum of Art in Greenville, North Carolina for seven years.

It was at Greenville where Britt oversaw the construction of a new addition.

Britt and Curator Jessica Reichman served on the selection committee to choose the architect.

Gerald Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect, said, "Because an art museum is an unusual type of design, the University, the K-State Foundation, and the primary donor determined we would

Members of Alpha Delta Pi sorority, friends and family gathered in memory of Heather Stewart last night at All Faiths Chapel.

Stewart was spending a semester in Spain studying at the University of Santiago De Compostela through an exchange program when she was struck by a tour bus she had just exited. Stewart, who was 20, died Saturday.

Yellow and white daisies were handed out, and at the end of the service, friends made two large bouquets with them.

The flowers were arranged in front of a large collage, which had pictures of Stewart, pictures of her with her friends and some of her favorite quotes.

The ADPis organized the memorial so Stewart's friends from school, the house and other organizations she was involved in could attend a service.

"She knew so many people," Jen Weis, senior in marketing, said. "We wanted to have a memorial on campus because we knew not everyone would have

▶ SAINT MARY HOSPITAL CEO STEPS DOWN TO EXPLORE JOB OPTIONS

The CEO of the Saint Mary Hospital will be stepping down effective March 10.

Mark Brown-Barnett has been with the hospital for seven years, and he said it was time for him to move on.

"The average life span of a hospital administrator is about four years. The timing is very important, and you have to plan ahead to minimize the disruption. It was just a good time now," Brown-Barnett said.

Before Brown-Barnett came to Manhattan, he served as president and CEO of St. Mary's Hospital in Emporia from 1984 to 1988.

Brown-Barnett intends to take some time off from work and weigh his job options. He said he plans to stay in the field of health care.

"Right now, I have about three or four different options. I'm going to take a few months to decide," he said.

He said he is flexible and willing to move to a larger or smaller community. But in the near future, Brown-Barnett and his wife and four children will stay in the Manhattan area.

"During Mark Brown-Barnett's tenure as CEO, both the community and the hospital have benefited from his leadership," said Jim Coffman, chairman of the Saint Mary Hospital Board of Trustees.

"I personally have enjoyed working with him, and, speaking for the entire board, we have been greatly enabled by his expertise and engaging management style. As chairman of the Board of Trustees, I wish him the very best in his future endeavors."

▶ BATTERY BILL MAY INCREASE REPORTS

WICHITA (AP) — More women would come forward to report being beaten if a proposal to stiffen state penalties for successive battery convictions is enacted, Sue Russell, of the Wichita YWCA Women's Crisis Center, said Monday.

The bill is aimed at combatting increasing violence in homes and on the streets by discouraging repeated acts of bodily harm or rude, insulting or angry physical contact by individuals.

The bill says the punishment for each successive act of violence should increase proportionately so a clear message is sent to the population of the state of Kansas that violence in any form shall not be tolerated.

▶ U.S. CONSIDERS EXPORT SANCTIONS

BEIJING (AP) — China's growth into a large exporting power raised the likelihood that friction with the United States would culminate in U.S. plans for trade sanctions.

"This was bound to happen," Masatake Takahashi, a Tokyo-based expert on international-trade policy, said. "It was the same process with Japan and Taiwan. Now China."

China's trade surplus with the United States soared to nearly $30 billion last year.

The United States has accused China of failing to adequately protect intellectual property rights. Pirated CDs, videos, computer software and watches are sold in markets throughout Asia.

▶ HOUSE APPROVES LINE-ITEM VETO

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hailing it as one more win for the Gipper, the House approved line-item veto legislation Monday.

Line-item veto is designed to strengthen a president's ability to cut wasteful federal spending.

Final passage, timed to coincide with former President Reagan's 84th birthday, came on a strong bipartisan vote of 294-134.

Senate action is expected later in the year, but a vigorous fight is expected.

Critics say it would tip the constitutional balance of power too far in a president's favor at the expense of Congress and that it would do little to erase federal deficits currently running about $200 billion annually.

▶ K-STATE MARCHING BAND BRINGS GAME TUNES TO FANS' DOORSTEPS

If you're one of those people who enjoy the halftime music at K-State sporting events, you can now enjoy it in the comfort of your own home.

The K-State Marching Band recently put together some of its own music, which is now for sale.

The recorded music comes from three different areas: pep band songs, traditional songs and last year's three theme shows, Jeff Porter, band member, said.

One thousand compact discs and 500 tapes were made.

"I produced and recorded all of the music, but Frank Tracz came up with the idea," Kyle Arnold, senior in music, said.

Tracz, director of bands, said this is not a money-making project.

"We are just wanting to break even," he said.

The CDs sell for $15, and the tapes sell for $10, Porter said. They are only fore Sale in McCain 226.

"The money from selling these will go back into the process of making them," he said.

Many people will benefit from this band project, including those who are members of the K-State Marching Band.

"It's nice for the band players to have for themselves," Tracz said.

Another use for the recordings is to promote the music department and recruit new students.

"It is a tool to give away to high-school band teachers, and it puts a good word out," Tracz said.

The department is planning to do more recordings in the future, but not immediately, Tracz said.

"We don't want to flood the market," he said.

Shoot Your Family?
for the Royal Purple yearbook

SHOOT YOURSELF 1995 is the last opportunity you'll have to get a picture of you and a group of up to six of your friends, your favorite faculty members, your coworkers, your significant others, or even the paddle that led you to intramural table tennis victory taken for the yearbook. Face it, you've spent a lot of time and money at this university. Why not have something to show for it?

SHOOT YOURSELF 1995 will be from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. Feb. 15-17 in the alcove on the first floor of the K-State Union.

The SHOOT YOURSELF photos will appear on a first-come, first-served basis. You will not pay for this service, but you may order color prints of these photos from Blaker Studio Royal on Feb. 28. At this time, proofs will be displayed on a table outside of the Stateroom, and you will also have the opportunity to purchase the 1995 Royal Purple.

Construction forces relocation

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

The construction of the new, four-lane Kansas Highway 177 bridge has caused an old business to appear new.

The construction of the bridge's access ramps has caused Crown Decorating to move from 201 Colorado Road to 501 Fort Riley Blvd. The Kansas Department of Transportation purchased the building and land from Crown Decorating.

"KDOT said we were going to have to move," Robin Doherty, manager, said.

The owners of Crown Decorating were not against the move.

The building that housed Crown Decorating had originally been a bakery.

"It was a very old building," Julie Barth, design consultant, said.

It wasn't in good condition. When it would rain, ceiling tiles would fall, Barth said.

"The owners saw it as an opportunity to upgrade," Doherty said. "We are sure that the move will help out. We have had an increase in business."

Some of the businesses and homes that are located near the existing access ramp are being moved or destroyed to make room for access ramps to the four-lane bridge that is to be completed by mid-summer 1996.

Crown Decorating is a home-decorating store that sells floor coverings, ceramic tile, carpet and wallpaper.

It is made up of 50 percent commercial busi-ness and 50 percent resid-ential business. It has a staff of six full-time employees and two part-time employees.

The move was a positive one for Crown Decorating, compared with some of the other businesses that were located in the area.

One positive point is the increased visibility on Fort Riley Boulevard. It has brought more attention to the store.

"It is definitely an improvement. The location itself is better. There is a lot more space," Barth said.

Doherty said there has been more walk-in traffic since the move.

"Everyone thinks that we are a new business," she said.

KDOT purchased buildings and land from the owners of businesses and home owners in the construction area and offered a relocation bonus.

The move was expensive, but KDOT reimbursed Crown Decorating for some of those expenses, Doherty said.

The construction on the new place is completed, but Crown Decorating has not had a grand

Salina business gives computer

Donation given with hopes of qualified grads

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

K-State-Salina received a $20,000 gift from KASA of Salina.

KASA gave the college an Allen-Bradley Programmable Logic Controller to mechanical and electrical engineering technology students.

Karl Stutterheim, KASA owner and K-State graduate, said the donations he makes now benefit his company in the future.

He also said his engineering department, which contains 40 to 50 workers, employs about 15 to 20 K-State-Salina graduates.

"Our largest motivation is a K-State-Salina grad is just a good quality graduate," Stutterheim said.

"They're really well-prepared for our type of business," he said.

KASA deals with the programming and installation of machinery in various factory settings.

The car industry is one of its main clients, Stutterheim said.

"We deal with the automation of various conveyor systems that move the cars on the assembly line," he said.

John Barnes, assistant professor and section head of mechanical engineering technology, said the PLC is a computer that is used in an industrial setting.

"It reads sensor inputs, such as photo electric eyes and switches," he said. "Using those inputs, it controls things like conveyors, robots and clamps."

"Their function is industrial automation and control," Barnes said.

Barnes also said the equipment is already being used at K-State-Salina.

"Right now, we're using it to set up some laboratory exercises for students to do," he said.

"Our focus is to teach students how to connect PLCs up to other equipment and how to program them to control different functions on the machines," Barnes said.

Barnes gave an example of a job that can be performed by the PLC.

He said to imagine boxes going down a conveyor belt. When the boxes reach a certain point, they are supposed to be kicked off the belt.

A photo eye tells the PLC that a box has reached this point, and the PLC in turn tells some other device to kick the box off the conveyor belt.

Barnes said conveyors would be dumb machines without the help of the PLC.

"Sensors are kind of the eyes, and the PLC is kind of the brain," he said.

Barnes said most K-State-Salina students will need to do something with PLCs in the future, so it's important to work with this equipment before they are hired.

"We feel it's very necessary to teach this sort of thing because almost every manufacturer has an abundance of PLCs," he said. "We're trying to give them a little more flavor of it before they leave here."

Barnes said KASA has donated racks and other valuable machinery in the past as well.

"They've been real good to us," Barnes said.

Nobody can escape Parking Services

Oh, but if only we'd had a photographer around.

It was 3:30 p.m. Monday, and the site was the road between Kedzie Hall and the K-State Union. At least two amazed witnesses saw the impossible.

Parked on the right side of the road was one of those white University vans. The van wasn't in a space, and no driver was in sight.

Actually, nobody was in sight besides a few passersby on the way to their 3:30 classes, the usual Kedzie Hall smokers and Parking Services.

Yes, Parking Services.

The two workers were filling out a dreaded yellow slip, the slip all K-Staters who have been guilty of creating their own imaginary parking spaces or perhaps were negligent about filling their meter have seen and feared.

And who was the lucky recipient of the yellow slip? The University van.

It would warm anyone's heart.

Has anyone ever wondered before why staff can park haphazardly all over campus — on the sidewalk, if they wish — and escape a ticket, while students are penalized for forgetting to plug their meter with that last nickel?

Wonder no more. Even University staff can be ticketed. We don't know who pays tickets for the University when they come from the University, but we marvel at the fairness of it all.

Nobody really likes Parking Services much.

But knowing at least that they are fair and just in their ticketing, maybe we can like them a little.

Get back to the meaning of baseball

I was reminded of something as I was walking across campus the other day and had to duck from a frisbee by the Union.

KADY MASSEY

Spring training for baseball is supposed to start soon. At least, in a perfect world, it would.

Is anyone besides me sick of this whole thing? What happened to playing because you love the game — because baseball is the air you breathe and the reason for being on this earth? Almost every ball player I've ever met, from T-ball leagues on up, plays because they love baseball to some degree or another. Some kids sleep with their gloves under their pillows and bow in the direction of Wrigley Field every night. Others just like being out in the sunshine wearing their T-shirts and blue jeans and smacking the ball around. Either way, they are enjoying the purely American sport of baseball.

Babe Ruth's 100th birthday is this week. Ruth, the biggest man in baseball — literally and figuratively. I like the Babe; he is and always will be my favorite player. I particularly enjoy seeing pictures of him when he was playing. The fact that he was amazed he could play that wonderful sport and get paid for it shows. I sort of wonder what he would have to say about this whole ridiculous strike.

He would probably say these guys need to go back to the minors and remember why they play in the first place.

I know why I like baseball. I remember the first professional ballgame I ever went to. My family was on vacation, and we were going to St. Louis with a stop in Kansas City to see the Royals play (my Dad is a fan).

Maybe if the players and commissioners were reminded why they got into this game, they would realize just how ridiculous this strike has become.

To this day, I could not tell you who they played, but I think the Royals won. I remember Steve Balboni was still playing, and he hit a homer into the fountain. My younger brother and I had heard that the restaurant in the stadium had gold-plated silverware, so we tried to hang over the railing of the stands to see in the windows.

My mom wouldn't let me go down to the bleachers, but I do remember that the best hot dog I've ever eaten was in Royals Stadium. The seventh-inning stretch was fun, and a ballgame is the only place I've ever been where shrieking at the umpires is OK. What I remember most, though, is that I had a great time.

If I had known then what I know now about professional baseball players, I don't know if the game would have been that fun.

Baseball is the only professional sport I will actually buy tickets to go see. It is the only sport I've ever seen where men can act like boys and everyone in the stadium can become 12-year-olds on a warm summer day. There are no steroids, no guys named Neon and no tackling. Baseball is graceful and elegant. It was invented by Americans, and Americans are trying to kill it.

One suggestion I heard was to fire all the pro players and move up everyone on the farm teams. I like this idea. Those guys are playing because they still dream about being pros. Have you ever seen a player at his first professional game? That guy is enjoying the game more than anyone else there. He is feeling every high and low, and no matter what happens, he'll always remember that game. I would love to see a game played by nothing but new players.

The government is getting involved now. This could be a blessing or a curse. Maybe if the players and commissioners were reminded why they got into this game, they would realize just how ridiculous the strike has become.

Personally, I think that if a teary kid wearing a little-league uniform talked to the right person, this mess might get resolved that much faster.

Kady Massey is a sophomore in journalism and mass communications.

Garage defeats purpose of Memorial Stadium

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

This University has had a parking problem for a long time. The problem with parking is that no one wants to do anything reasonable to create more parking spaces.

There's a proposal on the table to create more parking spots that some think is new. This proposal would put a parking garage in the middle of Memorial Stadium.

What those people don't know is that this proposal isn't new at all. Last year, when the campus community was about to vote on whether and how to renovate the Union — only to be vetoed by an authoritarian Student Governing Association — an original Union renovation proposal involved building this garage right where people are talking about building it now. This proposal also sought to build a University-owned hotel next to this garage. It was dropped because most people saw it was a political impossibility.

It still is. It's a political impossibility because building a garage in the middle of Memorial Stadium is an obviously bad idea.

After all, why not build it in the middle of KSU Stadium? KSU Stadium, like Memorial Stadium, was built with student money and is used by various campus groups. To say that the field could be used in spite of the monolith of concrete and steel rising from its center is, at the least, a lie. The traffic, noise and lack of space would be the final nails in old Memorial Stadium's coffin.

Then the University could finally get around to building that hotel it wants.

What Memorial Stadium needs is renovation and rejuvenation, not a garage.

What K-State needs is an underground parking garage in the Union parking lot. This furrow has been plowed before in an opinion piece from October 31, 1994, available in the E-Collegian archives at http://www.spub.edu/issues/v99b/n50/opn-parking-miller.html.

For those of you who are clueless about how to read the E-Collegian on the Internet, the piece more or less states that K-State's parking-space shortage would be best solved by building an underground parking garage. It should be underground because it would not change the aesthetics of the campus. Any garage that is above-ground would block the view of one thing or another.

K-State should learn from all of those city slickers and go underground with the garage like they often do.

No one responded to the column. Neither a nay nor aye came back from the ideas presented in the column as if they spiraled into a black hole of indifference once the newspapers hit the newstands.

Now that some of the so-called leaders of the student body are proposing to alter the face of the campus in such an outrageous way, more people are becoming interested once again in just where the hypothetical parking garage would be built.

What's so outrageous about this idea? It's outrageous because the stadium is a memorial to the students who fought and died in the two world wars.

Students ran fund drives to raise money to build it in an incredible demonstration of appreciation, gratitude, patriotism and generosity, four virtues that seem to be seriously deficient in the characters of those who want to desecrate this memorial to some very brave people by putting a garage in it.

Most of the people involved with the creation of Memorial Stadium are now dead, so it's a little easier to propose its desecration.

Imagine that someone seriously proposed to put a garage in the middle of the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial in Washington, D.C. The baby boomers would go nuts — and rightfully so.

Some members of Generation X, which has never had to fight a war, may be a little less sensitive to the importance of memorials to veterans, but not everyone is. Let's hope our generation doesn't propose a strip mall at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

Memorial Stadium could be used more than it is right now. One of the great things a place like that could provide would be an outdoor music venue. If the stadium underwent a slight facelift to improve its structure and appearance, it would be a great place to see concerts during the warm months of the school year.

What's so outrageous about this idea? It's outrageous because the stadium is a memorial to the students who fought and died in the two world wars.

The University of Kansas has Day on the Hill, a free outdoor concert every spring. Only ingenuity, common sense, good promotion and band choices and some capital improvements stand in the way of K-State turning the venerable old Memorial Stadium into an attraction for concert-goers from all around the region. Where would all of these people park? Underground, of course.

Then again, K-State and its student body has to be ready to join the 20th — no, 21st century for it to go through these growing pains. Right now, most people could care less about K-State's future. If the apathy continues, K-State will not be left a better place as the alumni have left it to us. It also won't be much to return to for a visit.

It's up to us.

Foundation is for development

Dear editor:

All across the nation, college campuses are littered with useful, semi-useful and stupid opinions offered by college newspaper editorials. While no one questions the value of the free press, everyone should worry when the power of an unaccountable few can squelch the honest efforts and intentions of many.

Although we thank the editors for recognizing the merit if a senior class gift that establishes scholarships rather than building park benches, we question whether they understand the important difference between fundraising and development.

You see, the Student Foundation works to encourage development, not fundraising. Fundraising is a quick, anonymous encounter at a bake-sale table; development is a long-term cultivation process that often leads to more substantial support later.

Fundraising is a relatively painful loss of pocket change; development challenges people to make a personal sacrifice in exchange for something of common good.

If the editors had bothered to call anyone managing the program before printing their opinion, they would have discovered a few important facts that might have tempered their skepticism.

1. Student Foundation followed up its letters (not a flier) with a call to each senior during a five-day telethon; 2. Volunteer callers explained that $50 was not a minimum requirement; 3. Contributors were offered an option to defer part of their gift until after they graduate to lessen the impact; 4. Smaller gifts were actively encouraged when more appropriate.

We offer our heartfelt thanks to each senior who pledged, no matter what the amount. We know it wasn't easy. Nor was it easy for our student foundation volunteer callers to give up four hours each night for five nights.

But the K-Staters who pledged to the "Seniors of Legacy" scholarship program showed themselves to be true development philanthropists, not just fundraising contributors.

By looking beyond today's benefits, these seniors proved they are leaders of tomorrow.

▶ "THE BELL CURVE"

Book lacks balance, objectivity

Dear editor,

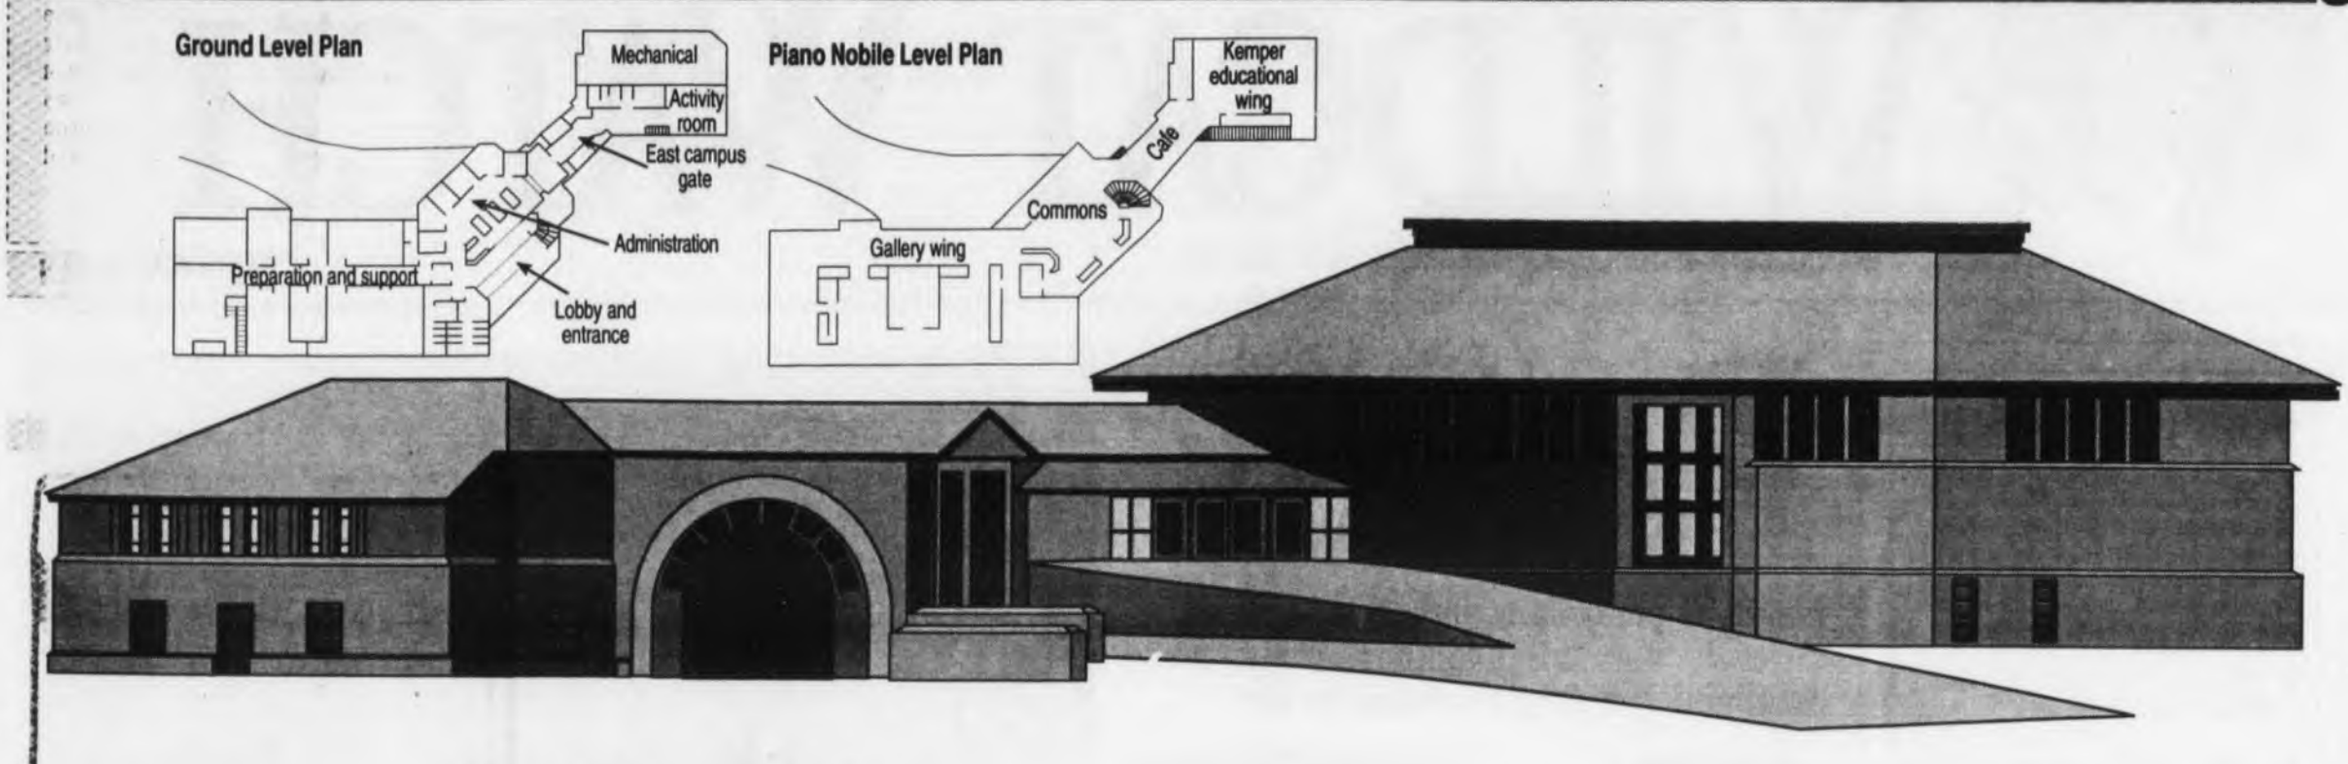
Last week, the Collegian published a glowing book review of Herrnstein and Murray's "Bell Curve; Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life."

Unfortunately, there are some problems with this book.

One of them is that unprepared readers may swallow the data, arguments and conclusions of the book hook, line and sinker without a critical analysis of the material presented.

Thus, your reviewer believes that "the scientific method [used] is impeccable," that "the results are valid," that "their evidence is undeniable," etc. — all of them global evaluations, which require a good deal more work and background knowledge than one reading of a book on a very complicated issue provides.

For one thing, the reviewer apparently does not realize that these "momentous" ideas are nothing new, but in essence only restate (with reference to some recent data) one side in an argument that goes back almost 100 years, before the IQ was even invented.



Obviously, to summarize the contents of the book is fine; to say that the reviewer liked it is fine, too.

But to claim that it is "balanced" and "unbiased" is something else again.

How does she know? Because the authors say so?

In that case, I have a bridge in Brooklyn to sell to her.

Fulfilling a dream

MARK LEFFINGWELL/Collegian

K-State art curator Jessica Reichman has the job of keeping track of the more than 1,500 art pieces in the K-State collection. Some of the pieces will be displayed in the new art museum.

Art collection requires special care

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

Every good museum's art collection needs someone to take care of it, to nurture and to expand it.

For almost 12 years, Jessica Reichman has patiently, quietly curated the Permanent Art Collection of Kansas State University.

The collection was stored in the old art building, before it was removed, but most of it has since moved to the KSU Foundation Building.

It is there, in a clinically clean, temperature-controlled room, that Reichman tends to, the John Steuart Currys, the Thomas Hart Bentons and the numerous other works that constitute the collection. Some of the works hang in campus buildings.

Of course, Reichman can't wait to get moved into the new Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"I have never seen the collection in one place, so I don't really know what it looks like," Reichman said.

Reichman has a dual master's degree in museum studies and art history from California State University, Fullerton. Before coming to K-State, she worked at the Louisiana Arts and Science Center in Baton Rouge, La.

Reichman's job is essentially to take care of the art collection.

"I catalog it, do research on the objects," she said. "I write catalog and label copy. I organize exhibitions, do public relations and take care of loans.

"My primary job is to promote the collection," she said.

Reichman describes the art collection as very eclectic.

"We have everything from east-Asian works to east-Indian works and American Regionalism to European works," she said.

There is a substantial amount of contemporary work, highlighted by Jasper Johns, Wayne Thiebaud and Robert Rauschenberg.

Reichman said she sees the core of the collection represented by the regionalism, which she would like to see expand.

"We very much want to influence and encourage young artists working in the Midwest today to think of us as a repository for their work and also to think of us as a place where they can display their works," she said.

In her eyes, a small museum is made successful by its staff.

"They are the ones that have to sell the collection," Reichman said, "and we have to not only make it exciting and interesting for people to come back on a regular basis, but we need to reinvent ways of looking at the collection and interpreting it.

"That's what makes a museum

Beach completes cluster of campus arts buildings run a national-based design competition for the project."

"The winning firm would win a cash prize and the contract," he said.

Carter has been at K-State for more than two years. When he arrived on campus, only the site and the funding were in place.

The site was chosen on the southeast corner of campus, down the walk from McCain Auditorium and the Vietnam Memorial. Carter said there have been other buildings on the site. It has not always been a green space.

Other sites, including one that called for the demolition of Memorial Stadium, were considered.

Construction of the museum has temporarily displaced some parking spots in the A lots, but after the Beach opens there will be more parking available in the area, Carter said.

The Beach completes a campus cluster of arts buildings, including McCain Auditorium, Danforth Chapel and Nichols Hall.

After the competition, in which about 20 firms participated, the contract was awarded to Moore/Andersson Architects, based in Austin, Texas. Moore/Andersson was both Britt and Reichman's first choice among the entries.

Moore/Andersson Architects was the firm of famed architect Charles Moore, who passed away in December 1993. Moore left a lasting impression on American, post-modern architecture with his unique perspective of historical style.

Although Moore did not design the Beach, he did influence some decisions made by the design team. Moore's role was mainly as a mentor for the design team.

"Reasonably, our art museum was the last project in which Charles had any major impact in the design," Carter said.

The competition design, carried out by Arthur Andersson, architect and University of Kansas graduate, who worked with Moore for 14 years, took six weeks to complete. After being awarded the contract, Andersson and his design team worked through 1993 on the Beach.

The design was inspired greatly by other campus architecture, particularly Thompson, Burt and Fairchild halls, but in a modern way.

There were two key milestones achieved by Andersson in the Beach design.

"The context of the building and the way a building should very specifically respond to the buildings around it in scale, materials and attitude," Andersson said.

The second milestone was placemaking. There is an agenda beyond the agenda of the building in that the building is a gateway to the campus, Andersson said.

The Beach appears largely influenced by Frank Lloyd Wright's prairie style of architecture made popular at the beginning of the century. The large, overhanging eaves, the clerestory and the basic box shape do lend themselves to this style, but Andersson said he wasn't intentionally influenced.

Andersson said the art work of the collection, particularly of Thomas Hart Benton and Grant Wood, was crucial in inspiring the design of the building.

A significant force in the building design is the public space, mainly the cafe and the commons, which joins the educational wing and the main galleries.

The cafe, which will serve light and trendy meals, will act as a meeting place to make the Museum user-friendly, Britt said.

A feature of the Beach is the educational wing, offering space for lectures, workshops, and receptions.

"I had really held firm for an educational wing," Wefald said.

"We got Crosby Kemper to give a gift so that we can now have the Kemper Educational Wing, and I'm really delighted about that," she said.

The exterior of the building, to the untrained eye, is very much a traditional-looking structure. There is no curve or free-form, but a more defined, square-cut line. Andersson said he chose to reveal its modernity through subtleness, not grand gestures.

Not to say there aren't gestures. The Beach does appear to have its "arms" (separate wings) open to welcome you. There are two entrances, one on the campus side and one on the side facing Aggieville, or the community side.

"The architect was very sensitive to make the Beach not only student-friendly, but user-friendly," Britt said.

The Beach will be extensively day-lighted thanks to the clerestory, but no direct light will hit the paintings. There will also be artificial light, such as spotlights, to highlight the art works.

Some contemporary features of the interior are the arches and quasi-barrel vaults used throughout.

"I feel the design we have for the museum is very sympathetic to the styles of architecture that are typical for this campus, for Manhattan, and the Flint Hills," Carter said.

"We have a building that has to be a very friendly building to

In lieu of diamonds, Beach gives art museum

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

To celebrate a 50th wedding anniversary, most people have a party, buy diamonds and new cars, or maybe take an exotic vacation.

Ross Beach gave his wife Marianna an art museum.

Beach, a native of Hays, gave a $3 million gift to K-State to establish and construct the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Marianna will now be immortalized on the campus where she began her career.

Marianna received a bachelor's degree in journalism and mass communications, graduating with honors and straight A's from K-State. Among her accomplishments in college are two beauty pageant awards and the job of gossip columnist for the Collegian.

Ross attended K-State and did most of his work in engineering. Ross and Marianna met at K-State, were engaged and finally married.

The Beaches have raised three daughters, all of whom attended the University of Kansas. They also have eight grandchildren.

Saturday, the Beaches sat down for an afternoon interview at their Hays home.

Nestled in the basement among zebra skins, an elephant's foot and various native African elements, the Beaches discussed their generosity.

"The main reason (for building the museum) was to do something for Marianna. Finding out the school needed something like that just fit into the program," Ross said.

Ross had never been personally approached to build the museum, but Ruth Ann Wefald's continuing publicity for the project caught his attention.

"Some people thought we were solicited or sold. That was not the case," Ross said. "We volunteered.

Ruth Ann, without any question, was the one who called it to my attention. Marianna had no idea of building a museum. So, for a 50th wedding anniversary, this is what I felt was the thing to do, which we announced, and Marianna was pretty excited about it," he said.

Marianna said she remembered exactly where they were when her husband told her about the museum.

"It was one morning, and he was shaving, and he said, 'You know what, I just thought of what I'll do for your anniversary. I'll give a certain amount of money to K-State for a museum,'" she said.

"I said, 'What?'"

Ross said, "She blubbered a little bit."

Marianna said she was ecstatic about architect Arthur Andersson's design.

"I'm thrilled with him and his design, and I have heard so many people say the same thing," she said.

Besides enriching the arts and educational facilities at KU, K-State and Fort Hays State University, the Beaches have enriched American life.

Marianna Beach served on the President's Committee on Mental Retardation from 1969 to 1975.

She also volunteered with the Organization of American States based in Montevideo, Uruguay, and served as president of the organization.

Although the Beaches travel extensively, they still call Kansas home.

"It's the best part of the world — Kansas — just don't tell people," Marianna said.

BRIEFS & NOTES

CATS flop at home

Disaster in the second half.

That's exactly what happened to K-State Saturday as the Cats lost to Missouri 77-60 at Bramlage Coliseum.

Mizzou started the game on a 15-5 run that was capped by a Sammie Haley dunk.

The Cats battled back, taking the lead on a Belvis Noland three-pointer. The Cats entered the locker room at halftime leading Mizzou 42-41 and shooting 50 percent on the floor.

In the second half, everything seemed to go wrong for the Cats.

The half started with a Mizzou 10-0 run, giving the Tigers a 51-42 lead until Tyrone Davis hit a 4-footer in the lane at the 16:03 mark.

Mizzou's rampage continued. The Tigers extended their lead to as much as 21 points.

Noland led the Cats, coming off the bench to score 24 points, including six three-pointers.

WOMEN snap streak

K-State snapped a five-game conference losing streak last weekend, defeating Iowa State 54-38 and Nebraska 53-50.

The wins moved K-State to 12-9, 4-5 and fifth place in the Big Eight.

"It feels good to win one at home," sophomore Missy Decker said.

"The way we won, that's what I'm really proud of," K-State coach Brian Agler said after the Iowa State game. "With Shanele not being healthy and all, if I had known that coming in, I'd have thought it would be a long night."

Decker led the Wildcats in scoring, nailing four of her seven attempts from three-point range on the way to a 16-point finish.

Nebraska pushed the Cats to the wire in a game full of mistakes. Both teams combined for 31 turnovers in the first half alone. But it was Mitchell's 17-footer with eight seconds left that put the Wildcats up for good. A traveling violation on the Huskers followed by Jacobson's free throw with 0.3 seconds remaining sealed the victory for the Cats.

TRACK star in NY

Gwen Wentland finished second at the Millrose Games last Friday with a leap of 6 feet, 2-1/4 inches.

Wentland was the only collegiate jumper to compete in the high jump at New York City's Madison Square Garden. However, entering the meet, Wentland owned the top mark.

"There were 16,000 people at the meet," Wentland said.

"I wasn't really intimidated because of traveling overseas last summer, and I've competed against a lot of these people before."

All but two of the top eight high jumpers were competing in the event, Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

MIND Power

Fields, a philosophy and ethnic studies major, is tearing through competition while maintaining a simple outlook on life

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

Bill Fields has many things on his mind.

Fields is a senior in philosophy and ethnic studies and a sprinter on the K-State track team.

"I consider myself a very thoughtful person," Fields said. "When I came to college, I felt that major fit my personality.

"I see people coming to college and selecting a major, and the major becomes their identity, but I saw myself in philosophy before I decided to study it."

FIELDS' VITALS

■ Attended Auburn right out of high school but later lost scholarship.
■ Moved to Kansas and enrolled at K-State in 1991.
■ Walked on track team in 1992
■ Placed in every meet participated in so far this season.

Despite Fields' thoughtful demeanor, he said he greatly appreciates simplicity. Perhaps that explains his attraction to the track.

ONE on ONE

"I really embrace simplicity," Fields said. "Simplicity really transcends my life in all ways.

"I think running is the purest form of competition there is. The coach can make you come to practice and run, but only you can make yourself compete."

Track is also an individual sport. Even though team totals are kept, Fields said he must keep to himself, or performance on the track will suffer.

"Alienation is what gets me going," Fields said. "I don't want to talk to anyone before I compete because it takes away from my performance. I don't even like to cheer for my teammates before I run because I'm not thinking about what I need to do."

Fields said some of his teammates don't understand him. The facts that he rarely cheers for his teammates during competition and that he likes to isolate himself may be a part of this.

"It matters not whether the people around me like me or not," Fields said. "All that really matters is respect. If they respect what I do and what I accomplish, that is all I really care about. I feel like when I compete that all personal feelings should be checked at the door.

"I know that I'm not a particular favorite of some of my mates, but that's not my goal either."

Training for running is also a very individual thing, he said. Fields said success totally depends on the individual.

Fields said someone can tell an athlete how much to run and when, but the athlete decides if it will be effective.

"The work ethic is something you create and something you have inside," Fields said. "Don't rely on someone else for what you have to do for yourself."

Fields learned this lesson the hard way when he left high school bound for Auburn University.

It was a story that was typical for the superstar freshman coming out of high school and going to a large university. Partying and relying on raw talent to take the place of hard work got Fields into trouble and out of a scholarship.

"I didn't train very hard in high school, but because of my talent, I could get away with it," Fields said. "It was the typical story of the big duck in a small pond moving up to the big time.

"It was a good opportunity, and I blew that, but luckily I got another chance here."

After his failure at Auburn, Fields decided to move to Kansas to live with his grandparents.

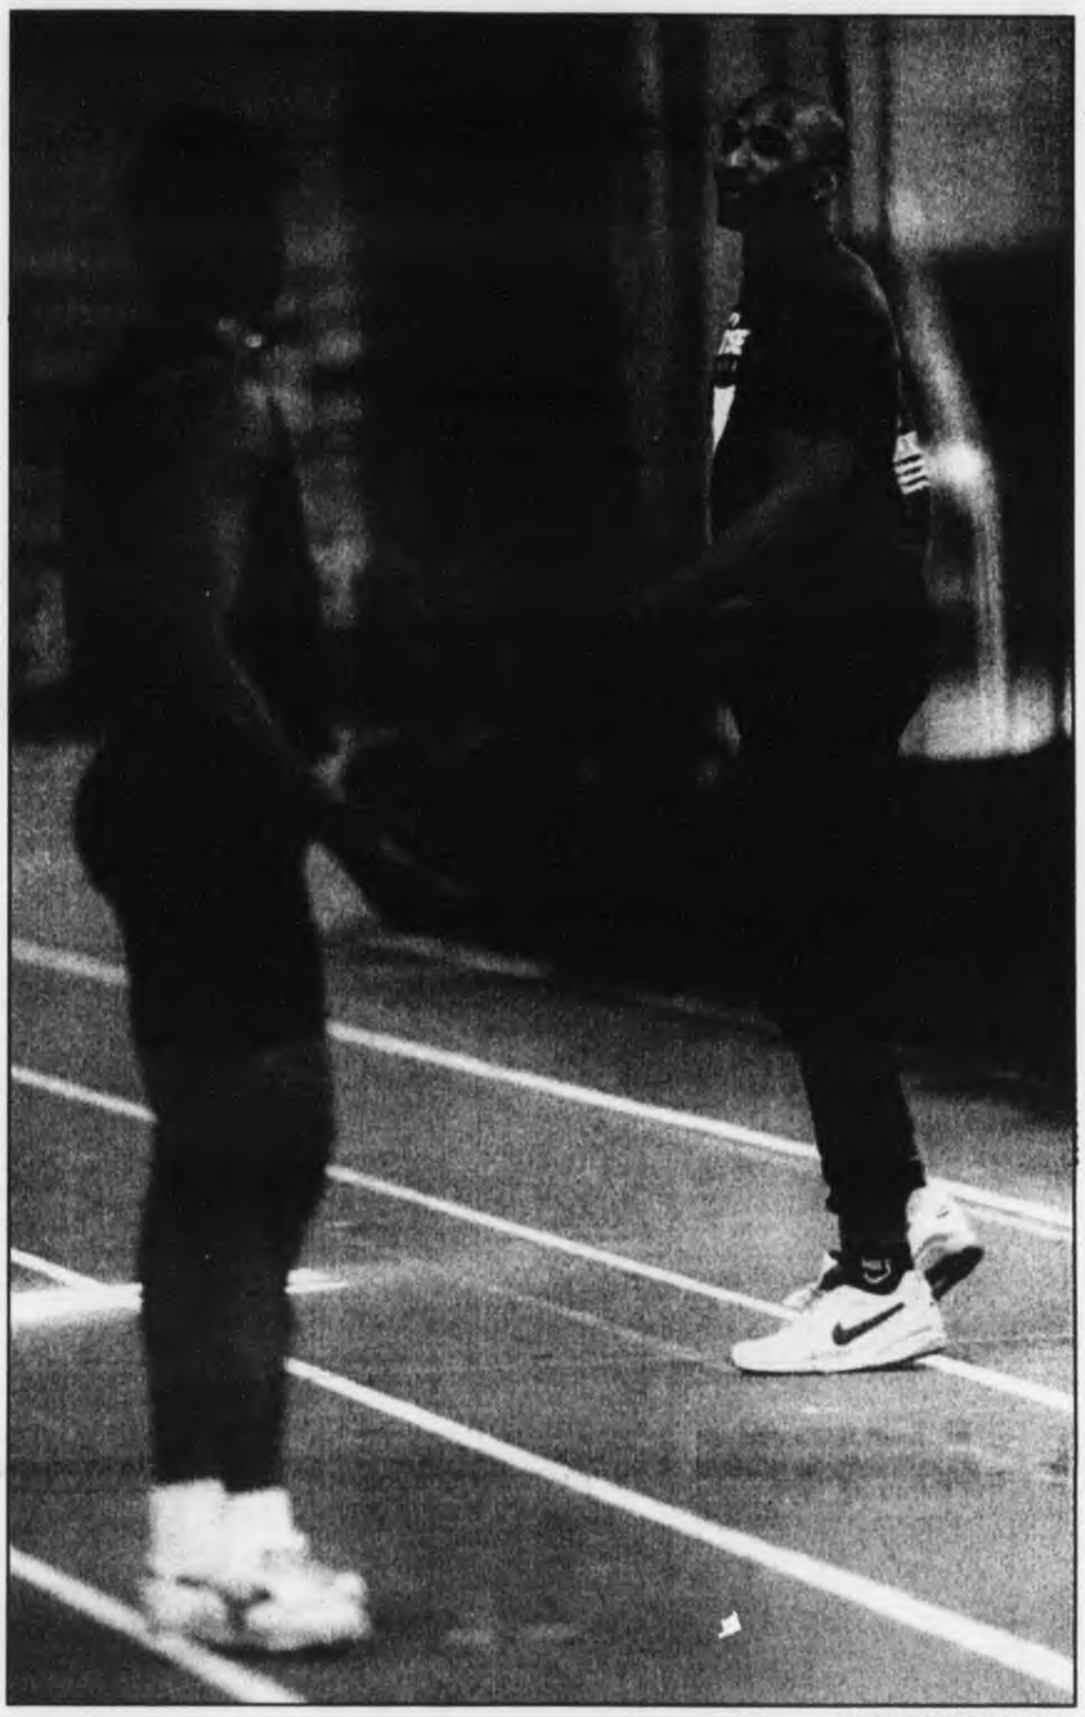
"I didn't even want to go to school or run anymore when I was living with them," Fields said. "My grandpa kept barking at me and telling me I wasn't going to run again, and I finally got sick of it."

Fields then enrolled at K-State, not intending to run. During that spring semester of 1991, Fields spoke to Steve Caprioti, K-State's track coach at the time, but he said he didn't take the meeting seriously.

Then, after some thought that summer, Fields decided to walk onto the team the next fall .

The next barrier for Fields was conditioning the muscles that had been lying dormant for more than a year.

"Most people don't know about the condition I was in," Fields said. "It really takes a long time to come back when you've been out that long."



As Fields got himself into better condition, his speed started to improve. Now hefinds himself in the 60-meter dash and the 200-meter dash this season.

"I ran some of the shorter distances in high school, but I thought that my event would be the 800 in college," Fields said. "Still, for some weird reason, I've always wanted to run the mile."

Fields has had success thus far in the indoor season. He has placed in the top three of every event he has entered this season and also anchors K-State's 1,600-meter relay team.

"I ride a fine line," Fields said. "Some of the things I say are grossly unacceptable, the way I run is grossly unacceptable, and the way I go about everyday life is grossly unacceptable.

"I don't care if people like me or not. All I can hope for is that people can respect me."

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

While warming up, Bill Fields stops to chat with a teammate. Fields has placed in the top three of every event he has entered so far this season. He also anchors K-State's 1,600-meter relay team.

▶ RECRUITING

Freshmen have high potential

Editor's note: This is a first part in a series of stories about K-State's 1995 recruiting class. This week's story deals with five of the Wildcats' top freshman recruits.

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

If first appearances can make a difference, then K-State has landed itself five freshman recruits that can have an effect right away.

■ The Cats' top high-school recruit is the fastest high-school sprinter in the country.

Issac Harvin, a 6-foot defensive back from Cape Coral High School in Fort Myers, Fla., ran the fastest time in the nation in the 100 and 200 meters last year. He also runs a 4.21 40-yard dash.

Along with his track accomplishments, Harvin was an all-state selection as a running back in Florida.

"He is the fastest in the country," Cape Coral coach James Hale said. "He's a great kid, and I believe that he has the raw talent to play on Sunday."

Harvin was also recruited by all the Florida universities, Clemson and Nebraska. But Hale said he only visited two schools — K-State and Nebraska.

"He fell in love with their defensive coach (Del Miller)," Hale said. "They really hit it off. He told me about midseason that he was going to K-State, and I said that he had to be kidding.

"His sister wanted him to visit Nebraska, so he did. He then visited K-State, and after that, he canceled everything with the other schools."

Hale said Harvin is the type of player that can be compared with the San Francisco 49ers' Deion Sanders.

"Deion Sanders played at our rival high school, and Issac has more speed than he did," Hale said.

"He's also bigger than Deion. I have no doubt that he can be as good as Deion. No doubt at all that he is the gem of their class."

■ A hole that K-State does have to fill with the departure of Big Eight Conference record-holder Chad May, is the quarterback position.

K-State does have Matt Miller returning, and the Wildcats picked up blue-chip junior-college transfer Cody Lee Smith. However, the Cats did land two top high-school prospects in Larry Holmes and Lamar Chapman.

Larry Holmes, a 6'3" signal-caller from Noland Catholic in Fort Worth, Texas, was recruited by Arkansas, Nebraska, Baylor and Oklahoma.

He was also ranked by the Dallas Morning News as one of Texas' top 100 players.

TOP FIVE FROSH

■ Issac Harvin, defensive back, 6-foot, 190 lbs., Fort Myers, Fla.
■ Larry Holmes, quarterback, 6-foot-3 inches, 205 lbs., Fort Worth, Texas.
■ Lamar Chapman, quarterback, 6-foot-2 inches, 165 lbs., Liberal.
■ Mark Simoneau, linebacker, 6-foot-1 inch, 220 lbs., Smith Center.
■ Martez Wesley, receiver, 5-foot-11 inches, 165 lbs., Kansas City.

"He's a team player," said Larry Holmes Sr., his father and assistant high-school coach.

"He's also an impact player that does what it takes to get things done."

Holmes said his son's decision came down to two areas — grades and the Cats' offensive scheme.

"He liked the coaches, the facilities and the campus," Holmes said. "I enjoyed talking with the coaches. They seemed more concerned with his grades before being an athlete.

"He likes to throw the ball, and so does K-State. He can just loft the ball up there and get the ball to their fast receivers."

He threw for 950 yards in 1994.

Cats prepared for road challenge

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

Revenge could be on the minds of the Oklahoma Sooners tonight.

On Jan. 25, K-State upset the 25th-ranked Sooners 87-77 at Bramlage Coliseum. Tonight the Cats travel to Norman, Okla., for the rematch that will tip off at 7 p.m. in the Lloyd Noble Center.

"They'll have the home crowd, the emotion and the revenge factor, so we need to go in and play hard and smart," K-State coach Tom Asbury said.

Even though the Cats beat the Sooners earlier in the year, Asbury said he knows the Sooners will be tough to beat on their own court.

"Oklahoma is very tough at home, and I know they are going to be very vindictive," Asbury said.

K-State has yet to win a conference game on the road. How tough is it to win on the Big Eight road? See page 8

Oklahoma has been a very tough 11-0 in Norman.

During the last game against the Cats, Big Eight scoring leader Ryan Minor was held to 18 points, which was points under his average.

More importantly, Minor shot a dreadful 6-for-15 from the field.

"Sometimes it's not necessarily your defense, it's just an off night on their part," Asbury said. "So call it what you want, we

Chapman was an all-state selection from Liberal High who led his team to three straight state championship games. Liberal won two of those state title games.

Chapman was recruited heavily by both K-State and Kansas. Last season, he ran for 1,160 yards and 25 touchdowns, and he passed for seven more scores.

■ The departure of two linebackers due to graduation and the fact that his brother played at K-State attracted Smith Center linebacker Mark Simoneau to the Cats.

"He always dreamed about playing at K-State," Smith Center coach Roger Barta said. "They offered to him really early, and he committed. His brother went there, and he wanted to follow him."

"Since he signed so early, some schools stayed away. He got letters from Nebraska, and they wanted him to be a fullback."

Although he rushed for more than 2,000 yards during his senior season, Simoneau is projected to fill K-State's middle-linebacker position, a position at which he recorded 92 tackles this season.

"I think that he will play middle linebacker, and he's physical enough for that position," Barta said.

"He's a hitter. He'll be ready to play physically right away. He might not be mentally ready to play right away. That's going to depend because a lot goes into being mentally prepared."

■ The Cats also improved their already deep receiving corps with the signing of Schlagle's Martez Wesley.

Wesley, a 5'9" receiver from Kansas City, was an all-metro selection last season.

"I'm excited to be there," Wesley said. "I think that I need to improve on my speed and positioning before I get there. This was only my first year at playing receiver."

Wesley fits the mold of the type of receiver in K-State's passing attack. That mold is that of a receiver small in size but not in stature.

K-State receivers have always been noted for their big-play capability, which Wesley showed the potential to have at Schlagle by carrying a 23.1-yard average per reception.

"I'm an explosive player," Wesley said, "Once I catch it, I like to go.

"I always wanted to play on turf. That always helps with your speed."

Another motivating factor in Wesley's decision was the Cats' national championship aspirations.

"I've always dreamed of playing for a national title," Wesley said. "I think that with the type of talent that they have coming back next year, that they have a great chance."

■ K-State coach Bill Snyder sang the praises of his recruiting class last week in a statement released to the media.

"We'd like to believe that we've improved our talent level with this class," Sndyer said.

"That remains to be seen, though."

Snyder also said was pleased with the different areas that the recruiting focused on.

"We've got a little bit of everything," he said. "Size, speed, toughness, talent, character and uncertainity."

Snyder said K-State wanted to recruit the Florida and Texas schools very highly.

"We held our own in Florida and Missouri, but we did not have the success in Texas or Oklahoma that we had hoped for.

"We were somewhat pleased with the improvement of state recruiting."

hope he has another off night."

Minor isn't K-State's only concern.

Asbury said Oklahoma has other players who can cause the Cats problems, like senior guard John Ontjes, who is second in the Big Eight in assists with 7.4 per game.

"Kelvin just loves Ontjes, and I do too," Asbury said. "He's a terrific player."

Oklahoma also has other players who can light up the scoreboard.

"This is a team that is very explosive. You bring a guy like Curry and Barnes off the bench who can really light you up in a hurry," Asbury said. "Prince Fowler didn't average 40 points in high school by using mirrors. We have to really play solid defensively."

Both Oklahoma and K-State are coming off tough Big Eight losses. Oklahoma lost to Nebraska 71-59, and K-State lost 77-60 to Mizzou.

Asbury said both teams need good outings during tonight's game.

"Both teams are needing to play well Wednesday night. Hopefully, that will happen on our part."

After playing in Norman, the Cats will travel to Boudler to face Colorado.

▶ BIG EIGHT ROUNDUP

Tigers talk of conference

TODD STEWART
Collegian

One team that has taken the Big Eight Conference by storm this season is the Missouri Tigers.

Despite losing four starters from last season's team that went 14-0 in the Big Eight, the Tigers are right back in the title hunt with a 5-2 conference record.

This puts the Tigers in a tie for second place with Kansas, who is at 6-2. Mizzou is also ranked No. 13 in this week's Associated Press poll.

A key to the Tigers' success is that Coach Norm Stewart's team has a 6-1 road record after a 77-60 victory against K-State in Manhattan on Saturday.

"I think our players are really coming together," Stewart said on Monday's Big Eight tele conference.

This Saturday, the Tigers will be host to Oklahoma State, who leaped into first place in the Big Eight with a 10-point victory against No. 2 Kansas in Stillwater.

■ At the midpoint of the Big Eight season for his team, Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton said that despite beating the Jayhawks, he thinks they are playing the most consistently in the conference.

"I wouldn't trade Jacque Vaughn for anyone in the country."

ROY WILLIAMS
Kansas basketball coach

"I really believe Kansas is playing day in and day out as well as anyone in the country," Sutton said.

The leader of the Jayhawk offense, sophomore point guard Jacque Vaughn, drew more praise from Sutton.

"I think they have the best point guard in the country in Jacque," he said.

Kansas coach Roy Williams echoed Sutton's praise of Vaughn.

"I wouldn't trade Jacque Vaughn for anyone in the country," Williams said.

"A unique young man is the best way to describe him. He's a leader on and off the court."

■ Up next for the Jayhawks are the Oklahoma Sooners, who will be host to K-State tonight in Norman.

Oklahoma forward Ryan Minor got even more praise than Vaughn on Monday's tele conference.

"He's the best offensive player I've coached," Oklahoma coach Kelvin Sampson said.

Williams said he liked Minor's versatility.

"He has the unique ability to score inside and outside," Williams said.

Sampson said Minor should continue to improve.

"He will get better and better because of willingness to learn," Sampson said.

Minor said an early-season meeting with Sampson made him realize that his defensive skills needed work.

"It really just woke me up," Minor said.

■ This season's Big Eight Tournament will be held on March 10-12 in Kansas City, Mo., at Kemper Arena. The tournament is reportedly already sold-out.

Big Eight road is a tough route to follow

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

Big Eight Conference arenas can be awfully lonely if you're not the home team.

With half of the Big Eight season over, road teams have won only eight out of 27 total conference games so far. This figures out to a 29-percent winning percentage on the road.

These statistics have led most coaches to believe that the Big Eight is the toughest conference to play on the road.

This includes Iowa State coach Tim Floyd.

His team is right in the middle of a road trip that includes games at Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri.

"We knew it was going to be tough in August," Floyd said.

Nebraska coach Danny Nee said there are no Big Eight arenas that aren't difficult to play in.

"I don't think there's an easy place to play," he said.

"The Big Eight is really too tough to win on the road."

Another fact that might help back up the coaches' beliefs is the teams that are No. 7 and No. 8 in the league have victories over the first- and third-place teams.

However, there is one team that has had success on the road so far this season. That team is Missouri, the defending Big Eight champion.

"Hopefully we'll go, continue to compete real hard and get a road win."

TOM ASBURY
K-State basketball coach

So far this season, Missouri is 3-1 in Big Eight road games. Along with the impressive road log, the Tigers are outscoring their opponents on the road by an average of 8.9 points.

The Tigers are also shooting 46 percent on the road — a statistic that Coach Norm Stewart said he really likes.

"I think our players are really coming together," Stewart said.

On the other side of the spectrum are K-State and Colorado, who haven't won a conference game on the road yet this season.

In fact, the Buffaloes haven't won a Big Eight road game since Feb. 16, 1991.

That gives the Buffs a 22-road Big Eight losing streak.

Despite the losing streak, CU coach Joe Harrington remains positive.

"It's a typical Big Eight year," Harrington said. "Any team can win anywhere."

K-State coach Tom Asbury doesn't have Harrington's dilemma, but the Wildcats do have two road games this week.

"Hopefully we'll go, continue to compete real hard and get a road win," Asbury said.

"You need wins right now if you're looking for the postseason. If you're positioning for the Big Eight Tournament, you're scratching and clawing to get anything you can."

Kuregian bows out of Rolex Nationals

TODD STEWART
Collegian

Sometimes being one of the best is just not good enough.

After advancing to the round of 16 at the Rolex National Indoor Championships in Dallas, K-State junior women's tennis player Karina Kuregian was somewhat disappointed at her second-round defeat.

"You're getting upset," Kuregian said after losing. "But it's good just to be there."

Kuregian

After a 6-2, 7-5 victory over Laura Nhavene of Tyler Junior College in the opening round, Kuregian was sent home by California's Jennifer Poulos 3-6, 6-3, 6-1.

Women's tennis coach Steve Bietau said Poulos' attacking style is what did Kuregian in.

Kuregian and the rest of the team leave this afternoon for a weekend triangular in Utah against Brigham Young, Weber State and Utah.

The one opponent this weekend that is getting most of Bietau's attention is BYU.

"BYU is potentially the best team in the region," he said.

"They are so strong and deep. They're the best team we've played by far."

Bietau expressed concern over the long road trip and altitude.

But before he and Kuregian left for Dallas he challenged the team members to prepare themselves for the triangular.

"I told them they had to do it themselves," Bietau said.

"In tennis, you must be independent."

Sophomore Karen Nicholson took Bietau's encouragement.

"We spent a lot of time on our own," Nicholson said.

ROAD TRIPS

■ The K-State women's tennis team will travel to Utah to face Brigham Young, Weber State and Utah.

■ After the match in Utah, the Cats will then the Cats will play host New Mexico at home.

■ However, the Cats will then hit the road again to face Drake and Northern Illinois in Des Moines, Iowa.

"I've had quite good practices."

Like Kuregian, Nicholson said she wanted to play her best tennis the rest of the way.

"I have just got to keep working," Nicholson said.

"The results will speak for themselves."

K-State will then host New Mexico at home and then travel to Des Moines, Iowa, to face Drake and Nothern Illinois.

Squads look to build off fall season

Women's team to build behind Wright's play

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

K-State's men's and women's golf teams saw signs of success in the fall season.

But they are looking for better things in the spring.

The highlight of the men's golf team in the fall season was the first-place finish in the D.A. Weibring Intercollegiate tournament in Bloomington, Ill.

"It was an 18-team tournament. Nebraska got second — we were 10 shots up after the first round and never lost that," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

"So that was pretty impressive, I thought,"

The reason for the team's success in the fall season was the playing of junior Troy Halterman.

He has finished in the top 15 in four of the five tournaments he has played in, including two straight first-place finishes in the D.A. Weibring tournament and the Texas-Arlington Invitational.

Halterman

"Troy had a great fall. Out of the five tournaments he played in, he had a chance to win two of them with nine holes to go, and two other tournaments he did win. Troy is also an academic all-Big Eight or all-American this year," Elliott said.

Coach Elliott decided to move his off-season workouts to the morning instead of the afternoon.

This switch will free up time in the afternoon for the team to play if the weather cooperates.

If the weather is bad, the team practices hitting balls and drills in the evening at the Brandeberry Complex.

The team is ready to get back in full swing for the spring season, which started yesterday with outdoor practices.

The first meet for the golf team is the Southwest Classic in Austin, Texas, on March 13-14.

"I think it's mentally a big tournament; we come out playing good. You look for the best in every tournament. We need to use it as a starting point and get ready for the rest of the season," Jason Losch, junior in construction science management, said.

The women's golf team struggled on the golf course in the fall season but not in academics for the first semester.

Out of 12 women, the team's average was a 3.2 GPA.

"They're real confident in the classroom," Elliott said.

"I guess the biggest thing they need to gain is confidence in their game."

The best finish for the women's team in the fall season was placing third in the Husker Golf Classic.

In the tournament, senior Donita Gleason tied for sixth place, and junior Staci Bush placed ninth.

The missing link in the women's golf team in the fall season was Jacque Wright.

She played in the first two tournaments but missed the last three because of eye problems.

Last year, Wright was the first alternate for the NCAA Women's Regional.

"She's back. That should be a big plus for the women's team," Elliott said.

The women's team started practices yesterday. The team's first tournament action will be the Lady Bronc Golf Classic in Harlingen, Texas, on March 20.

"I think we'll do really well in some good upcoming tournaments we are going to play in," Dallas Cox, senior in elementary education, said.

CAT LEADERS

- The K-State men's golf team will be led by Troy Halterman. He finished in the top 15 in four of five tournaments he played in.
- The women's leader will be Jacque Wright, who was an alternate for the NCAA Women's Regional last season.

▶ STATS SHOW HATCHER LEADS PACK

Midway through the Big Eight season, Elliot Hatcher has the best numbers of any newcomer.

Hatcher rankes second in field goal percentage, three-point field goal percentage, steals, and blocks. He ranks first amoung newcomers in scoring average with a 14.8 scoring average. These stats leave him ranked in the top 10 in five of the Big Eight's eight statistical categories amoung all players.

No other newcomers come close. OSU's Andre Owens ranks among the top 10 in three categories, while Kansas' Jerod Hasse ranks in the top 10 in only two categories.

Greek Stereotypes

Fraternity and sorority members face stereotypes brought on over time.

Like it or not, K-State fraternities are seen in a certain way by many students, and it's not always favorably.

The most popular image was of wild parties and lots of alcohol. That's not surprising if you think back a few years to movies like "Revenge of the Nerds."

Beer, women and winning were the most important things in those guys' lives. Even the nerds joined in.

Even though many fraternities in real life don't fit that image, it's no real wonder why people think they do.

Mike McRee, Interfraternity Council president and member of Sigma Nu fraternity, said negative images of fraternities are in a large part a result of ignorance.

"Initially, there are some stereotypes, but as people get to know people in the houses, they find out they're not so bad," he said.

People in the greek community work to dispel the stereotype of a bunch of guys that are drunk all the time, said McRee.

"My fraternity does a lot to give back to the community. We completed over 29,000 work hours in community service last semester," said McRee.

People think fraternities are one-dimensional, but that's just because they've only been exposed to one aspect of the system, he said.

Deborah Dickinson, senior in art therapy, said she didn't come to college with a preconcieved image about fraternities, but she has one now.

Dickinson said the first image of a fraternity member that comes to her mind is a skinny, white guy with a bowl-cut, baseball hat, fraternity sweatshirt turned inside-out and brown shoes.

"Stereotypically speaking, they act pretty cocky. Like everything is a big party," she said.

Leslie Eilers, senior in secondary education, said there is a stereotype that all fraternities are partying and very conformist.

"I have friends in fraternities, and they're not all like that, but the stereotype is still there," she said.

Steve Borgelt, freshman in arts & sciences and member of Delta Upsilon fraternity, said the same stereotype was believed and passed down in his family.

"My mom thought guys in fraternities were just a bunch of drunks," he said. "She wasn't very excited about me joining one, but she's OK with it now."

It's the individual in the fraternity that gives the whole house a bad image, said Darren Werth, sophomore in advertising.

"Not everyone is a snob, but it seems like a lot of them get in fraternities. They see themselves as being better than someone who lives independently," he said.

Mark Lofing, senior in animal science, said there are two types of fraternities. One type doesn't associate with anyone outside their money range, but the other type doesn't really care what kind of background you have — they look at who the person is and not what the person has, he said.

"If I would have been at K-State as a freshman, I probably would have tried joining a fraternity like Farmhouse or Alpha Gamma Rho," he said.

People think of wild parties when they think of fraternities, said Kenny Kalb, freshman in agriculture business and member of AGR fraternity.

"I used to think that when I was in high school. It's probably true in a few fraternities, but not in ours," he said. "AGR is one of the few social/professional fraternities left around here. We're encouraged to get involved in at least two clubs or organizations on campus, and most guys usually do," he said.

Kalb said he came to K-State and didn't know anyone.

"I got rushed by the rush chairman at AGR, and he proved to me that this is where I belong," he said.

Getting involved in the greek system is a good way to make friends for life and get a great experience out of life, McRee said.

McRee said he wants people to look at all aspects of a fraternity, and not just the particular one they choose to look at.

"A stereotype is just what its name implies — a preconcieved notion." People should remember everything they hear isn't the truth, he said.

Story by Jill Tegtmeier

A Saturday Night Live skit performed several years ago has stuck with members of the Delta Delta Delta sorority.

Three bouncing blonde sorority girls answer the phone with a valley-girl twang, "Delta, Delta, Delta. Can I help ya', help ya', help ya'?"

This image of rich but ditzy sorority girls was around before this skit and is still accepted by some people today.

Angie Markley, Tri-Delt member, said this particular portrayal haunted her sorority for at least a year.

Other TV portrayals help keep the stereotype alive, including the portrayal of sorority girls on "Beverly Hills, 90210," Markley said.

Greeks seem to recognize the characteristics that others associate with all sorority girls, even though they may not agree.

Dawn Crouch, member of Sigma Sigma Sigma, said some people think that sorority girls are snobby rich kids.

"People say that you can tell who is in a sorority and who is not," Crouch said. However, she said that most people don't know that she is in a sorority unless she tells them or is wearing a sorority shirt.

Crouch said she thinks that the stereotype of having wild parties is a minor problem for sorority houses. She said that hazing is more often associated with fraternities.

Some people outside sororities seem to accept the stereotypes, while others dismiss them.

Nancy Rinella, member of Gamma Phi Beta, said non-greeks may also think that sorority members never go to class or study.

"You could counter that argument with the high average GPA of the sororities," Rinella said.

What the sorority members think can be confirmed by some outsiders.

Angie Hunsucker, junior in animal science and industry, said she had several stereotypes of sorority members.

"I usually think of bouncy, blonde-haired perky girls as being in a sorority," Hunsucker said.

People outside greek life also tend to think that sorority members strictly associate only with people in their house, Hunsucker said. She has a suggestion on how to remedy this attitude.

She said that she knows around seven people in a fraternity, but only a couple of those people fit the mold of a stereotypical sorority girl.

"I think that those few people tend to carry on the stereotype," Hunsucker said.

Hunsucker said that she never considered joining a sorority herself.

"I am a pretty independent person," Hunsucker said. "I think another stereotype of sororities is that all of the members tend to become like the people they live with."

Michelle Fore, sophomore in economics and German, said she disagrees with the idea of a stereotypical sorority girl.

"I don't think there is a specific type of girl who joins a sorority," Fore said. "You are going to meet different types, and you just have to look at the person."

You will find people who fit the characteristics of a sorority girl in many different places, Fore said. "You are going to find people like that in a sorority, but you are also going to find them outside of a sorority."

Summi Gupta, public relations representative of Panhellenic Council, said she has never been asked about this generalized image of sorority girls by a prospective member. However, she does think that it prevents some girls from pledging to a sorority.

"I think it can hold some people back," she said. "It is a shame that one person's opinion could affect someone like that."

Amanda Yates, Gamma Phi member, said she was hesitant to go through rush.

"Once you are in rush, you realize they are the same people you are," Yates said.

Greeks and non-greeks have suggestions on how to combat these stereotypes. All of the suggestions involve interaction between sorority members and other students.

"If you meet people in the house, you wouldn't have those stereotypes," Crouch said.

As a non-greek, Hunsucker thought the best way for this to happen would be for non-greeks to attend sorority functions.

"Maybe when they have other activities, they can include others," Hunsucker said.

Kerry Moriarty, Tri-Delt member, said her sorority tried to accomplish this when they chose the Delta Palooza concert as their philanthropy. This allowed all students to participate and enjoy themselves.

Nikki Wilson, a Gamma Phi, said this approach has worked in her case.

"All of my friends from high school thought that I wouldn't talk to them because I was in a sorority," Wilson said. "But I have proved them wrong."

'Lubbock' mixes country and Texas flare

Terry Allen
"Lubbock (on everything)"
Elektra Records

Ratings:
* Sell plasma
 Check it out
 Think twice
* Giggle at it in bargain bins

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

Look out America — Terry Allen's trying to take over again.

Sugar Hill Records has released Allen's 1979 album, "Lubbock (on everything)," for the first time on compact disc and cassette. The album, initially released on a limited-run label, is a mixture of traditional country and a little southern-Texas rock.

If country and the traditional sound aren't for you, stop now. Most of the 20 tracks on this album have a definite twang and a southern edge to them, stopping only to throw in some southern-rock sounds here and there.

The first track, "Amarillo Highway," is considered to be one of his most famous works, having been covered by Robert Earl Keen and Bobby Bare.

I'm not impressed. From the opening lyrics to the end of the song, the music rhymes each line.

That repetition gets old in a big hurry when it's driven by a twang in Allen's voice. Not all the songs are rhymed and traditional. "The Wolfman of Del Rio" has less twang with more humorous lyrics.

Young love in Texas is taken in a more realistic approach and is the theme behind this song. It is definitely one of the better tracks, though that wouldn't take much.

Allen has some longer songs on his album, but they tend to drag on. A hit Allen wrote for the group Little Feat's, "New Delhi Freight Train" plays for 7-1/2 minutes of eternity. With enough lyrics for a four-minute song, "New Delhi Freight Train" drags on, forcing the listener to sit through repeated lyrics and musical accompaniment. This is definitely a track worth listening to for a couple of minutes and then skipping right over the rest.

One of the nice features of Allen's writing is that about half of the tracks on the album average three minutes in length. That is enough time to enjoy the music and move on. No unnecessary repetitions or riffs are present.

Allen writes about a person tired of himself and everyday life just turning around and walking away from it. Going nowhere fancy and not in a hurry to get there, just going. I like it.

"Lubbock (on everything)" is definitely not for everyone. As a matter of fact, it may not be right for very many people. The sounds are more of interest to someone who likes traditional country with a little southern rock thrown in as an afterthought.

Oil obsession rubs reader wrong

Dear Cassie,

My roommate has this obsession with soft skin. After showering, she applies baby oil to her entire body and then proceeds to lie naked on her bed for at least half an hour until the baby oil dries.

I find this disturbing to wake up to each morning, especially if my boyfriend spends the night and has to wake up to the X-rated sight as well.

Signed, Viewer Discretion Advised

Dear Viewer Discretion Advised,

Speak to her directly about it. If you don't want your boyfriend to see it, you shouldn't invite him to spend the night in your room with your roommate there. She pays to live there. He doesn't.

Reno entertains with liberal views

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

There's Reno, Nev. — the city of hookers, slots, addicts and neon.

And then there's Reno, the comedian/performance artist/woman of the '90's.

If Reno, Nev., is the biggest little city in the world, then last night's audience at McCain Auditorium was the biggest little crowd in the world.

The numbers turning out for Reno and her little sidekick dog, or "daughter," Lucy, were small. Numbers didn't matter, though, as the lucky few in attendance responded with great big laughs of approval.

Reno touched on sexuality many times during the course of the evening.

Differences between the sexes, particularly why New York men grab their crotches when they feel especially expressive and why women can't grab their breasts and do the same, are always revealing.

The best moments of the evening were perhaps the most simple — chiefly, when Reno would act out graphic little sexual gestures. (We are human, after all.)

Of course, then she did an extensive piece on the disadvantages of the clitoris — not exactly Manhattan coffee talk.

However, Reno's sense of humor runs much deeper than the simplicity of usual road comics (and Reno is not a typical UPC road comic).

Her political savvy was marvelous. I could definitely tell by the extreme, writhing pain she experienced by saying the name Newt Gingrich that she leaned toward the left of the political spectrum.

We need more liberal voices, though. We have enough Rush Limbaughs to last the century, but we don't have opposing views being represented. Reno fills that gap.

Reno discusses interesting things, like whatever happened to the word "choice," as in pro-choice. She said it has been misconstrued and contorted with modern usage, and someday we will get that word back.

It is interesting to note that comedians are typically liberal and Democrat.

You won't see Roseanne talking about the benefits of orphanages.

But with all the left-wing voices being comics, people aren't readily accepting of their viewpoints — basically because they can't take them seriously. I mean, hey, they are comedians.

MARK LEFFINGWELL/Collegian

Comedian Reno tickled the funny bone of a McCain Auditorium audience with graphic gestures, sexual innuendoes and her political savvy during her Tuesday night performance.

Reno has enjoyed a fine career thus far. Her HBO comedy special "Reno in Rage and Rehab" was nominated for a Cable Ace Award.

She has also performed in Tony Kushner's play "A Bright Room Called Day," performed the voice of Edith Anne's therapist in Lily Tomlin's celebrated cartoon "Edith Anne" and has recently signed with CBS to work on the new sitcom called "Hollywood and Division."

Reno is truly an up-and-comer. I'm sure she'll butt out on the scene like many other comedians of her generation — although she seems to like being underground.

Just this week, HBO agreed to develop a short film for Reno about finding her biological mother. (She was adopted.)

Reno said she is developing a new long-running comedy show that she hopes will take her to Broadway.

Reno's brand of comedy is cutting-edge — something Manhattan isn't readily privy to.

Humbly, Reno said she got into comedy because she wasn't good at anything else.

To use her word, she didn't have a choice — she was born for it.

Cellist educates, dazzles audience

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER
Collegian

A K-State faculty member presented a cello performance that was challenging to both the performer and audience.

David Littrell, director of K-State orchestras, presented a cello recital Tuesday night in All Faiths Chapel Auditorium.

The program began with a divertimento in three movements by Joseph Haydn. The piece catalog number or even a key (it sounded like D major), opened with an adagio. The sustained passages sang with Littrell's free vibrato.

The divertimento's adagio and light, staccato and elegant minuet lacked the emotional restraint that so typifies Haydn.

The Haydn concluded with a challenging movement marked allegro di molto that exhibited Littrell's dexterity with fast alternating bowing and linear runs.

Although the balance between the accompaniment and the soloist was sometimes uneven, and his intonation on the runs was at times a little off, Littrell brought his first piece of the evening to a strong finish.

The night only got better.

Littrell's second choice of literature was Frederic Chopin's Sonata in G minor, Opus 65. It takes a very courageous and confident soloist to choose a Chopin piece because he risks being upstaged by his own accompanist.

This confidence worked instead to exalt him. Littrell, who seemed right at home in the Chopin, handled the opening allegro moderato with the ease of a diehard Romanticist.

Littrell didn't shy away from the theatrical all night. This was true of the scherzo movement as he brought to the music the fire that Chopin requires.

The ethereal dynamics of the third largo movement, with Littrell's gentle bowing technique, was answered with the nice dialogue and triumphant ending of the sonata's finale.

After intermission, Littrell rose to the challenge of a Sonata in C, Opus 65, by Benjamin Britten. Many American audiences don't fully appreciate the music of this century. This attitude didn't prevent Littrell from challenging them anyway.

The opening movement alternated between frantic and controlled emotions. Littrell ended it with an arpeggiated dominant chord that was nothing but enchanting.

Classical guitarists would have been jealous of Littrell's pizzicato technique in the second movement. The quick motif in its exposition gave way to a dazzling display of left- and right-hand fingering dexterity that Britten prudently concluded before it became campy.

The third movement, an elegy, was where both Littrell and his instrument seemed once again in their element.

Britten's profound post-modern sorrow emanated from Littrell's bow in a movement that was disturbing and beautiful.

The last two movements of the Britten were quite a challenge for audience and performer. Triplet chords, sidebowing, and startling glissandos with the piano stirred the audience's understanding the status quo.

If for no other reason, Littrell should be commended for educating his audience in this fashion.

The Britten concluded with a study in contrasts of smooth scales, staccato chords (both arco and pizzicato) and tremolo. A harp-like run in the accompaniment brought this piece to a close.

Littrell wrapped up the evening with a capricious Tarantella, Opus 33, by David Hopper. This variation on themes was enjoyable to listen to as well as watch Littrell bring it to life.

Littrell has a grasp on the cello that goes beyond mere notes and technique. His interpretation, while sometimes a little liberal, is a joy to see brought to an appreciative audience.

Accompanying Littrell at the piano was William Wingfield, instructor of music.

Wingfield played the deceptively difficult role of accompanist with apparent ease.

He never upstaged Littrell, even when the music would have pushed a lesser musician to do so. A recital is never better than its accompanist.

The recital was presented as part of the Department of Music Faculty Artist Series 1994-95 season.

the chance to travel to Emporia."

There is another memorial at 7 tonight in Emporia, Stewart's home.

The memorial started with everyone singing "Amazing Grace." Father Keith Weber then read an opening prayer and scripture from John 14:1-7.

Some of Stewart's close friends shared letters they had written to her after hearing the news.

Other memories were shared through reflections, which were read by Amy Vaughan, junior in marketing and advertising, and Ann Arnold, junior in chemical science.

"Girls in the house had the chance to write down their feelings concerning Stewart, their relationship with Stewart or any memory they have of Stewart," Vaughan said.

Reflections were followed by the song "You've Got a Friend," by James Taylor and then a closing prayer.

Weber also read the Irish Blessing, which was Stewart's favorite.

The women of ADPi stood and sang "Pass It On," an ADPi song, with arms around each other or hands clasped as a sign of support.

The ADPis and friends also showed their support of Stewart by dressing up on campus Tuesday and Wednesday and wearing a small yellow ribbon.

"We wanted to do something on campus to let people be aware and in memory of Heather," said Weis, who was Stewart's roommate last semester. "Yellow is a sign for friendship."

Design has room to grow

"We have a building that has to be a very friendly building to the public at large, and we have to have a building that is very sympathetic to the academic needs and purposes of this campus," he said.

It may be as simple as Manhattan isn't ready for a contemporary structure.

"I don't think an avant garde building would be readily accepted in this community — which is a shame to some extent," Carter said.

"I'll be the first to admit that there were a number of members of the faculty that really did feel we should have taken a greater chance and brought on some of those other designs.

"Maybe when the building is done we'll look back and say they're right. Right now, I'm happy with the building we've got," Carter said.

Britt said some architecture faculty supported another architect, but as the user of the building, Britt said he felt Moore/Andersson designed a building that fit the campus much more than the other designs.

Carter said he thought the Beach design had a very good chance of winning state and regional design awards. Moore/Andersson has extensive design credentials which certainly added to their being chosen, Carter said.

The firm has recently worked on the 100,000-square-foot Washington History Museum in Tacoma, Washington. The firm also designed the Museum of Art in Cedar Rapids, Mich.

There were five people from Moore/Andersson involved in the design of the Beach. The three core members were Andersson, Steven Dvorak, project designer, and Susan Benz, project manager.

Reeves Wiedeman, of Wiedeman Architects of Kansas City, created the construction documents used by the contractor. The construction firm of Martin K. Eby, a K-State graduate, based in Wichita, is building the Beach.

The most expensive aspects of construction are the piers needed to support the foundation.

The piers are needed for support because the bedrock is located some 60 feet below the surface, Carter said.

Another factor is the University-wide problem of widespread, underground rivers, causing the ground to be unstable for common slabs on spread footings.

Carter said the biggest advantage with the Beach is that it is a private project, as opposed to a government project. This means he can negotiate with the contractor for lower costs. After the Beach is opened, it will become a state-owned building.

The Beach is expandable. Britt said Andersson has proposed an expansion, so the theme of the primary design can be sustained.

"In any building that is built, the day after the building opens you say, 'I wish I had some more space,'" he said.

Britt said students can expect employment at the Beach.

"We are projecting that five, full-time staff will each have a work-study student assigned to them," Britt said.

The Beach will not charge admission, but some special programs may require an admissions cost.

The exhibit schedule is pretty much mapped out for the next three years. Next year at this time, Britt said they will have a five-year plan.

The planned inaugural exhibit is "The Collective Spirit: American Art From Selected Collections." It highlights the finer works of the K-State collection and compares them with similar works borrowed from other museums.

"I firmly believe that the Beach Art Museum will be a very vital cultural institution for the state of Kansas," Britt said.

The Beach is one month behind in the construction phase, but one more month isn't too long for the people who have worked for this museum over the decades.

"We've been here 8-1/2 years. I dreamed this dream almost from the day I came. That's a long way to wait for a dream," Ruth Ann Wefald said.

Crown educates public opening even though its doors are open for business.

On the Monday after Thanksgiving, Crown Decorating opened the doors at its new location with the positive change of a new showroom that has more room and everything in view.

"It is a lot more open, and things are easier to see," Doherty said.

Crown Decorating had a small-business feeling at the old place, and the feeling is part of the new store as well, she said.

The openness of the new store provides convenience for customers.

Crown Decorating has also added tables and chairs to allow consultants to work with customers.

"We want to educate the public about decorating, not just sell," Doherty said.

Crown Decorating sponsors classes about remodeling for the general public.

The next class will be sponsored through UFM but taught at the store. It will be at 6:30 p.m. on Feb. 23. It is a wallpaper seminar in which participants will hang wallpaper, Doherty said.

The charge of the class is $5. Crown Decorating is offering a $5 coupon to cut the cost.

The larger store and better facilities make it possible for the store to offer more chances to educate people, Doherty said.

The official grand opening for Crown Decorating is February 20-25.

Senate approves 4 campus allocations

UFM may not be able to continue if the money is denied by both Senate and the administration, because the chances for finding other sources of funding are not great, Teener said.

"I want to see UFM continue. We just don't believe the bulk of this should be on the students," Carney said.

Although debate about funding of UFM salaries was the main issue for the first of Senate's allocation meetings, money for Circle K International, Young Democrats, Alpha Phi Omega and Native American Student Body were agreed upon by Senate.

Allocation recommendations for the other groups were passed with only a few questions asked about funding for advertising costs.

Jason Mitchell, engineering senator, said Senate agreed to give money for advertising only for speakers and honorariums, not membership drives.

Senate approved the following allocations:

- Circle K International will not be allotted any money for its International Convention.
- Two projects proposed by the Young Democrats will receive $697.
- Alpha Phi Omega will be given $14 to fund one project.
- The Native American Student Body will receive $1,397 to fund two guest speakers in the fall.

The next allocation meeting will be 6 p.m. Thursday in the Union Big 8 Room.

Museum offers outlet for artists active and alive — the relevance it has for its audience."

Reichman has many ideas concerning how to make the Beach a more student-friendly institution.

"One of the ways in which we want to encourage students to attend is that we would have special opening exhibitions just for students at a time of day when it is more convenient for students to come," she said.

Reichman said it is important to get students to feel that this is their museum and that they have ownership of it.

"I don't think we would be able to compete with the bars in Aggieville or maybe even the movies on a Friday night in the Union," Reichman said. "That's not our purpose.

"If we had regularly rotating exhibitions, we would hope that once a student visits the museum once that they would be enticed enough to come back and see in three months a new exhibit or work of art," she said.

Reichman said she has always wanted to work on a project like K-State's new museum.

"To see this project through and to work on it like this is really a culmination of a dream come true. It could possibly be the highlight of my career."

What do you do when the water's not safe to drink?

Leonardville water exceeds legal nitrate limits 13 times in 4 years; alternatives being researched

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Nitrates are forcing Leonardville, a town in central Riley County, to look for a new water source.

Nitrate levels in the current supply have exceeded the legal limit, said Greg Crawford, director of public information for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

There are a number of potential reasons why the water has a high nitrate concentration, Crawford said. The most common reasons are fertilizers and conditions in nature.

According to a release from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, monitoring records for Leonardville show the city water supply exceeded the legal limit of 10 nitrate milligrams per liter 13 times in four years.

To comply with the order from the state, Leonardville has to provide an alternate source of water to pregnant women and customers with children younger than 6 months.

"The main health concern is blue baby syndrome," said Ray Lamond, professor and extension specialist in soil fertility.

Lamond said the big concern is for infants younger than six months and nursing infants whose mothers are drinking the contaminated water.

Babies 6 months and younger have a bacteria in their digestive systems that change nitrate to nitrite, he said. Nitrite is absorbed into the blood and combines with the hemoglobin, producing methemoglobin. Methemoglobin can't carry oxygen.

"It is essentially like choking to death," Lamond said.

When infants reach the age of 6 months, the bacteria stop functioning that way, he said. In older children and adults, nitrate is usually excreted in urine, Lamond said.

Although nitrates are most dangerous for children younger than 6 months, little is known about the long-term effects of exposure on adults and older children, Lamond said.

The city has to submit an engineering report by Sept. 1 outlining how it will comply with the nitrate maximum contaminant level of 10 MCL. Quarterly reports are due in April 1995 and July 1995.

The city's water source comes from groundwater.

"What we really want to do is drill another well," William Johnson, Leonardville mayor, said.

The estimated cost of four to six test wells is $10,000 to $15,000, Johnson said. That figure does not include piping or production. In addition to the cost of drilling the four to six wells, Leonardville will have to employ a geologist hydrologist for the project, he said.

Johnson said if the wells prove to

Minimal contamination found locally; KDHE will monitor contamination site

Traces of contamination found in the area of Third and Osage streets has prompted action by the city of Manhattan.

The City is working on the project and has completed Phase I of the Comprehensive Investigation Corrective Action Study (CI/CAS), Jerry Petty, director of community development, said.

Phase I involved collecting water and soil samples, performing lab analyses of the samples and compiling a report of the sample results, Petty said.

"We took dozens of samples, and more than one showed a trace of contamination, but most of the research showed none at all," Petty said.

Petty said the amount of contamination found was very minimal, but the report got the attention of the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

"We're ready to begin Phase II, and we hope it will be the final phase necessary for the project," he said.

Phase II involves taking the results and completing the CI/CAS project by drilling three more wells and establishing a monitoring program, he said.

"The KDHE wants to do a monitoring system to make sure the contamination in the area doesn't move and show back up," Petty said.

Discovery of the contamination occurred through a routine analysis of property in the area. Steel and Pipe Supply Co. was considering selling some property. An environmental audit was required before the land could be sold, and this is when the contamination was found.

Petty said a specific source of the contaminate was never identified, but some of the initial possibilities were area gas stations, laundromats or businesses such as Steel and Pipe Supply Co.

"Later tests showed traces of a contaminate that typically comes from a cleaning solvent," Petty said.

"Later we took samples, and when they were analyzed in a controlled lab

Senate to debate office budget

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Student Senate allocations are facing some tough battles.

Mark Tomb, arts and sciences senator, said he was concerned that Senate was allocating too much money for its operating costs.

"The finance committee cut a lot of things, but I don't think they went far enough," Tomb said.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said he had seen a marked increase in spending on office expenses since he came to K-State three years ago. He said he thought the Finance Committee had done a fair job of cutting the budget before presenting it to Senate.

The budget request was for $153,189, but the Allocations Committee pared the budget down to $143,058, Tomb said.

"We have to sit down and analyze our budget," he said. "When we take more money for ourselves, there's less money for student groups."

Tomb said student groups should be angry if the budget passes as it stands.

"If students on this campus knew what we were doing, they'd either stop us or egg us on," LeDoux said.

LeDoux said the budget recommendation has increased $22,000 over the budget allocated last year.

"There is no way that my constituents have seen an increase in services with that increase," LeDoux said.

Salaries make up more than $90,000 of the budget, Tomb said. The salaries seemed to be really high in comparison with the rest of the budget, he said.

Council, SGA elections to merge

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

K-State college councils have been offered the opportunity to join Student Governing Association in the elections process.

"It will run exactly like the Student Senate elections. They will have to follow the same regulations and spending limits," Chad Schneiter, chairman of the Senate Elections Committee, said.

SGA will be responsible for managing voting stations and counting ballots of the colleges that participate. The colleges are responsible for paying for the SCANTRON forms and copying of the ballots.

After the elections, the colleges will be allowed to choose their own presidents and other executive positions if they want to, Schneiter said.

The Arts and Sciences Council is the only college that has agreed to allow Senate to conduct its elections.

"We thought SGA would do a good job of it. It's really easy and more mainstream," Scott Rottinghaus, president of Arts and Sciences Council, said.

Rottinghaus said having the Arts and Sciences Council's elections as part of SGA's will save the council quite a bit.

"It'll save us money in printing ballots and time in trying to find people to sit at tables for two days," Rottinghaus said.

Student voters will also benefit from the merger.

"It makes it easier for the voter. They don't have to go to two different locations to vote," Rottinghaus said.

Bluemont Bell making a move; Mid Campus Drive to close

HEATHER BALLEW
Collegian

Mid-Campus Drive will be closed today from Anderson Hall to Holton Hall in order move the 134-year-old Bluemont Bell from its home in the Anderson Hall Tower.

The road will be closed from 8 a.m. to noon as well as the sidewalk directly in front of Anderson, said Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect. He said students who normally walk in front of Anderson will need to walk through the building or behind it.

Carter said Mid Campus Drive and the sidewalk are being closed to ensure safety during the bell moving.

"I want to be able to be safe," Carter said.

The east door of Anderson will also be closed during the move, but the north and south doors will remain open.

Carter said the bell is on the floor of the Anderson tower where the louvered windows are. The slats on the window through which the bell will be removed have already been taken down, and the supports for the bell have also been removed.

"That window was probably the one they used to put the bell in there," Carter said. "To accomplish this, the carillon will be temporarily out of service."

Carter said Coonrod and Associates, the general contractors conducting the move, will extend a crane through the window, lift the bell off of the floor and pull it out of the window. The bell will then be taken to Lakin's Antique Metal Polishing Shop to be cleaned and restored, Carter said.

Carter said that a specific location has not been selected as the bell's new home. But, because of the bell's name, he thinks it would be appropriate to relocate it somewhere between Bluemont, Dickens and Holton halls.

Carter said he hopes to have the bell cleaned and in its new place by spring commencement.

The 513-pound bell was given to K-State in 1861 by Joseph Ingalls. The bell cost $175, and shipping of the bell by wagon and train from Maine cost $75. An inscription on the side of the bell reads, "Gift to Bluemont College by Joseph Ingalls, 1861."

Pat Patton, assistant to the K-State archivist, said the bell was moved to Anderson tower in 1882 and was used to call students to classes. She said the bell could be heard up to six miles away when it was rung.

▶ K-STATE TAKES TOP HONORS IN ANNUAL MEATS JUDGING CONTEST

The meats judging team won again last weekend at the Southwestern Meats Judging contest in Fort Worth, Texas.

"For the second year in a row, K-State won the contest," said John Unruh, associate professor in animal science and industry and meats team coach.

Spencer Schrader, sophomore in animal science and industry, placed first in the contest.

"Schrader had one of the all-time high scores in grading," Unruh said.

Schrader scored a record-breaking 274 out of 300 points. He also had a score of 136 out of 150 on beef-yield grading.

"I was excited when I was announced as winning," Schrader said. "I have judged livestock before, but this is my first year to be associated with meats."

K-State had four of the top eight scores in beef grading and four of the top eight scores in total beef. As a team, K-State won the beef grading and total beef divisions.

"We won the contest in grading," Unruh said.

Seven teams with 61 contestants competed.

As a team, K-State also placed third in pork judging, fourth in specifications, fourth in beef judging and fifth in lamb judging.

Individually, Kristi Oleen, sophomore in animal science and industry, placed fifth overall, and Brice Guttery, sophomore in animal science and industry, placed eighth in the alternates contest.

Team members were Brooke Harrison, sophomore in animal science and industry; Karen Killinger, sophomore in food science and industry; Oleen and Schrader.

Shawna Hollinger, sophomore in animal science and industry, Ann Waylan, sophomore in animal science and industry, and Guttery competed in the alternates division.

Unruh said there will be one more contest in Houston before the season ends.

"I am extremely proud of their performance and how they represented K-State," he said.

Schrader said he is going to treat the Houston competition as he would any other.

"It'll be a new day," he said. "I can't think about the past because anything can happen."

Houston will also be the last competition of the semester for the livestock judging team.

Individually, Jenny Barker, junior in animal science and industry, placed fourth in the swine division.

▶ DEMOCRATS DEFEND SOCIAL SECURITY IN BUDGET BATTLE WITH GOP

CAPITOL HILL (AP) — If there's going to be a balanced-budget amendment, Democrats want to guarantee Social Security won't suffer as a result.

That's the new focus as senators wrangle over a constitutional amendment to require a balanced federal budget.

Republicans voted largely along party lines today to defeat a so-called right-to-know measure. This would have forced Republicans to spell out what they would cut if the balanced-budget amendment becomes reality. GOP lawmakers called it a ploy to kill the bill.

Republicans expect a tougher time defeating the Social Security protection measure. They insist they'll leave those benefits untouched.

Many GOP lawmakers worry about a backlash from older Americans if they vote against making Social Security protection part of the proposed amendment.

▶ GINGRICH SAYS HE WANTS TO GET TOUGHER ON IRAN'S ISLAMIC REGIME

WASHINGTON, D.C. (AP) — House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., isn't saying how it might be done, but he's suggesting the United States should force the replacement of Iran's Islamic regime.

Gingrich told a conference of military and intelligence officers such a strategy is the only one that makes any sense for fighting Islamic totalitarianism.

Gingrich didn't spell out whether replacing the Iranian leadership would involve full-scale military operation, covert activities or some other method.

Current U.S. policy is to use economic and political pressure to get Iran to conform with international norms.

Among the key concerns listed by the United States are Iranian support for terrorist activity, opposition to the Mideast peace process and attempts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Ensemble goes to contest

High-school musicians polished their saxophones, trumpets and tubas to prepare a concert for a crowd of about 150 people Wednesday night at McCain Auditorium.

Manhattan High School's Symphonic Wind Ensemble was one of three school bands chosen out of 150 by the Kansas Musical Educator's Association committee to play in the KMEA's conference in Wichita Feb. 25.

After spending two hours working in a K-State faculty clinic session, the ensemble played to work through their final jitters before they go to KMEA, said Jim Strain, assistant director of the K-State band.

The ensemble was directed by Rod Manges and assistant directors Joel Gittle and Maureen Van Vechten.

"It's refreshing to work with students like these," Manges said. "They put in a lot of extra hours, and statistically these students are the upper 26 percent of every graduating class across the country.

"The KMEA is our Super Bowl, or as we like to call it our Orange Bowl, because we finally get to taste the fruit," he said.

Opening for the ensemble were three saxophone players and three flutists.

One of the flute trio, Laura Duncan, a freshman in music education, had a more personal connection to the group.

"My sister will be playing clarinet tonight, and my brother will play trumpet," Duncan said. "I'm so proud and excited for them. They've gotten so good to make it to the KMEA festival."

Of the 72 members of the band, a fraction of them were participants in the State Instrumental Honor Group and the District III Honor Band.

Some of their pieces included "Sussex Mummer's Christmas Carol," by Percy Grainger, and "Bist Du Bei Mir," by J.S. Bach.

Tuba players Travis Tyson, Steve Kellett, Jeff Lang and Richard Matteson said they believe their strength is what they call the pyramid sound.

"It's a lot of bass on the bottom and less and less as it goes to the lighter, higher pitches," Matteson said.

Everyone exerted a great respect and admiration for the willingness to work hard and to balance practice with all the other demands of school, extracurricular activities and in some cases, work, he said.

The majority of the audience was made up of proud families, including Paula Tyson, whose son, Travis plays for the band.

"This is fabulous," Tyson said.

Members recall BSU beginning

JASON TYLER
Collegian

The Black Student Union was founded to represent a small group of African American students in the 1960s.

Tuesday, BSU discussed and gave insight on the issues the BSU was founded on.

"When we founded the BSU, it was an era that was crazy and full of change," said Sylvia Robinson, manager of the Ewing, Marion and Coffman Foundation.

Robinson said a group was needed because there was a lot of social action going on all over the country. At the University of Kansas, a group of African American students burned a building on campus.

"The Student Government Association was eager for the African American students to get something established on campus so nothing radical like a building burning down would occur," she said.

One K-State alumnus said he felt the formation of BSU was facilitated by white students.

"In a way, I feel the BSU was very easy to get started because the white students felt guilty about their actions in the early '60s," Larry Dixon, assistant superintendent of USD 475, said.

"The biggest problem the BSU faced in the beginning was there were only 60 African American students enrolled at K-State. So we had to work together if we were going to survive," he said.

Ernest Downs, K-State alumnus, said going to college in the '60s was like a survival mission.

"We were all different, although we all had one basic goal, and that was to graduate and get a diploma," he said.

"The only reason that we stayed together was the fact that we worked all of the problems out together. We had members that wanted to burn down buildings, and we had members that wanted to be very organized."

Downs said he was very much against the violence.

"There was no place for guerrilla warfare on this campus," he said.

BSU implemented a lot of organizations and got a lot of important African American speakers like Martin Luther King Jr. and Muhammad Ali to come to K-State, said Cornell Mayfield, director of resources for the city of Manhattan.

"We wanted to open doors for future K-State African American students when we started BSU," he said.

Mayfield said getting involved was the key for African American students in that era.

"One of the problems the BSU has now is that there are so many groups on campus for African Americans, students have become very spread out," Jawwad Abdulhaqq, president of BSU, said.

Abdulhaqq said he decided to have the founders come to campus to help point out problems African American students are having today.

Shannon Cox, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine and biology, said African Americans at K-State don't get recognition from the University.

"People on this campus don't recognize that there are black students at KSU. We want the acknowledgment we deserve," she said.

Monrovia Scott, senior in industrial engineering, said it is everyone's duty to help increase the awareness and diversity at K-State.

UFM needs support from K-State funds

UFM deserves the $10,350 it receives in student fees.

In the quest to trim fat from the University budget, Student Senate has come up with a bold plan of action intended to save the money we pay in fees for truly worthwhile causes.

Specifically, the plan calls to cut $10,350 from the budget of UFM, leaving UFM with a funding of zero.

Now, at the outset, this might not seem like such a bad idea. UFM is, after all, not part of the K-State curriculum.

It does cost money, even to the students who aren't using it, and the students who do use it must pay for the classes they take.

However, the great "What will we do with the $17,000 we mistakenly charged the students" debate reveals that $10,350 works out to about 30 cents per student. For this price, one can buy five sticks of chewing gum from a vending machine.

UFM provides classes on a variety of subjects that K-State lacks. Among them are fencing, cooking and even lifeguarding. Classes cost $60 or less. They afford learning opportunities for both K-State students and Manhattan residents. Thirty cents apiece just isn't worth the possible damage to such a valuable institution.

If you'd like to look into UFM, it's located at 1221 Thurston St. The phone number is 539-8763. If you'd like to keep it alive, call your student senator.

Bill takes a blow at school systems

You've got to hand it to the conservative legislators in this state.

Rep. Darlene Cornfield, R-Valley Center, is the principal sponsor of a bill that could dramatically alter social policy in our state.

The House Judiciary Committee is having hearings on a proposed constitutional amendment that could take away the state's right to look out for the welfare of children.

The bill reads: "The rights of parents to direct the upbringing and education of their children shall not be infringed. The legislature shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this section."

If passed by a two-thirds majority of both the Kansas House and Senate, the proposed amendment would be submitted to the voters for a referendum.

The "Parents' Rights" bill, like many social reforms gone amuck, is based on a legitimate premise.

It seems only logical that parents should help make important decisions for their children.

"I'm just saying let the parents get involved," Cornfield said.

But writing that down in statute changes things. By requiring the state to enact legislation pandering to the whims of each individual parent, several important components of our educational system will be undercut.

First, you can throw sex education completely out the window.

Many school districts have enough trouble now, often allowing individuals to skip certain classes. All because their parents object to their children learning about sex and/or contraception.

This despite the fact that no connection between children learning about sex and contraception in an educational setting has ever been demonstrated.

The "Parents' Rights" amendment would not only allow for students to miss these important classes but could easily lead to legislated changes in curriculum, eliminating sex education altogether.

And you'd better be prepared to replace your biology texts. If parents are given this direct control over their children's education, you'll soon see an end to any discussion of the origin of life on our planet.

Biblical creation would (hopefully) stay out of the classroom because 1) regardless of scientific claims that support certain interpretations of data, it is not science, 2) it violates the doctrine of separation of church and state, and 3) there would be no way to objectively select Biblical creation over Hindu creation or Hopi creation.

But evolution would probably also be forced to exit stage left. A sizable number of Kansans are devout believers in Creation, and they don't want evolution being taught to their children.

Despite evolution's validity as a scientific theory (which doesn't mean it's true, just that it's scientific) the proposed amendment would bring cries to remove evolution from the public schools.

Look for multicultural education, tolerance of gay and lesbian lifestyles and everything else to quickly leave the scene.

Finally, this amendment would even confound the conservative social agenda being pushed on the national level.

If the power to influence the upbringing of children is taken from the state, then conservatives must accept the legitimacy of single-parent households, teen motherhood and the parenting rights of lesbians and homosexuals (all in all not a bad thing, but certainly not at the top of Newt Gingrich's legislative wish list).

This amendment is not well thought through. It decimates the power of our educational system to objectively evaluate curricula, and it runs counter to the goals of its proponents.

Don't let the rhetoric sway you. Tell your legislator you support parents' rights, but not the bill.

Christians must face credibility crisis

When prostitutes are held in higher esteem than pastors in a society, it's a good time to start asking why. Craig McElvain, a pastor from Overland Park, cited a recent survey of American attitudes toward different professions during a speech at Icthus, a campus Christian group, last Thursday.

Christians should take heart, however. Pastors were rated higher than mafia dons and drug dealers.

The obvious conclusion to draw from this is that Christians are experiencing a credibility crisis. We have fallen asleep to the true meaning of following Christ and slipped into a public-relations nightmare.

The greatest advertising campaign in the world won't amount to anything if the public has the impression the product in mind doesn't work.

This is the situation Christians face. The message of Christ is paraded everywhere in America from John 3:16 signs at football games to televangelists. The problem is that few are living the advertised message.

In order to restore credibility, Christians need to do two things.

First, we need to set our eyes on Christ and Christ alone. Then, we need to follow him.

One reason so few people take Christ seriously is because so few professed Christians take Christ seriously. Instead of focusing on Christ, Christians tend to swing to two extremes.

One, Christians worship denominational doctrine and tradition or church culture ahead of Christ.

Two, they dilute the message of Christ by attempting to redefine the truth of Christ instead of letting that truth define them.

An example of this attempt to redefine Christ to fit our needs instead of his is the notion that his chief message was the liberal conception of tolerance. In reality, Christ's stated message was salvation and redemption for sinners. Tolerance, the spineless ethic of never offending people, is radically different from the love Christ preached. Jesus offended people and told them they were wrong, but, as an act of love, forgave them in spite of this.

Once our eyes are set on Christ, who defined himself as "the way, the truth and the life," then he should be followed. In his speech, McElvain said the key thing followers of Christ need to do to restore credibility is to simply exercise kindness. Christ said "love your neighbor," which is accomplished not by words but action, like simple kindness.

The best example of a follower of Christ earning credibility through kindness is Mother Teresa. At last year's National Prayer Breakfast in Washington, D.C., Mother Teresa delivered the keynote address before the president and vice president and condemned their stand on abortion. At a speech at Harvard, she scolded some members of the student body for having sex outside of marriage.

After both speeches, she received a standing ovation despite her bold statements. I can think of no other person in the world who could get away with that. Because of the life she has lived in pursuit of Christ, practicing kindness, she has earned a level of credibility that holds her beyond criticism.

The way out of the public-relations nightmare followers of Christ are in is to simply live what we shout. There is a place and need for the public pronouncement of the truths of Christ, but if it's not backed up with a Christlike lifestyle, it is nothing but a resounding gong or clanging symbol.

Mahatma Gandhi sums up a common American attitude toward Christians in his statement, "I like your Christ, but I don't like your Christians, because they are so unlike your Christ."

The problem is not with Christ, but us.

See other side of "The Bell Curve"

Dear editor,

Given the recent controversy about reporting about the controversial book "The Bell Curve," it seems increasingly evident that considerations about the quality of its "science" require a more thorough and reasoned understanding of how such claims about racial difference are made and supported. I hope all students and the University community don't miss a chance for better understanding. You'll have a chance at 7:30 tonight in the Union Little Theatre when an authority, Sander Gilman of the University of Chicago, will give a slide lecture on how science gets misused to make such racial claims: "The Other End of the Bell Curve: The Construction of the Myth of Superior Jewish Intelligence." I hope you decide about these matters yourself.

Garage is a ridiculous plan

Dear editor,

Last Thursday, I read a story in the Collegian in which the parking braintrust had decided to propose to President Wefald and others that a 1,250-car parking garage could be built within the confines of East Stadium, and that the horseshoe be finished to hide it and make it more aesthetically pleasing to passersby on Anderson Avenue.

That's the silliest idea I've seen in reputable print in a long time, and the more I thought about it, the sillier it got. Let me get this straight. We are going to forever render the structure useless as a stadium by putting a three-level parking garage in it, and then we are going to bother to finish a stadium we are never going to use again just to hide the garage we just built and we all want.

Look, I am no expert, but I have an idea. If we are going to build a parking garage on that spot, tear the stadium down and build a nice big one, so we don't have this problem again for awhile.

There, I said it. I'll probably be drawn and quartered, but I said it. Tear it down. You could add space for the police department and a couple of classrooms into the garage, and the people could even rappel off it if they wanted to.

Here's the rationale. With all due respect to the present football administration, if anybody had ever won consistently on that field, it might not be called simply East Stadium. It's not like we are tearing down the site of a string of national titles; I've only been at K-State for a semester, but I've lived in Kansas all my life. I know the story.

If people driving by on Anderson Avenue think it's ugly, commission a nice mural on that and be done with it.

▶ PARKING PROPOSAL

K-State needs proposal alternatives

Dear editor,

The proposal to relocate two important playing fields to make way for a parking garage inside Memorial Stadium is seriously flawed for several reasons.

Open space and play areas close to student populations are not adequate as it is. These fields and the stadium running track are regularly used throughout the year, often by recreationists whose activity needs do not match with what the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex fields offer.

The area is also an important natural outdoor lab that complements the indoor exercise options available in Ahearn Field House and the Natatorium, and the fields are used by classes, one of which is mine.

The relocation concept is a smokescreen. The only place that the fields could be relocated would be the area west of the Rec Complex fields, and these are already used as playfields, even though the playing surface is sub-par. In other words, there is truly no relocation, only the loss of two fields as a result of the current proposal.

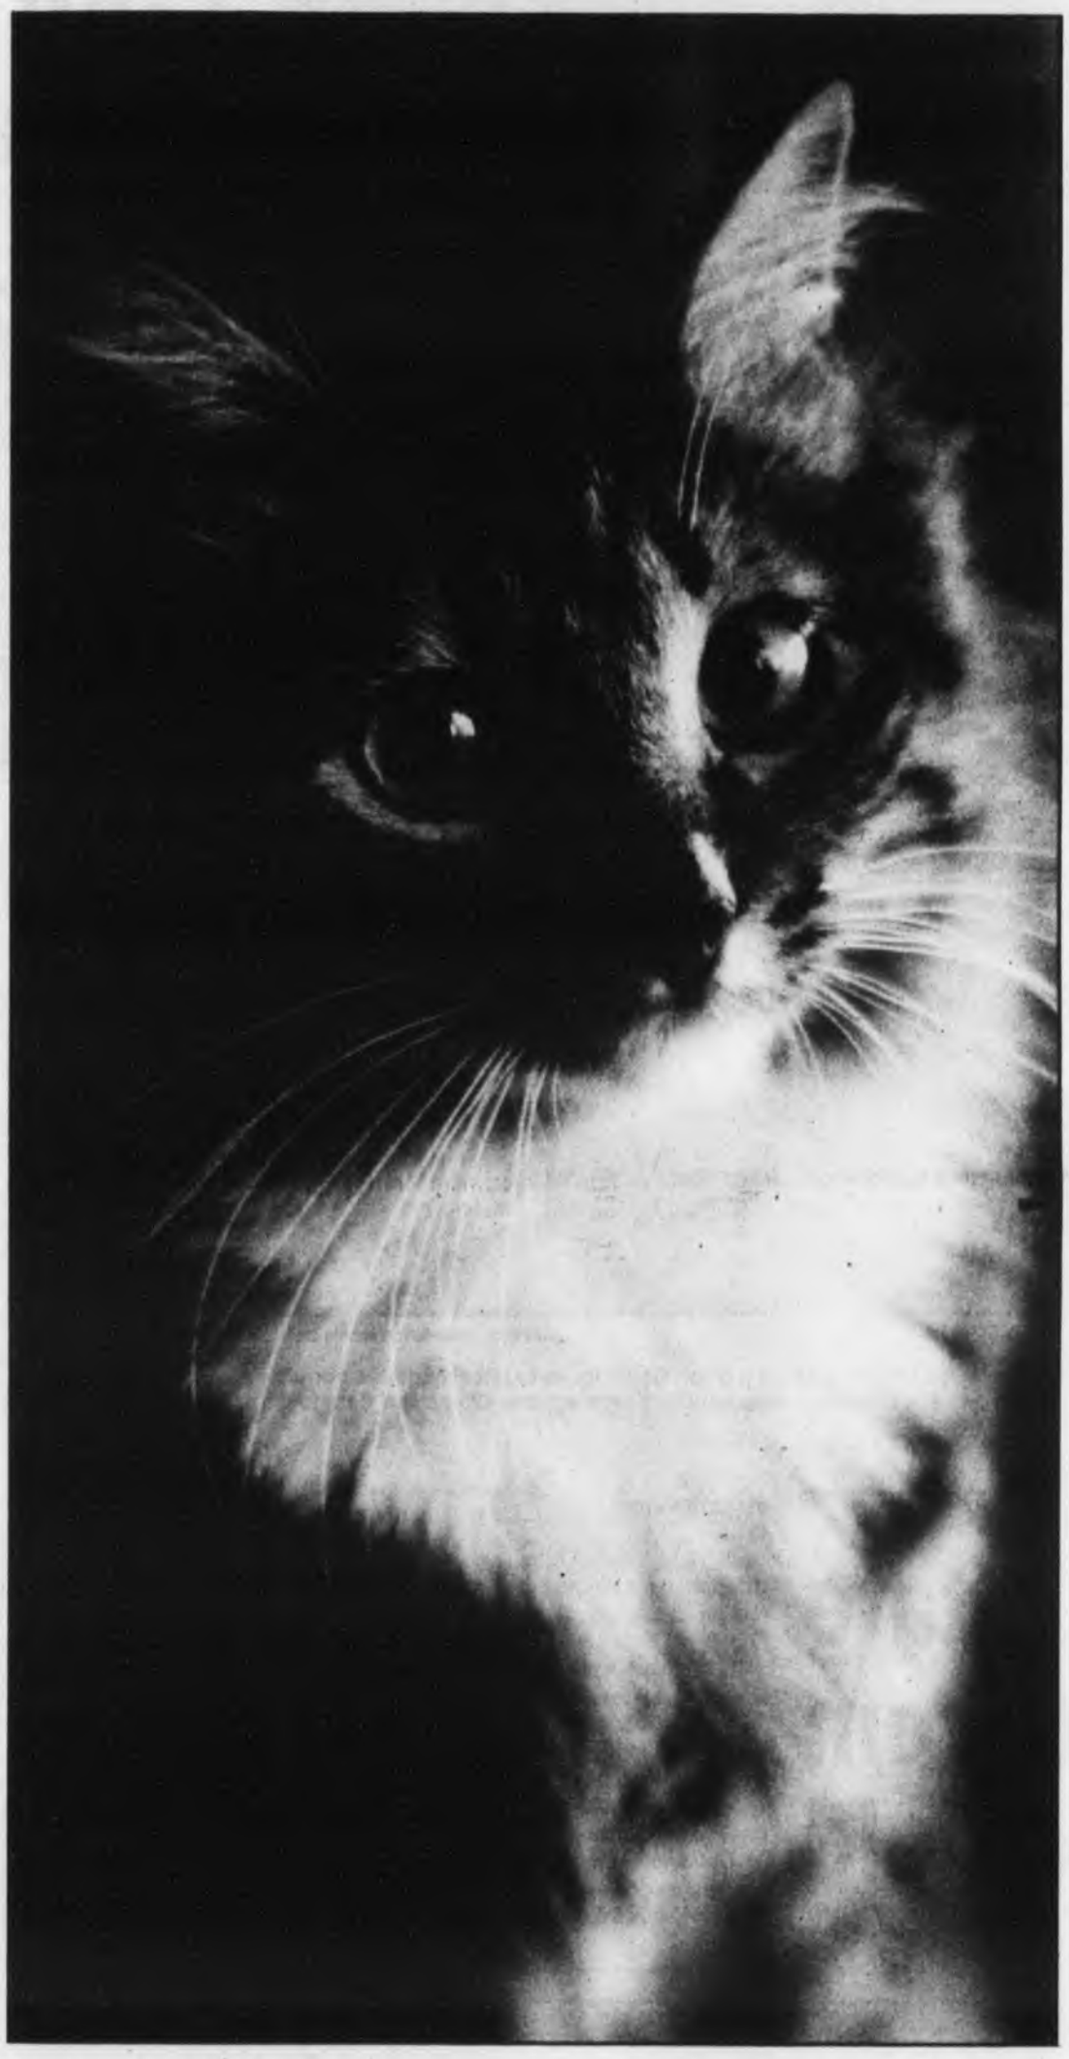
The likelihood that the lower Student Union lot would be converted into a playfield is also very doubtful. Because of the expense necessary to level a fairly substantial slope on the northeast corner of the lot and the loss of other space for the widening of Anderson, what's left might be green space but of little value for sport use.

Secondly, because green space is so precious, it makes much more sense to expand an existing asphalt/concrete area.

Instead of the current site, planners should consider the west stadium lot or the parking lot between Ackert and Durland halls.

Certainly, some will argue that this takes away existing spaces, but it would not if these are incorporated into the structure, especially since the size of the garage in these locations could be a story or two higher than the old stadium site.

These sites also would not require a facade or specialized construction, thereby saving enough to afford an additional tier. Also, the Ackert site is much more central and usable for the rest of the campus.



One other alternative would be to demolish just the east side of the stadium and place the parking garage there. This 150' by 300' site would be plenty adequate in size. Needed office space for the current occupants could certainly be incorporated into such a plan. The playfields would be retained, as would a remnant of the old stadium's architecture on the west side.

While I recognize that each of these alternatives also has deficiencies, I certainly hope that the current proposal is reconsidered, because it has not given adequate consideration to its negative impacts, either.

Valentine's Day Oddity

Gifts

Gifts that come from the heart as traditional Valentine's ideas are a sure win this year.

Susan Ridgway, senior in music education, received a book of coupons last year from her husband.

"That was kind of fun. The whole idea is they have to come up with the ideas. He had to make it particular for the things I liked to do," Ridgway said.

The coupons included a candlelight dinner, a movie or video rental of her choice, a week of him cooking supper, an evening at home with the stereo, television and the telephone unplugged and others, Ridgway said.

"For our wedding, I wrote a song for him. He was pretty touched by that. It doesn't have to be great, but you just have to think about it," Ridgway said.

"It's basically your imagination."
AARON PATRICK BOWYER
Senior in elementary education

Aaron Patrick Bowyer, senior in elementary education, agrees that the best gifts come from within.

"It's basically your imagination. Doing something new and unusual is the best gift. It comes from your heart. It is something that's different.

"These gifts are not the normal gifts because your imagination is affected by your feelings. Your soul and mind are working together," Bowyer said.

Valentine's Day is often associated with couples and the gifts symbolizing the love they share. But Carol Saueresigg, sophomore in pre-med, offers this advice to others.

"I think Valentine's is cool. If you have someone to spend it with, it's awesome. But if you don't, then don't focus on romantic love but on the other people that you do love," Saueresigg said.

Give the gift of coffee to a loved one with an espresso machine.

Bowyer agrees with the idea that caring is important.

"The ability to care and show it is an ideal gift in the abstract sense. It is the ability to care for someone more than yourself, to bend over backwards and defend them," he said.

But the caring shouldn't be just one time a year.

"I think stuff like this should happen all year," Stacey Grecian, K-State alumna, said.

Grecian suggests that instead of buying Valentine's gifts, people use that money to buy a kitchen appliance for someone that needs one or spend the evening babysitting for a single parent that needs the evening off.

Giving unusual gifts seems to be the normal occurrence.

"I received roses from a stranger. He was in one of my classes, and I asked for his number for studying. He sent me a dozen roses, and I didn't know his name," Julie Stauffer, senior in statistics, said.

Grecian once received a grapefruit with hearts all over it for Valentine's. Her co-worker gave the fruit knowing how much she liked grapefruit.

A young daughter was looking for the perfect red gift for Valentine's. But what she found in the house is not the typical gift.

"One year, I got a candy cane. It was red and white. My daughter gave it to me," Pat Kolonosky, instructor of English, said.

A wallet filled with created coupons drawn in the form of credit cards was the unusual gift Stauffer gave. She also included Monopoly money in the wallet.

One married couple invited their single friends over for a Valentine's Day party. It was complete with a scavenger hunt, games and fun. The idea was good because it gave singles something to do, Grecian said.

A poem is the most unusual thing Kevin Turner, junior in criminal justice, has given.

"I've given a tape of love songs," Grecian said.

An empty cereal box provided a creative gift for the guy that Jana Fallin, division chair of music education, was dating while in college.

After dumping the cereal box out, Fallin filled it up with brownies.

"He thought it was heavy. I wanted him to be awed by my creativity, but he wasn't," Fallin said.

Others enjoy the combination of imagination and the more traditional gifts.

"The best Valentine's present would be a single red rose and a man to sing to you," Saueressig said.

Grecian agrees that a romantic gift is the best gift.

"A dream gift would be a whole evening of off-the-wall memories like a candlelight picnic in the middle of the stadium or his friends serenading me at the beginning of the evening," Grecian said.

Mike Cole, senior in agriculture education, would prefer to have a more traditional gift.

"I would like my wife to take me out to a nice restaurant," Cole said.

As for giving gifts, Cole said he usually gives his wife red roses, but last year he gave her an electric razor.

Saueressig has a gift picked out that she would like to give.

"I would make cookies and have a treasure hunt of clues at the places where we've been. The clues would lead him back to the cookies," she said.

Puppies and kittens make good gifts because you can hold onto them and love them when your significant other isn't there, Bowyer said.

For Turner, the ideal present that he would like to give is a dozen roses for a week every day before Valentine's, he said.

If you still don't know what you want to give your someone, local stores are ready to help.

For those couples that have been dating for a while, larger, more elaborate gifts are suggested, said Karen Brown, manager of Rod's Hallmark Shop.

There are any number of things such as larger stuffed animals, baskets with dried flowers and boxes of candy, that make nice gifts, Brown said.

"I haven't seen a trend yet, but I've sold a lot of stuffed animals," Brown said.

April Kerr of Manhattan Floral Company agrees that stuffed animals are a good choice.

"I think a stuffed animal would be nice. That's what my fiancé gave me when we were engaged. When you're engaged, it's something you can keep," Kerr said.

For those couples that have not been together as long, Kerr recommends a single pink rose, while Brown suggests a box of candy would work for either males or females.

Others prefer to buy their valentines clothing.

"The teddies sell the fastest, and then it's the chemise," Cindy Jones of Patricia's Undercover Lingerie said.

Patricia's Undercover Lingerie has clothing for both male and females, but more men have been in to buy for their wives and girlfriends, Jones said.

Jones said that Christmas and Valentine's Day are their busiest times of the year.

Kerr agrees that business is picking up.

"I'm sure from now to Valentine's Day we'll be busy," she said.

Kerr said it's also important to be prepared for those busy times.

"It's good to order early. That's more important when sending orders out of town," Kerr said.

So whether you are going traditional or creative, enjoy the day.

"Valentine's Day is too commercialized, but at the same time it's an excuse to act a little crazy," Stauffer said.

Sooners lower the boom on Wildcats

Poor shooting lets OU run away with victory

TODD STEWART
Collegian

NORMAN, Okla. — "Basketball's funny like that. A team that has trouble scoring, has trouble winning."

That's what K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury must have felt like after his team's latest lesson, courtesy of the Oklahoma Sooners, in Wednesday night's 81-66 loss in Norman.

Asbury's 11-10 Wildcats shot a dismal 33 percent for the game, including 23 percent from behind the three-point stripe.

Oklahoma 81
K-State 66

Offensively, the Cats were in for a long night, but it was also the Oklahoma offense that troubled the Wildcats.

From tipoff, the Sooner offense scored early and scored often.

Oklahoma scored the first eight points of the game, and 12 of the first 16. Later in the first half, the Sooners went on separate runs of 8-0 and 12-2.

Despite the sometimes-hard-to-defend Sooner offense, Asbury did not blame the defense for the loss.

"We played defensively well enough to stay in it," Asbury said.

What did not help the Cats, however, was their season-high 29 fouls and Oklahoma's accompanying 28 free throws.

Included in those 29 fouls was what Asbury termed the first real technical foul of his coaching career.

Did Asbury think he deserved it?

"Oh yeah," he said after the game.

One play that particularly caught Asbury's attention was an inbounds play in which the officials almost awarded possession to Oklahoma when the ball belonged to the Cats.

"This game was a real helter-skelter game," Asbury said.

"Especially when they wanted to give them the ball one time out of bounds. That was an interesting call."

Even before the Asbury technical, there were signs that this would be a unique game.

Asbury started rarely used freshman guard Aaron Swartzendruber and even less-used sophomore center Kevin Lewis instead of freshman guard Mark Young and junior center George Hill.

The new starting lineup started out rusty, and it wasn't until Lewis' basket at the 17:46 mark that the Cats finally got on the scoreboard.

From that point on, the teams went back and forth until Oklahoma senior forward Calvin Curry sparked the team's 8-0 run.

This put the Cats down 24-10 mid-way through the first half.

After a short-lived mini-rally by K-State, the Sooners went on a 12-2 run that put the Cats down by 21.

The team would never recover.

"We get in a panic mode and get out of rhythm and make bad decisions," Asbury said.

The bad decisions Asbury was talking about led to 25-percent shooting in the first half.

In the second half, the Cats could never mount a serious attack to the Oklahoma lead.

The Cats could not put together a series of more than two baskets before the comeback was halted by the Sooners.

It was junior forward Ryan Minor's 22 points, 13 in the second half, that helped to halt each Wildcat run. In addition to his scoring, it was Minor's unselfish play that lead his teammates to victory.

"When my teammates are playing well, I really don't look to score," Minor said.

"I didn't get many looks at the basket, but when I did I wasn't hitting. Being double-teamed is nothing new."

ELLIOT HATCHER
K-State point guard

Minor contributed two blocked shots and three steals to the Sooner defensive cause, which was aimed at stopping Cat point guard Elliot Hatcher.

The Oklahoma defensive game plan worked and limited Hatcher to four points.

"I didn't get many looks at the basket, but when I did I wasn't hitting," Hatcher said.

"Being guarded tightly or double-teamed is nothing new. I just wasn't hitting my shots."

Hatcher wasn't the only one.

Backcourt mates Young, Swartzendruber and Hatcher missed a combined 20 of their 22 shots.

Asbury said the Sooners had a lot to do with the Wildcat shooting woes.

"Give Oklahoma credit — they played well," he said.

The Wildcats did not.

Despite the poor shooting woes, Stanley Hamilton finished with 15 points.

On a night when Asbury seemed to try everything and just about everything failed, perhaps one cynical Sooner fan thought of something Asbury had not.

"Hey Tom! You gonna put yourself in?"

▶ OFFENSE

K-State cold from the field

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

NORMAN, Okla. — Scoring difficulties summed it up for K-State Wednesday night as the Cats lost to the Oklahoma Sooners 81-66.

"Offensive woes properly summarized that game," said K-State coach Tom Asbury, whose team fell to 11-10 overall and 2-7 in the Big Eight.

"We have such a great difficulty scoring at times, and offensively we didn't make great decisions," he said.

Oklahoma opened the game on a 12-4 run that ended at the 14:30 mark on two Tyrone Davis free throws.

The Sooners would then go on a 23-13 run to extend their lead to 36-19.

Despite some chances at open shots, K-State couldn't get them to go down.

"Offensively we just didn't take care of things," Asbury said. "We had a lot of great shots that didn't go in," Asbury said.

K-State entered the locker room at halftime shooting 25 percent from the floor and losing 38-24.

"We had some pretty good shots. If we could have shot 38 percent at halftime, then we're right in it," Asbury said.

Even though the Cats have stayed close with most of their opponents, Asbury said the Cats still have to address their inability to score consistently.

Asbury said people should expect K-State to have problems scoring this year.

"That will happen when you're the poorest offensive team in the Big Eight, statistically," Asbury said. "This team has had problems getting out of the chute all year."

Both teams shot poor percentages, but Oklahoma seemed to get the things done that win ball games.

"We were a little sluggish out there — both teams were," said Oklahoma forward Ryan Minor, who scored a game-high 22 points. "But we did the little things and played well when we needed to."

Oklahoma's defense also had something to do with the poor shooting by the Wildcats, Oklahoma coach Kelvin Sampson said.

"We play great defense. You're not going to shoot well every night. Defense — that's something we made up our minds a long time ago that we were going to do well," said Sampson.

K-State guard Elliot Hatcher, who was held to one of nine from the field, said Oklahoma's defense gave him problems all night.

"They're a good defensive team. I didn't get many good looks at the basket,"0 Hatcher said.

▶ ROLLER HOCKEY

K-State squad will travel to Lawrence despite having trouble finding practice time

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

K-State's first-year Roller Hockey Club is ready for battle this upcoming weekend.

The team is going to Topeka this Sunday for an afternoon match-up against the University of Kansas.

This will mark the second time the two teams have played each other, with the Jayhawks winning the first battle 9-5 last semester.

The game will consist of 40 minutes at the Garfield Community Center.

The only conflict between the two teams is whether to use a ball or puck.

"We have been using a ball — that's all we've been using. KU's been using a puck. I guess they have been having a lot of success with it," said Kevin Peterson, vice president of the team and senior in parks and recreation administration.

"So I went out and bought a puck this past week to practice with it a little bit. When we play KU, it's going to be one-half ball and one-half puck."

Club president Chuck Downey, graduate student in horticulture, said forming the club was easy to do.

"There was just a bunch of people playing all the time. I didn't think it would be that hard to get the Roller Hockey Club started," Downey said.

The club at this point has 35 to 40 players on the list, but Peterson said some of the players always make it to practice when the weather cooperates.

"We've got a core of about 10 to 12 people that show up every single time," Peterson said.

Last summer, the die-hard players traveled to Wichita to play in a four-team tournament.

"It was a spur-of-the-moment thing. It was in the summer, and a lot of the players had already gone home. There was about six or seven of us. We went up to Wichita and won the whole thing," Peterson said.

"The other three teams were from Wichita, and they were pretty mad that we went up there and took it from them."

Peterson said the team is having trouble finding time to practice with the winter weather. The team usually practices on the unsurfaced tennis courts between Marlatt and Goodnow halls.

"Last week, we practiced four days, but we haven't yet this week. See, it's that winter weather, you can't schedule anything with it being like this," Peterson said.

The dues for being in the club include buying a T-shirt, and the players are responsible for supplying all of their own equipment.

Peterson said they are always looking for players to join the team.

"But we're looking for younger players, like freshmen or sophomores. I will be graduating next year, Chuck will be graduating this year, and somebody is going to have to take over," Peterson said.

"Most people on the team are juniors and seniors. It's a pretty old group."

The roller hockey team has just started at K-State, but Peterson said a guy named Gary Doucette's ultimate goal is having a Big Eight tournament in Topeka.

Doucette, a manager of RollerSport in Topeka, said he is trying to bring on the National In-Line Association in the area.

"We're working on several universities from area states. In the United States alone, there are two million registered roller hockey players, both adult and kid," Doucette said.

"I came up with a concept. The universities are not on the NHIA, but they are helping tremendously in playing area teams."

Tennis squad to hit road

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

After a two-week break, the K-State women's tennis team returns to the playing court this weekend.

This time, the team takes the show on the road to the state of Utah, where it will compete in a scheduled triple-header.

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said he looks for improvements on this road trip after the matches against Creighton and Boise State.

"We need to be a lot more competitive," Bietau said. "We had cases against Boise State where we knew what to do and just couldn't get the job done."

K-State, now 3-1 after a four-match homestand to start the season, begins its road trip to face its toughest competition to date.

On Friday, the Cats find themselves in Provo, Utah, to face the 20th-ranked Cougars of Brigham Young.

BYU enters this Central Region match-up with a record of 2-2. The Cougars earned their national ranking this season after knocking off No. 15 Notre Dame.

The host squad brings three nationally ranked singles players and two ranked doubles teams into its match-up with the Cats. Leading the way for BYU is Jennifer Saret, the No. 21 player in the country.

Kuregian

K-State brings in its own top-ranked player. Karina Kuregian travels to Utah after competing in the Rolex National Indoor Championships in Dallas. Kuregian advanced to the second round of the event before falling to California's Jennifer Poulos 3-6, 6-3, 6-1.

After Brigham Young, the Wildcats travel to Salt Lake City for the final leg of their trip.

On Saturday, Utah will be host to K-State. Both squads enter that match-up tied at No. 6 in the regional rankings.

The Cats finish with a Sunday morning meeting with Weber State, the No. 9 team in the region.

"BYU is one of the top teams in the country," Bietau said.

"They just beat Notre Dame a week ago. Utah and Weber are teams that are competing very well."

Ramblers' bass guitarist surprises band

MUSIC

L.A. Ramblers will be performing at 10 p.m. tonight at Snookie's Bar in Aggieville.

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

When the L.A. Ramblers took the stage at the Bottleneck Oct. 15, the crowd and the musicians thought the show was a normal gig, but at the end of the show, the bass player made a surprise announcement.

"Joe said we were all part of a live music recording," vocalist Stephanie Turner said. "I just looked at the guitarist and said 'What?' We were just as surprised as everyone else there."

Joe Comportarato, bass player, said he thought it was the best way to get a live recording.

"No one knew we were doing it," Comportarato said. "Everyone thought I was lying. How many bands do something like that?"

In December, the band released the compact disc, titled "Live," through TMA Entertainment. Turner said the band has sold more than 1,000 of the CDs since December.

Turner, a 24-year-old KU graduate, said the L.A. Ramblers were known in Lawrence as a Grateful Dead cover band until seven months ago, when she became the new vocalist.

"We're more simple now, and we rock a lot harder," Turner said. "Our songs are pretty much all originals instead of doing covers. It's really cool."

Turner said she is not only the youngest member of the band, but she is also the only female.

"I've always knew that I wanted to do something along these lines, but I never thought it would be with five bald guys," Turner said.

The L.A. Ramblers are one of the few bands in Lawrence to have a female singer, Turner said.

"There's definitely bands like us around town, but we're different," Turner said. "We play straight up rock 'n' roll."

Comportarato said the Ramblers have gone through 24 different musicians in the band's ten years of existence.

"When people started leaving the band, we kept getting people to replace them," Comportarato said. "For some reason, everything always fell into place."

Turner said the band will launch a spring tour starting at 10 p.m. tonight at Snookie's Bar.

Comportarato saidhe likes playing in Manhattan."

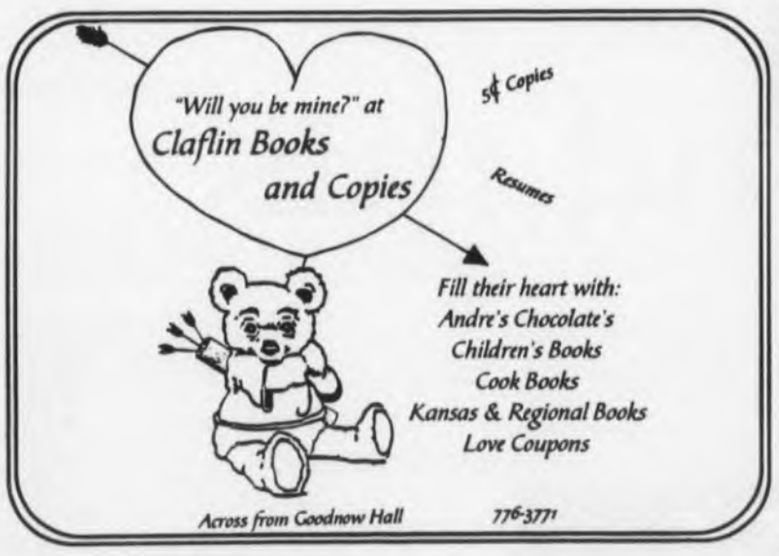
They seem to respond well to our music, "Comportarato said. "We've sold a lot of CDs there."

After they perform in Manhattan, the band will travel across the United States, including Colorado, Texas, Ohio, Nebraska and Chicago.

Cassie says go for it, use creativity

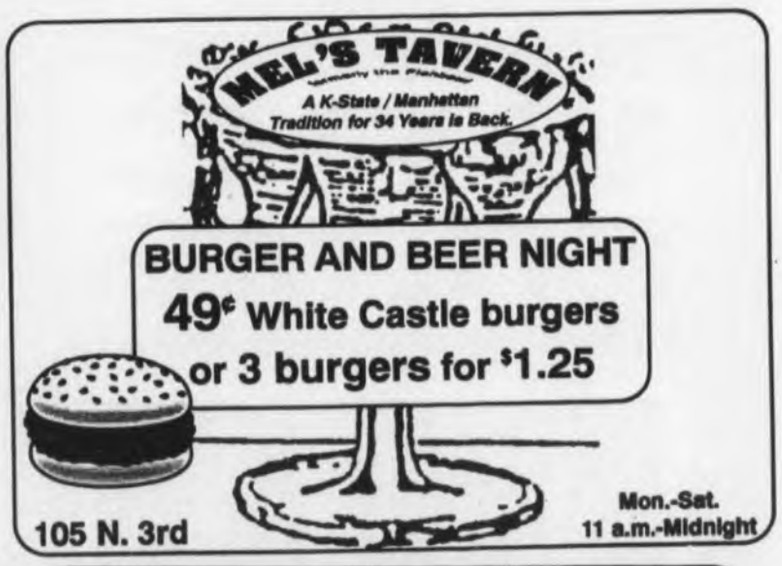
Dear Cassie,

Recently, I met a really nice girl. We both work at the same place, so I see her everyday.

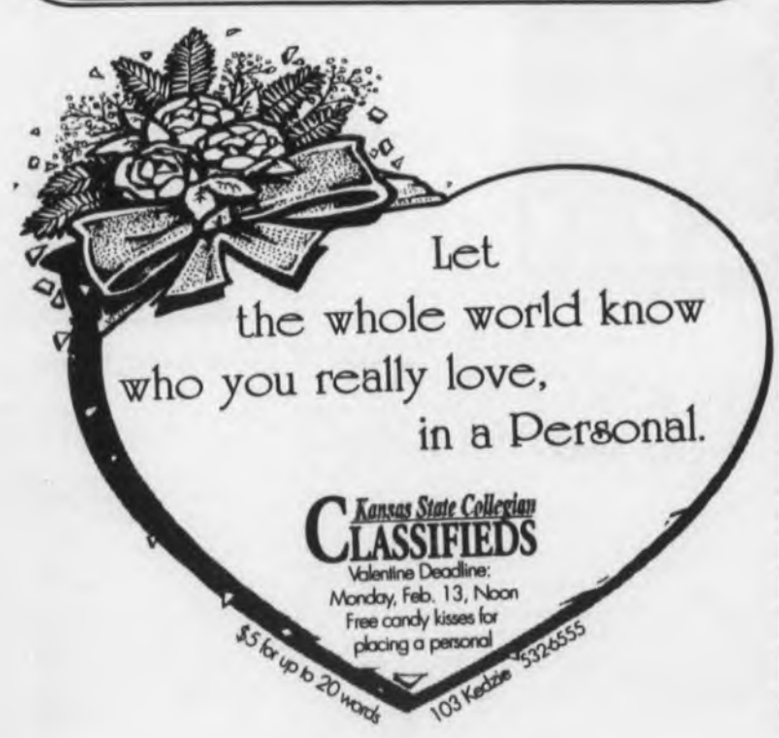


I'm quiet and somewhat shy, and when given the chance to talk to her, I don't know what to say. I really think this could be the girl of my dreams, but how do I get to first base?

Signed, Looking for Love



Dear Looking for Love,



If you have a problem facing this woman and telling her how you feel, try something a tad bit more creative. Write her letters telling her, or send her a song that you think expresses the way you feel.

Many women are attracted to shy men, and she may be just as interested in you as you are in her. Good luck!

be lower in nitrates, the city will keep production in Leonardville.

The city hopes to be able to blend the water from the old wells with water from new wells to achieve the legal nitrate levels, Johnson said.

The worst well will only be used in an emergency, such a large fire, Johnson said.

"We have four wells, but the one was exceptionally high so we are not using it at the present time," Betty Fritz, Leonardville city clerk, said.

The other option available would be connecting onto someone else's system. Connecting to the Rural Water District No. 1 system would require a 5-mile pipeline. A pipeline from the water district to Randolph is under construction.

"We have a chlorination facility. We will have to pipe back to the original wells," Johnson said.

The pipeline from the new wells to the chlorination facility will be a mile to a mile and a half, Johnson said.

The city has enough money to cover the cost of testing the new wells, but it hopes to receive grant money to pay for the construction of the new pipeline.

"We would probably have to do this testing before we went out to get any kind of grant for the rest of the work," Johnson said.

In the meantime, D.J.'s Mini Mart is providing bottled water, which is paid for by the city, to persons who are signed up and meet the state's requirements.

Owner Jeffrey Jordan said the city is paying for the bottled water for pregnant women and young children.

"I go through at least two cases a week," Jordan said.

Bad water not a secret environment, the results were very different from the initial testing. They didn't show anything threatening at all," he said.

The KDHE's concern was the fact that the ground-water flow was in the direction of the city water wells. Petty said testing was done over several square blocks and even in the industrial park area near Wal-Mart. No sources of contamination turned up in this area.

"We made an agreement with the KDHE and said that we would check the situation out. If there was any contamination before, we now know that it is gone," Petty said.

"They asked us to be involved because of the public health issue," Petty said.

Petty said the situation has been discussed at meetings the public can attend, but there was no action taken to notify the public directly.

No residents in the areas of Osage and Third and Fourth streets could be found who had heard anything about a source of contamination in the area where they live.

"There was no door-to-door activity with the residents. If we didn't need to get permission to get on private property and dig a testing hole, then we didn't feel it was vital to let residents know," Petty said.

"It wasn't because we wanted to keep everything a secret. We just didn't want to scare anyone without need. It didn't seem appropriate to stir everyone up until we knew what we were doing," he said.

If contamination shows up in the future anywhere in the city, Petty said the first step will be to determine if it is a health hazard.

"Next we must identify what the source of the contamination is and stop it. Then if it turns out to be a possible risk like this situation was, we must get it cleaned up," he said.

Petty said he had no idea who would foot the bill for a large-scale clean-up effort.

Photocopying, graduate assistant salary center of budget dispute

"It's not that our services have drastically expanded in the last two years," Tomb said.

Two areas Tomb is planning to target at tonight's Senate meeting are the photocopying budget and the graduate assistant salary.

"I've got support for all my amendments," Tomb said.

Tomb said his support isn't all from the same senators, but all of his amendments have support from members of senate.

He said the executive board did a good job with its budget request, but he had a problem with some of the big salary increases groups asked for.

The attorney general position was paid $500 this year. The position has never been paid in the past, but next year, the office is asking for $1,200 for the salary, he said. Tomb said he could support a $500 salary, but the increase seems a bit high.

The graduate assistant to Tricia Nolfi, senate adviser, is another target on Tomb's salary list. Senate makes up a third of the responsibilities of the graduate assistant, he said. Graduate assistants also work with the Department of Housing and Dining Services and the Dean of Student Life's office, he said.

"Often times, the graduate student is put in advising when they've never actually been in the student governing system," Tomb said.

The salary for the nine-month position is $6,500. The salary is higher than that of the student body president, Tomb said.

Sandy Ver Hage, graduate student in student counseling and personal services, is one of the graduate students working in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

"My position is paid. Frank Axel's is not," she said, referring to the other graduate assistant in the office.

Ver Hage said although students may not see everything she does, she said she feels her role in the office is an important one.

"I advise the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee and co-advise the Elections Committee and University Activities Board with Tricia Nolfi," Ver Hage said.

Ver Hage said she is also in the process of establishing a leadership directory with all the leadership positions available on campus and how to get involved with them in it.

She said there are a lot of misconceptions about her position. She is not receiving the full assistantship from SGA because she is still working for Housing and Dining Services. Housing and Dining still provides her main source of income.

Last year, two graduate assistants were requested for the Office of Student Activities and Services to assist Nolfi. One of the requests was denied on the floor, but this fall, because of some budget shifting, a second graduate was approved, LeDoux said.

"We do not let student-group budgets shift," he said.

When money is allocated to a student group for a specific project, it must be used on that project, he said.

"When student groups come in, we grill them. When our budget comes up, senators like Senator Tomb and myself are told we're insensitive," LeDoux said.

He said it was unfortunate that Senate treats its budget differently than it does the budgets of other groups that come before it.

Photocopying is another big problem in the Senate budget, Tomb said. The copy machine in the Office of Student Activities and Services costs $3,557. That figure includes 20,000 copies, he said.

Student government sends large projects to the Union Copy Center and pays for them instead of doing them in the office, Tomb said.

The University Activities Board was denied funding for photocopying for their University Activities Handbook last year, but the photocopying budget was rearranged so they received funding, Tomb said.

Tomb said he did not see any reason why the handbook should go out annually if very few, if any, changes were made in it. He said he thought the handbook should be used as a reference.

Nolfi said she would be advising the student senators to do what they think is best tonight.

"I won't be arguing. I focus my attention on the operating budget for the office," she said.

Sometimes some of the senators get too interested in the bottom line, and they don't look ahead at how they will be affected by the cuts, Nolfi said.

"In terms of the budget, it's the students' money," she said.

LeDoux said he strongly urged students to come to the Senate meeting tonight. The meeting starts at 6 p.m., but allocations should begin about 7 p.m., he said.

Voting revamped of Agriculture Council, none of the other colleges is considering the joint elections.

"We've been talking about it for quite a while but haven't finalized a decision yet," Travis Ellis, president of the Agriculture Student Council, said.

The Ag Council is looking at three different options: holding its elections with Senate, having a voting booth in the Union next to the SGA tables or continuing the council's normal election process.

The other seven college councils do not plan on participating in the elections for varying reasons.

"We don't want students choosing representatives at random from a list of names or pictures they see in the paper," Jon Beall, president of the Engineering Student Council, said.

†Deferred Apple Computer Loan offer expires February 17, 1995. No payment of interest or principal will be required for 90 days. (Some resellers may require a deposit to hold merchandise while loan is being approved.) Interest accruing during this 90-day period will be added to principal, and the principal amount, as so increased, will thereafter bear interest which will be included in the repayment schedule. ‡Monthly payment is an estimate based on the following information: For the Performa® 636 w/CD system shown here, a purchase price of $1,848.30, which includes 6.9% sales tax; including loan fees, the total loan amount is $1,955.87, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $33. For the Performa® 6115 w/CD system shown here, a purchase price of $2,709.92, which includes 6.9% sales tax; including loan fees, the total loan amount is $2,867.64, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $49. For the Power Macintosh® 7100/80 w/CD system shown here, a purchase price of $3,633.53, which includes 6.9% sales tax; including loan fees, the total loan amount is $3,845.01, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $66. Computer system prices, loan amounts and sales taxes may vary. See your authorized Apple Campus Reseller or representative for current system prices, loan and tax amounts. Loans are for a minimum of $1,000 to a maximum of $10,000. You may take out more than one loan, but the total of all loans cannot exceed $10,000 annually. A 5.5% loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount. The interest rate is variable, based on the commercial paper rate plus 5.35%. For the month of November, 1994, the interest rate was 10.85% with an Annual Percentage Rate of 12.10%. 8-year loan term with no prepayment penalty. The monthly payment and the Annual Percentage Rate shown assume the 90-day deferment of principal and interest described above and no other deferment of principal or interest. Students may defer principal payments up to 4 years, or until graduation. Deferment will change your monthly payments. The Apple Computer Loan is subject to credit approval. Apple Computer Loan and 90-Day Deferred Payment Plan offers available only to qualifying students, faculty and staff. Bell-less belfry

3 students battered in Aggieville

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Three K-State students were battered at 1:30 Thursday morning during an argument that began inside Lucky BrewGrille.

The fight ended involving more than 15 people in the vicinity of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, Lt. Rodney Jager of the Riley County Police Department said.

Jager said the students reporting the battery were Richard "Dylan" Spencer, sophomore in pre-health professions program; Chris Coad, sophomore in public relations; and Julie Blickenstaff, sophomore in public relations. Each declined medical attention.

No suspects for beginning the fight have been arrested, Jager said.

"We have identified and interviewed two persons as possible suspects, but no arrests have been made," he said.

The fight began when two men tried to cut in front of the three and began to push Spencer while the group was waiting for the restroom at Lucky's, Coad said.

"They wanted to start a fight," he said.

The group proceeded outside and tried to calm Spencer, Blickenstaff said.

"We were just standing outside, and one of the guys causing trouble was going to hit Dylan, and I pushed him away," Blickenstaff said.

Blickenstaff said she was hit in the face as a result ,and Coad was badly wounded.

RCPD reported that a group apparently chased the two suspects to the vicinity of Last Chance, and six officers reported to the scene.

Coad said at this time Blickenstaff, Spencer and himself were taken for questioning by RCPD, but he knew some of his Alpha Tau Omega fraternity brothers and others had formed part of the crowd.

However, after a disturbance outside of Rusty's ,the two suspects left the scene, Jager said.

RCPD is continuing to question suspects.

▶ BUDGET

Senate chair to retain $1,500 salary

AMY SIMON
Collegian

Student Governing Association got caught in lengthy debate at its second allocations meeting as it tried to set its own budget. Senate swiftly voted to allocate $1,182 to the Women's Resource Center for salaries, postage and speakers' fees.

However, there were 17 amendments listed in the budget for the Office of Student Activities and Services. Mark Tomb, arts and sciences senator, read several of these amendments. One amendment involving the Senate chair's salary caused a great deal of debate.

The senate chair is currently paid $1,500. This was cut in half from last year. This year's bill proposed to return the salary to its original amount of $3,000. Tomb proposed an amendment that the Senate chair's salary remain at its current level.

"The student body president is paid $3,000," Tomb said. "I think that should be the highest paid position."

Chuck Haynes, business senator, said many members donate their time to Senate.

"If we vote this down, I think we should amend the bill to give us all a little money because we all work hard," Haynes said.

Brandon Clark, arts and sciences senator, said the Senate chair should be paid for teaching the class in Senate participation.

"These positions are all important, and the officers are doing a great job," Patrick Carney, arts and sciences senator, said. "But in a time when we have such a tight budget, we must make cuts."

The vote was announced as 28-26-2, which meant the amendment passed, and the Senate chair salary remained $1,500 per year.

Then senators noticed that there was not a majority of votes for the bill if abstentions were counted. Clayton Wheeler, Senate chair had excused himself from the debate.

After a 15-minute recess, Wheeler ruled that abstentions did not count as votes, and the original decision stood. After 1-1/2 hours of debate, Senate voted to uphold the decision of the chair. The Senate chair will be paid $1,500 next year.

Tomb also presented amendments to cut $570 by not printing University Activities Board handbooks and to disconnect the campus activity information line.

Both amendments failed.

Kansas experiencing ag-educator shortage

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

The shortage of agriculture-education teachers is prompting professionals in the field to take their message to the public.

"High-school ag is changing. People mentally think that ag programs are going out. The profession just hasn't told the success of the programs," Richard Welton, professor in agriculture education, said.

There are only 160 secondary ag-education programs and 250 teachers statewide on the middle-school, secondary and post-secondary levels, he said.

The shortage of ag-education teachers is an issue that these educators want the general public to gain knowledge about.

"This is not a static field. New things are always happening in agriculture, especially with the move to agri-science," Steven Harbstreit, associate professor in agriculture education and graduate coordinator, said.

Some of the new programs that are being used in high-school programs are aquaculture and new techniques used in greenhouses. This is putting more students in the ag classroom, Welton said.

The increase of students in the classroom is creating awareness.

"Seeing my ag adviser and seeing the opportunities that were available made me go into ag education," Darrin Holle, junior in ag education, said. "The classes you take are so broad-based."

Welton said an interesting thing about ag education is you're not limited to working in the classroom.

The agri-business and agri-science fields provide ag teachers to work with other teachers.

"It's an opportunity to integrate with other teachers. You're not just there by yourself," Harbstreit said.

The integration of classes has changed the curriculum.

Holle said in some high schools, ag classes are now available to be substituted for regular science classes. Students can use the ag-science classes to gain more hands-on experience.

"The one big thing that would really help kids get involved is as they see more business and science in the classroom than just ag mechanics," Holle said. "Some programs don't even have ag mechanics anymore."

Holle said some of the selling points were that ag education ranks second in the highest pay for the College of Agriculture, and also the contest, traveling opportunities and the fact that you don't just sit at a desk.

"I can pick the area of the state where I want to teach, but I would prefer the northeast part of Kansas. It would be fun to compete

Faculty salaries, benefits can't compete

CARRIE LININ
Collegian

K-State's faculty salaries and fringe benefits are still not competitive with peer institutions around the country, according to the Faculty Senate report of 1994.

Faculty salaries began to be more competitive in 1989 through the Margin of Excellence program, but funding for the program has since been cut, said John Fairman, assistant vice president and vice president of institutional advancement.

Fairman said increasing faculty salaries and fringe benefits is K-State's highest priority for 1995 and throughout the rest of this century.

Jim Coffman, University provost, said K-State is academically well off.

"Our faculty is tremendously productive in teaching, research, service activities and scholarships," he said.

Despite K-State's scholastic accomplishments, Coffman said K-State is being hurt by low faculty salaries.

"The University is totally dependent on the talent and commitment of our faculty. So we are always at risk of losing faculty when our salaries are not competitive," he said.

Coffman also said a university can only reach its full potential through the people who teach there.

"Kansas State is only as successful as the talent and

▶ MOTORCYCLIST COLLIDES WITH TRUCK, SUSTAINS MINOR INJURIES

A motorcycle and a small pickup truck were involved in a minor-injury accident Thursday at the corner of Vattier Street and Manhattan Avenue.

The motorcyclist, Kurt Chipperfield, sophomore in mechanical engineering, was traveling south in the left-hand lane of Manhattan Avenue while Mike Thoesen, freshmen in animal science, made a left turn onto Manhattan Avenue.

Thoesen said he didn't see Chipperfield at first because there was a line of cars turning onto Vattier Street and blocking his view, and when he finally did, it was too late.

"It all happened so fast," he said. "I tried to speed up to get out of his way."

Chipperfield said the front of his motorcycle hit the rear left-hand side of the truck, and his motorcycle slid on its side on the pavement.

Chipperfield sustained minor cuts, a tear in his jeans and a sore knee, but he refused to be treated by ambulance.

"I'm lucky I was wearing a helmet," he said. "Sometimes on warm days I don't wear one."

The headlight, front fender, turn signals and handlebars of the motorcycle were damaged in the accident. The rear left side of the truck was damaged. Estimated cost of damage for both vehicles is undetermined.

Officer James Wilkins of the Riley County Police Department said he filed an accident report and ticketed Thoesen for failure to yield the right of way of a stop sign.

▶ K-STATE DEBATE TEAM TAKES 3RD IN SAN DIEGO TOURNAMENT

The K-State debate team placed high in its first West Coast tournament this season.

The team placed third in the Point Loma Debate Tournament in San Diego last weekend.

Courtney Knapple, sophomore in speech, and Isaac West, freshman in political science and speech, finished with a 4-2 record, which included beating the 1994 junior varsity national champions.

West said the West Coast judges are looking for different things than the Midwest judges.

The Midwest is more targeted toward the argument, whereas the West Coast is targeted at style and how you communicate, he said.

Jeana Bolton, junior in speech, said a lot is left to interpretation by the judges on the West Coast.

"If they don't like your argument, and you don't explain that it is just your view for the forum, they will shell you," she said.

West said the judges didn't fit the image she had in her mind before the tournament.

"You would think they would be more liberal and open-minded, but they're not," he said.

Susan Stanfield, coach of the debate team, said the tournament was a good way to compare K-State's teams to others.

"The Point Loma Tournament is a good chance to see what people are doing in that part of the country," she said.

Stanfield said most of the judges for the national championships, which are also in San Diego, will be like the judges last weekend.

"Any school with two teams must bring a judge, but the rest of the judges are hired from the Southern California area," she said.

Stanfield said the team members will have to make some changes if they hope to do well at the national championships.

"We're going to change some of our positions and rewrite them to be more in style with debate on the West Coast," she said.

The next tournament for the debate team is the Heart of America Tournament at the University of Kansas.

"Heart of America is the biggest tournament we go to next to the national championship," Stanfield said.

Correction

■ In Thursday's Collegian, it was incorrectly reported in the article titled "Council, SGA elections to merge" that Jon Beall was the president of the Engineering Student Council. The article should have stated Beall was the vice president of the Engineering Student Council.

■ In Thursday's editorial, it was incorrectly reported that an amendment would cut Student Senate's UFM allocation to zero. The amendment wanted to cut the $10,350 UFM salary allocation, but the other $1,350 Senate allocates to UFM for postage, printing and honorariums would not be affected by the amendment.

Clarification

■ In Tuesday's editorial, it was suggested that the Escort Service expand to accommodate off-campus students and students living in greek housing. The editorial should have mentioned that the Escort Service does escort off-campus students, faculty and staff up to one block off of campus. Also, the service escorts faculty and staff on campus.

▶ RECREATION

Put down remote, pick up flotation device

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

Picture yourself skiing across the plains, braving the arctic frost or rafting the Rio Grande. Then picture yourself sitting in front of the tube with your dog eating beernuts and watching reruns of "Saved By the Bell."

Hmmm. Which sounds better?

The Union Program Council Outdoor Recreation Committee has got trips of all sorts, for the brave and the not-so-brave at heart, planned out for this spring that will get you off that couch.

"One of our next events is the cold-weather camping," Arlen Olberding, head of the committee, said.

The Arctic Adventure will take place in the Indian Cave State Park in Nebraska.

"It's really actually cheap for a weekend," Olberding said.

"How many people can go out for a weekend to the bars and not spend 30 to 50 bucks? This trip includes all your food, camping permits, camping stoves and a lot of the other things you need. And you're actually getting out and doing something as opposed to drinking your life away."

The only things that the cost does not cover in any of the overnight trips are the tent, the sleeping bag and the transportation to the event.

"We tried to keep the cost down so college students could afford to go. If we provided group transportation for some of the longer trips, it would jack the price up another 50 to 100 dollars per person. Students can do better on their own," Olberding said.

Another advantage to taking your own car is the freedom and mobility it gives you, he said.

"Grand Canyon is right near Las Vegas. We have an extra Sunday toward the end of the trip, so if people want to go over to Las Vegas for a day, that's cool."

The Grand Canyon trip offers an opportunity for participants to descend into the depths of the canyon.

"We have three different trail levels, all with running water," Olberding said of the Grand Canyon trip.

"Two of them are fairly easy, and the third one is more difficult and requires at least some backpacking experience. We're sending three groups of eight people down into the canyon backpacking for a week."

The trips are not guided, much like the other activities sponsored by the committee.

"It's kind of a learning situation. You go out there on your own. We'll give you the tools you need to survive and get through it, but we're not there to guide you by the hand," Olberding said.

If that sounds scary, don't worry. There will be one or two outdoor rec people who are experienced in these activities, and in most of these trips, people will emerge as leaders, Olberding said.

For those people not particularly fond of making this kind of a hike, a group of about 20 people will remain on the rim for day hiking trips, Olberding said.

The rafting trip, an alternative spring-break trip, will send students swirling down the Rio Grande River near Big Bend, Texas.

This experience includes two to three days of actual rafting during the beginning of high-water season and a trip to Big Bend.

"It's a huge, beautiful park, kind of into the desert, with lots of hiking trails. You can cross the river to Mexico or go mountain biking, rock climbing or rappelling," Olberding said.

One of the events coming up before spring break is ice skating at Kansas's City's Crown Center.

The afternoon on the ice can be complemented with a little bit of shopping in downtown Kansas City and an interdivision matchup between the Kansas City Blades and Houston hockey teams in the evening. Students return to the University on Saturday night.

Another pre-spring-break event is cross-country skiing. Cross-country skiing is something not a lot of people would associate with Kansas, but Olberding and the committee are going to make it happen (if there's snow).

"Expect a good workout," Olberding said.

Another thing students can expect is a bonding experience, Olberding said.

"A lot of the people we get on some of our longer camping trips are international students and freshman," Olberding said.

"It's a great way to meet people. On almost every single trip I've been on, everybody bonds. There's just something about sitting around a campfire roasting marshmallows."

▶ 'BELL CURVE'

Speaker denounces both ends of curve in IQ issue

SERA L. TANK
Collegian

The "Bell Curve" is history in a way that is frightening and demeaning to both ends of the bell curve, said Sander Gilman, professor from the University of Chicago.

Gilman spoke Thursday night in the K-State Union Little Theatre about the other end of the infamous book "The Bell Curve" by Richard Herrnstein and Charles Murray — the theory of Jewish super-intelligence.

"The way to look at the 'Bell Curve' is looking at both ends of the bell curve," he said. "Being at either end of the bell curve is not a good thing. Being seen as different becomes a weapon used against the group."

Gilman said that although the book never actually comes out and says it is trying to group people in racial stereotypes, it does.

"It doesn't take a enormous amount of intelligence to figure out that the bottom line of what Herrnstein and Murray say is the relationship between groups of races and intelligence," he said.

What Gilman said he is afraid of is people taking what he calls a crackpot science and believing it to be the absolute truth.

"My anxiety about the Herrnstein and Murray book is that it looks like science, but it doesn't smell like science.

"What it smells like it is a complicated way of trying to talk about a permanent underclass we want to control and a permanent overclass we want to become."

Gilman said another disturbing aspect of the "Bell Curve" is that it perpetuates stereotypes like the black athlete and the Jewish nerd.

"Myth-making affects people in real ways. Myth-making is the way that culture wants to see the world, but it's also the way culture can move the world," he said.

Gilman also commented on the racial tension between Jews and African Americans.

"Blacks and Jews are put at opposite ends of the spectrum in an interesting way in which they can be played off of each other," he said.

James Machor, associate professor of English, said Gilman's theory was significant in the understanding of today's social issues.

"It's important to helping us understand what is going on now in the discussion of intelligence and race," he said.

Janet Cooper, graduate student in English, said she disagreed with the conclusions of the "Bell Curve" and believed it will cause more racial problems and tensions.

"I really think the statistics used in the 'Bell Curve' have frightening potential," she said.

"Myth-making affects people in real ways. Myth-making is the way that culture wants to see the world, but it's also the way culture can move the world."

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

College councils should merge elections

Merging and simplifying elections would increase participation in the council elections.

The Elections Committee wants to merge college councils' elections with Student Governing Association elections.

This is an exemplary idea.

Presently, college councils' elections are conducted at different locations at different times of the year.

Merging and simplifying elections would increase participation in the council elections.

It would also reduce the cost and labor needed to run the elections. The merger would also bring consistency to election regulations.

The Board of Student Publications, Fine Arts Council and Union Governing Board all have successfully merged their elections with Student Senate elections.

The Arts and Sciences Council is the only council that has decided to take SGA up on its offer to merge elections this year.

The Agriculture Council is considering merging with SGA or having their elections at the same time.

The merge will be mandatory next year, but we would urge other councils to join SGA this spring.

It would save time and money. More importantly, it would increase participation.

Father's death brings back memories

MOHAMMAD AHSAN

Your children are not your children
They are the sons and daughters of Life's longing for itself.
They come through you but not from you,
And though they are with you, yet they belong not to you.
Kahlil Gibran
The Prophet

One year ago last month, my father died in a hospital in Bangladesh.

I had not seen him since eight months before his death.

I shall not see him again.

Stephen Hawking tells us that the black holes are "a country from which no traveler returns."

When objects fall into the black hole, they go off into a baby universe.

Perhaps death devours life and transports it to another universe.

Once dead, nobody returns to this life.

My father wanted to die, and he never wished to return.

He often joked that he had lived more than a human's share of life, because God had originally intended for man to live 25 years. It was only at man's insistence that God borrowed 25 years each from horse, dog and monkey to increase man's longevity to 100 years. But a man lives like a human being for the first 25 years of his life. After that, he runs like a horse, barks like a dog and looks like a monkey each 25 years in that order.

My father had transformed many times within these transformations.

As a boy, he was already running like a horse, peddling candles and incense sticks in the village market and helping three elder brothers in their trades.

In adulthood, he ran even more as a lawyer, politician and provider, imbibed with obsessive faith in man's capacity to fashion his fate.

But in the end, he believed that man is fashioned by his fate.

The opposite of that is "the illusion of a drifting a man who throws his arms and legs in the current and thinks that he has been actually swimming."

A disciple once asked his master what was the difference between peace and war. The wise man replied that peace is when sons bury their fathers, while fathers bury sons during the war.

My father died in peacetime, but he lived in a state of war.

He had engaged in a kind of Newtonian physics of semiotics in hostility with the rest of the world. Most things in the world embittered him. Most things he did or said embarrassed family and friends.

All wars have irony about them. They spare the dead and spook the living. Thucydides and Euripides demonstrated that the shocks of the Peloponnesian war had created tension in Athenian society. The war brutalized and corrupted all morals, challenged old rules of behaviors and, above all, undermined one of the primary conditions of social bonding in fifth-century Athens: A man chosen for polis, or social responsibility, had to prove he had been responsible with oikos, or family, first.

The war of independence in Bangladesh in 1971 had reversed that rule on my father. He had taken the losing side in that war, and his bitterness with the polis had constricted his ability to love the oikos.

Political failure had greatly impaired his paternal functions.

But part of that malfunction may have been congenital. He was born after the death of his father, never knowing how to measure up to that role.

In Macbeth, Lady MacDuff describes the paradox in her son's life: "Father'd he is, and yet he is fatherless." My father ingested that paradox at birth, concealing in his consciousness the congealed pain of that critical loss.

It held him as though in a centripetal force of psychodynamics; the scion forever roamed in search of his sire.

Perhaps a father lives in the genetic memory of his son ever since the two come together in the amniotic depth. One year before he died, an old man visited my father in a dream and claimed to be his father. Rilke had despaired that "nowhere does the circle close." The circle had closed for my father after that cathartic meeting. The fatherless son who had become a father himself relapsed to filial excitement as if he really saw the father he had not seen before. Doctors had given him five years with his kidneys. He wanted to die in six months.

The man in the dream had asked him to meet again shortly.

When things fall into a black hole, they never come out. Whereas nothing falls into the white hole, but everything comes out of it.

Life shuffles through eternity from father to son, from homoousios to homoiousis, going from homunculus the progenitor to homunculus the progeny. It vanishes into the father to be visible in the son.

A certain tribe in Africa believed that every time a person was photographed, it peeled a layer of his life. Memory does the opposite. It is a cryonics that preserves what has already perished. My father and I are not not going to meet again, but we shall stay together forever in a contradiction. I shall remember him every time I miss him. And I shall miss him every time I remember him.

Minimum wage brings more troubles, not relief

JEREMY STEPHENS

A few weeks ago, during one of the longest State of the Union addresses in history, President Clinton urged support for his proposal to raise the minimum wage by 90 cents over a two-year period, making $5.10 the lowest legal wage in the country.

His reasoning for this is that the buying power of the dollar just isn't what it was a decade ago. I'm sure Clinton would attribute this to The Greed that he believes swept this country in the 1980s like a plague but suddenly disappeared when he took office because he cared more than his predecessors. However, back in the real world, it works quite a bit differently.

For those who are currently receiving minimum wage (for example, college students), this might sound like a dream come true, but in reality it often makes what little we make worth even less.

Politicians like to talk about raising the minimum wage because handing out money in the form of minimum wage increases has been highly approved in opinion polls. This is because people equate more money with more stuff. However, more money does not necessarily mean more stuff. In essence, it comes down to the fact that although you have more to spend, it now costs more to make everything.

For example, if the minimum wage was 50 cents, and the price of a bottle of Snapple (we will discuss this in terms of Snapple because I like it, especially pink lemonade) was 10 cents, I would actually be worse off if I was making $5 an hour, and Snapple suddenly cost $3, because it had to pay all its workers $5 an hour. In fact, Snapple would cost me three times (in real dollars) more than it did before, even though my wage was increased by 1,000 percent.

Minimum wage is a useless measure of buying power if you do not consider how much prices increase as well. The government can prove this to itself.

According to Department of Labor statistics, the minimum wage increased every year between 1975 and 1980 with the exception of 1977.

During this five-year period, the minimum wage increased by 47.6 percent. However, the Consumer Price Index also rose 53.1 percent, which actually made wages worth less than before the government adjusted them.

So while politicians were smiling in Washington because they just "increased buying power," workers on minimum wage were making less, and sadly, most of them didn't even know it.

However, when the market is left alone, one would be surprised as to how well it preserves buying power. During the five-year period of 1984 to 1989, the minimum wage was not raised once, and the Consumer Price Index only rose 19.3 percent. This is inflation of roughly 4 percent, which many economists find to be healthy for an economy.

A healthy economy allows companies to raise wages on its own so workers do not feel the increase.

Since it is quite obvious that raising the minimum wage does not actually increase buying power, let us look at other aspects of the debate.

There can be no doubt that jobs will be lost when the minimum wage is raised. This is especially true in the area of small business, which employs more than half of all working Americans and is the most susceptible to rising costs.

Not only that, but those who are earning more than minimum wage now will begin to find their wages are worth less because prices will increase, and a minimum-wage increase does not guarantee an increase in their salary.

For soon-to-be graduates, this means the tight job market just got tighter, because if a firm finds it difficult just to keep the employees it already has, it will not readily seek to expand.

And unlike the K-State admissions policy, jobs will not be provided in the coming globally competitive market simply because one possesses a pulse and resides in a certain state.

In addition, the phenomenon best described by Ross Perot as the "giant sucking sound" of American jobs moving to foreign countries in search of cheaper labor will become louder than ever before. It is not a very pleasant sound.

The question of whether to raise the minimum wage is a moral and ethical one as well.

When taxes are raised or the minimum wage is increased, Congress is effectively taking money from one part of its constituency and giving it to another part.

For those who ask, "Are you saying we should get rid of taxes and the minimum wage?" let me respond.

I am not saying we should get rid of taxes, because they are necessary for the existence of the country, although I question the need for confiscatory rates.

However, the minimum wage is a different issue. To quote a recent commercial, I would answer, "Yes, I Am." (And I work for minimum wage, too.)

A minimum wage means Congress has the power to determine how much one's labor is worth.

For a Congress that can't even balance the budget, how can it determine what every firm in America can afford?

The concern that the removal of the minimum wage would cause even greater hardship for those who support a family on minimum wage is not without cause.

However, making everyone suffer equally should not be the goal of government. What about families who are already making $5.10? Just because the minimum wage is increased does not mean they will get a similar raise.

I do not propose to throw it out overnight, but to phase it out, so those whose work is worth the current minimum wage will retain that or make even more when a company has more monies freed up to reward those who deserve it. Unfortunately, this is a strange concept to a government that gives itself raises every year in the form of COLAs.

The question is whether or not we are willing to endure a period of discomfort for a short period followed by long-term prosperity or be content with a slow downward spiral of government intervention in the market until we are all equally worse off.

Cougars aren't domestic animals

Dear editor,

This letter is in response to Kristin Brighton's article about pet cougars in the Feb. 6 Collegian. There is much more to be considered in the private ownership of wild animals than was mentioned in Brighton's article. Their environmental, nutritional and medical requirements demand resources the average family cannot provide in fairness to the animal. Chaining a cougar or other large cat in a yard is obviously not acceptable, as well as free access to the house or constantly being penned. Large carnivorous cats such as cougars, lions and tigers are wild animals. Even if captive-borne, their instincts are still very strong, unlike a domesticated dog or cat. Even though the animal may be raised with children, they are not domesticated animals. They pose a definite danger to humans and livestock. Depicting a cougar as cuddly as a kitten with a child on the front of the Collegian is irresponsible and falsely generalizes these animals as domesticated and friendly as a housecat.

Finally, the bill proposed in the Kansas Legislature to require licensure for ownership of a wild, exotic animal is a step in the right direction. The nutritional, environmental and medical care required for proper care of a wild animal is not cheap. "Up to $500" initially should not be a problem for someone prepared to take on these responsibilities. There are many more things to consider to be fair to both animal and human than was mentioned in this article.

▶ GRADUATION

Fee is an overcharge

Dear editor,

I would like to respond to the new graduation fee in the Jan. 24 Collegian. To me, a fee to graduate from a school where they overcharge you to attend is a little ridiculous.

Just last fall, we, the students at K-State, were overcharged an approximate amount of $17,000 at enrollment. Why can't this amount be placed in a fund and let the interest pay for the facilities, printing and the diplomas instead of bike racks that do not benefit most students?

Graduation benefits most students. If the Provost office has handled the cost to graduate before, why shouldn't they cover it now? The excuse that the account is "too costly for the Provost office to handle" just doesn't wash with me. The Provost has handled it up to now — why not continue?

I know that when I graduate from college, the last thing I will want to do will be to pay another $15 to walk down an aisle and across a stage.

▶ PARKING PROPOSAL

Cheaper alternatives are needed

Dear editor,

In my opinion, building a parking garage in the middle of Memorial Stadium is a dreadful idea for a variety of reasons. Besides the fact that it would destroy a beautiful track and field that are used with great regularity, the fact that this glorious parking garage is estimated to cost an extravagant $10 to $12 million and the fact that most of the parking problem could be solved if people were a little less concerned with spending 20 minutes waiting for a parking place five minutes from their class rather than finding a space immediately and walking 10 minutes, I find that the most ludicrous fact about the whole proposal is that the administration has recommended a solution (to a problem that many people are yet convinced really exists) that costs millions of dollars over one that would cost virtually nothing, i.e. restrictions on sale of parking permits to students who live within a certain distance from campus. In this time of conservative budgets and careful spending, can we really afford this lavish project? I sure wouldn't throw out my car for a new one if I thought that I could fix the problem for $50, and I certainly would check it out before I went shopping for a new car. So much for resourcefulness and frugality.

"In this time of conservative budgets and careful spending, can we really afford this project?"

Smatterings

BY ANDREW TOMB

Smatterings are always the 100% truth. We never make up quotes or distort the facts. I am NOT making any of this stuff up. Ask my parents, they know!

Lawn mowers — cutting the grass at Mach 10

When I was about 13, I rolled my parents' riding lawnmower into a ravine.

That was pretty stupid.

Usually, I would not share, but at this year's Five-State Free Fair in Liberal, one of the featured machines will be the 150-horsepower, jet-turbine-powered monster mower piloted a few seasons ago on television's "Home Improvement" by Tim Allen.

"That thing can mow a football field in 14.2 minutes," fair director Leo Schinstock said of the ultimate mower, which is powered by a helicopter engine. "That's really haulin' grass."

(Insert mandatory drum fill here.)

Thank you, thank you very much.

The race will be one of nine such events sanctioned by the — hold your breath — U.S. Lawn Mower Racing Association this year.

The competitors will race over a quarter-mile grand prix-style course in three different classes. Last year at the national finals, one mower was clocked at 48 mph on the straightaway.

Unfortunately, no grass will be cut, because of silly safety precautions mandating that all the blades be removed before any racing begins.

There will be no grab-ass playing in my pool. No damn bikinis either!

Those itsy-bitsy bikinis have run into a big problem: the mayor.

It looks like Fairfield, Ala., mayor Larry Langford has banned skimpy swimsuits — men's and women's — from the $680,000 indoor municipal pool that's scheduled to open in March in the Birmingham suburb.

Going along with a statewide movement against nekkidness, pool patrons will have to wear a swimsuit that leaves all to the imagination.

"We will have no tops coming off in that pool," Langford said. "This is a family pool."

Right on, Mayor — I suppose there will be no playing grab-ass, either. Response to the dress code has been mixed since Langford revealed the rules to City Council on Monday night.

Joanna Massey, who works in the cafeteria at Fairfield High School, believes swimmers "should have something covered" at the pool.

But former school board member Woodrow Monk thinks the mayor has gone off the deep end.

"I don't think there's anything wrong with a two-piece bathing suit," Monk said, "as long as it isn't too brief." Two briefs? Now we'd like to see that one. ...

French reject near-nekkid Demi Moore. Ooh la la!

It looks as if the French can't handle the racy posters created for the film "Disclosure."

Posters for the film — called "Harassment" in France — show actress Demi Moore pinning actor Michael Douglas against a wall with her dress hiked up to her thighs.

"We have had numerous comments from people who have children," Arcachon mayor Pierre Lataillade said. "You can always shut off the TV, but in the case of posters, there wasn't any choice."

What do you expect from the country that worships Jerry Lewis as a god?

Haaaay Layyydeeee!

Last week's Migraine was Nine Inch Nails.

Playing where they can

Four joined together to make a band, practice in the available space

An Indian blanket hung from a water pipe in front of the half-sized piano, obscuring it from view. The pipe wouldn't be needed anyway.

Jeff Boren (right), freshman in environmental design, and Colin Rafferty (left), freshman in pre-professional secondary education, play one of Insipid's tunes Sunday night in Moore Hall.

On the bench scarred with years of abuse sat two Crate guitar amplifiers. The abuse continued.

A coaxial cable snaked down from the top amp to a brown, Stratocaster-style guitar. Jeff Boren rotated the tuning mechanism on the head of the guitar, keying down to D.

A full drum set sat in the corner, complete with Sabian symbols, floor toms and a big Pearl bass drum.

At its helm was a big guy with a green hat and a full-chin goatee, also known as Matt Anderson. He thumped the bass drum experimentally.

Another guitarist stood opposite Boren. He had a red-and-white Fender Squier and two more amps stacked on a table, which was bowing under the weight.

The tiny room is deep in the bowels of Moore Hall, past the vending machines peddling candy bars, potato chips and condoms, past the particle-board Ping-Pong table next to the TV area.

Here is the practice grounds for Insipid, a band that was formed about five months ago, when four Moore Hall residents became acquainted with each other.

It began with the realization that they all played different musical instruments, Anderson, freshman in environmental design, said.

"We just kind of started hanging around with each other, and we decided to start a band," he said. "It's probably your stereotypical band story."

Their first hangout was Anderson's room. Not surprisingly, four guys playing guitars and pounding on drums in a 15-by-15-foot residence-hall cubicle wasn't very popular with the neighbors.

"It's kind of loud in a dorm room," Anderson said.

After several complaints from neighbors, the band decided to change venues.

Now they can be seen hauling five amplifiers, two guitars and a drum set down the elevator to the basement's music room.

Boren, freshman in environmental design, said the hall should look into upgrading the room so all students can enjoy it more.

"It is a music room, and playing music is something students will be doing for a long time," he said. "They should look into soundproofing."

Eric Parker, freshman in modern languages, said the band has taken some of that responsibility for itself, figuring out that the water pipes that run across the ceiling help to carry the sound throughout the first two or three floors.

The band came up with an innovative solution: using duct tape to wrap blankets around the pipes, thereby cutting down on the noise levels upstairs.

"It's primitive, but it works," Parker said.

It has to work. Especially when the resident directly above the sonic blasting area is the hall director.

Bass guitarist Colin Rafferty, freshman in pre-professional secondary education, said the director has been very reasonable with the band when the music was loud.

"She could just throw us out and say, 'You're never going to do this again,' but she hasn't," he said.

Moore Hall Director Bridget Porter said the band has always complied with any requests to lower the noise.

"As a whole, we haven't had residents complain that they don't want it," she said.

Moore Hall has a confrontation policy, which requires complainants to talk with the noisemakers about the problem before administrative action is taken, Porter said.

For example, if a person playing loud music doesn't comply with the complainant's request to keep it down, the complainant can then notify the hall staff, who would reprimand the person.

Matt Anderson, freshman in environmental design, takes a break from the drums to joke around with fellow band members in between practicing songs.

▶ ASTROLOGY FORECAST

AQUARIUS (Jan. 21 - Feb. 19) This weekend could seem slow, but by Sunday night you'll be busy as usual. Focus on work from then till the end of the week, and you'll be set. It's time for you to repay that generous friend who did you that big favor last month. Love is in the air, so let it carry you away in the Valentine's Day fiesta.

PISCES (Feb. 20 - March 20) Everything seems so positive with a huge sense of clarity right now. Don't allow this peaceful time to cause you to forget your valentine. You could end up extremely jealous if you neglect those who love you most. A word of advice to all of you Pisces people: Don't spend all your money this weekend, or you'll wonder where it went next week.

ARIES (March 21 - April 20) Everyone is standing in line to claim you as their valentine. All you have to do is choose one! On Valentine's Day, that special someone may declare their love to you. Be ready for anything. For the weekend: slow down, call your family and catch up on sleep.

TAURUS (April 21 - May 21) Because you spent all of last week trying to refresh yourself, you should be well-prepared to give others attention. Close that wallet and think of this as a money-free week. If you're feeling lonely on Valentine's Day, go hang out with friends — they'll give you good moral support.

GEMINI (May 22 - June 21) Take a giant step back and look at your life from a new perspective. Is it the way you always dreamed it would be? If not, change it. Life is meant to be fun and exciting, not a bad episode of "Who's the Boss." Fickle Gemini needs to find one romantic interest and focus on that person. For the weekend: go out and spend time with someone you've been missing.

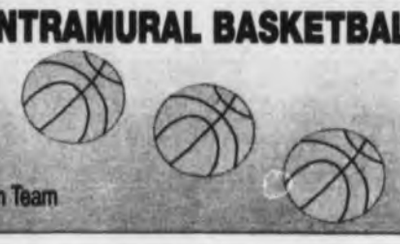
CANCER (June 22 - July 23) You could find yourself pinching for pennies if you're not careful. Leave that wallet at home and just take yourself — you're more entertaining. Romance has been everywhere but on your mind, so pay attention to that significant other for once. For the weekend: try something adventurous. It'll lift your spirits!

CHRISTY CALLOWAY

LEO (July 24 - Aug. 23) Education and career advances should be your top focus this week. Devotion to your loved ones should be second. Remain loyal to everything and every-one you love, and you won't have to regret bad choices you made earlier. For the weekend: entertain at your home.

VIRGO (Aug. 24 - Sept. 23) Last week was a time for you to collect your thoughts and be responsible because of the retrograde effect. Now you should feel more relaxed and organized. So spend this week with a friend, and before you know it, an overwhelming peace will fill your life again. Be social this weekend, and you'll meet tons of people!

LIBRA (Sept. 24 - Oct. 23) Right now, you feel as though your workload is neverending, so take time Saturday afternoon to collect your thoughts and catch up on everything. Someone new has been romancing you off your feet. If single, jump at the chance. If taken, stick to old faithful — you'll be happier in the end.



SCORPIO (Oct. 24 - Nov. 22) Stop being in such a rush to go nowhere! Take things slow and don't worry. Life is in your favor now. Pay extra attention to that personal matter that's really got you down. The moon is in Gemini, so look out for problems in the making. Valentine's Day will be total bliss for you, and everything will go as planned. For the weekend: laid-back should be your motto.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 23 - Dec. 21) Don't spend money you don't have or plan events you won't attend. Be a positive influence on a classmate or co-worker. Your Valentine's Day will be fun even if you're only with your friends. For the weekend: try a new restaurant.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 - Jan. 20) Everything seems to be moving at a steady pace, but finances are not looking too good. Learn to restrain yourself when it comes to spending. Keep your priorities straight. Work first and play second. Love is looking bright, so just go with it. For the weekend: be with your sweetheart.

K-State gets another shot at Kansas

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team will get a second shot at arch-rival Kansas this weekend.

The Cats will place their two-game winning streak on the line Sunday afternoon when the 15th-ranked Jayhawks visit Bramlage Coliseum.

Tip-off is at 2 p.m., and all K-State students get in free with a valid ID.

KU won the previous meeting 73-62 in Lawrence, beginning a five-game losing slide for the Wildcats.

"We've got good chemistry right now, and we get to play them at home," K-State coach Brian Agler said. "I don't know if that will change the outcome of the game."

"We're not doing anything special to prepare for them.

"That's not to say that we're taking this game lightly, but rather we take every game real serious," Agler said.

Kansas brings in four starters scoring double digits. Senior Angela Aycock, a Naismith Player of the Year candidate, leads the Hawks and the Big Eight in scoring, averaging 23.4 points per game.

"Kansas has very good athletes and very good individual players, and they've got one just tremendous player in Angela Aycock. Plus they bring a lot of experience," Agler said.

With Kansas bringing a balanced scoring attack, defense is key for K-State.

For the season, the Cats are just 1-5 when allowing their opponents more than 70 points.

"For us to win the game, we have to eliminate our turnovers. We'll have to do a better job on defense, especially in transition defense," Agler said.

"We've made a concerted effort to play better defense. We're getting better positioning. We're anticipating a little bit better, and we're getting good rotation.

"I think we're playing a lot better as a team defensively," he said.

Agler said it is also critical to keep the Hawks away from the foul line.

"We've really got to keep them off the free-throw line," Agler said. "Last time, they just shot an unbelievable free-throw percentage. We can't control how many free throws they make, so hopefully we can control how many they shoot."

For K-State, sitting at fifth place in the Big Eight with a 4-5 record, this Sunday's match will be critical in the conference race.

"This could be a very important game for us, mainly from the standpoint of the conference standings," Agler said.

"If we win, we pull even at .500, and at this point in the conference season there just isn't much room to make up for your losses," he said.

'SCRATCHING AND CLAWING'

Wildcats searching for wins as regular season dwindles

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

Another road game.

Another chance.

K-State, losers in seven of the last eight contests, will meet Colorado Saturday in Boulder.

The Wildcats have yet to win on the road in the Big Eight Conference.

Coach Tom Asbury said getting a win is important to the Cats' postseason hopes.

"You need wins right now if you're looking for postseason play," Asbury said.

"You're scratching and clawing to get anything you can," he said.

Tip-off is set for 2:50 p.m. in the Coors Events Center.

The Wildcats, 11-10 overall, 2-7 in the league, came into Wednesday's game against Oklahoma as the poorest-shooting team in the conference, averaging 42 percent from the field.

The Buffaloes, 10-9 overall, 1-7 in Big Eight play, lost their sixth-straight game to Nebraska Wednesday.

The loss clinched Colorado's 22nd-straight non-winning Big Eight season.

But winning in Boulder hasn't been easy for the Cats.

Since the 1989-90 season, K-State has won only once, a 74-66 victory in the 1991-92 campaign.

Leading the Buffaloes is senior guard Donnie Boyce, who is anchored in the top 10 in six league categories.

"He's pretty much their heart and soul," Asbury said.

Boyce is averaging 17.7 points, 4.9 assists and more than two steals per game in Big Eight play.

"They're dangerous just by the mere fact that they have him," Asbury said. "When you have a guy as good as he is, anything can happen."

Boyce isn't the Cats' only concern. The Buffs have other potential threats.

Senior center Ted Allen has averaged eight points and five rebounds during four games against K-State but has had problems with injuries this season.

"Allen has been hurt a little bit, but I just think he is really good," Asbury said.

Asbury is also impressed with the play of the Buffs' sophomore guard Mack Tuck.

"Tuck's been a real explosive player," he said.

Tuck is averaging 12.6 points on 45-percent shooting from the floor and is shooting 41 percent from behind the three-point line.

Asbury said he is also concerned with Colorado's bench scoring.

"Edmonds is coming off the bench and kind of giving them what some of our guys have given us off the bench," Asbury said.

"They're an athletic team and a very decent, competent basketball team."

Asbury said whether the atmosphere affects his team or not, they will have to do the basic things in order to win.

"The bottom line is you got to shoot the ball, you got to rebound, you got to defend, you got to block and tackle and do all the things necessary to win," Asbury said.

Despite Colorado's record, Asbury knows this team has to be taken seriously.

"They did something we couldn't do — beat Iowa State."

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

K-State's Kevin Lewis mauls Oklahoma's Ernie Abercrombie during the Wildcats' 81-66 loss to the Sooners in Norman Wednesday. With the loss, K-State dropped to 2-7 in Big Eight Conference play and failed to win for the seventh time in eight games. The Cats will take on the Colorado Buffaloes Saturday at 2:50 p.m. in Boulder.

Maxwell to appeal suspension, fine

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Houston guard Vernon Maxwell, suspended for 10 games and fined $20,000 for attacking a fan, will appeal his punishment, saying the NBA did not know the reasons behind his action.

"First, I don't believe the NBA has all the information about the fan's conduct that provoked this incident, and I believe the punishment would not have been as harsh if had they known about it," Maxwell said in a statement read by his attorney, Dick DeGuerin.

Maxwell said he expected to be heckled, but he reacted when the remarks became racial and obscene toward his family.

"Monday afternoon, I learned my wife had been admitted to the hospital on an emergency basis," Maxwell said. "I wanted to come back to Houston then to be with her but decided to stay and play the game.

"When he began involving my daughter Amber in his obscene, abusive and racial remarks, I decided I'd had enough, and I rushed into the stands."

Maxwell was suspended for going a dozen rows into the stands and punching a heckler during a game at Portland two nights earlier.

"This is just my reaction. But from what Vernon said about the incident, if I'd have been there, I'd have probably coldcocked him, too," DeGuerin told the Houston Chronicle and the Houston Post on Wednesday.

The man who was punched, Steve George, denied saying anything inflammatory.

In the meantime, DeGuerin put out Maxwell's side of the story.

The heckling by George would have made "Mother Teresa ... hit him with her cane," DeGuerin said.

Rovelto: Team to compete against talented field at Husker Invite

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

The track team runs into its toughest challenge of the season thus far today and Saturday at the Husker Invitational.

The annual meet at the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, Neb., requires athletes to meet qualifying times and distances in order to enter.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said K-State will send about 16 women and 13 men to the meet.

"Every event has NCAA qualifiers in it," Rovelto said. "You'll probably have to qualify for nationals to make it to the finals of an event."

Perhaps no event will be more competitive than the men's high jump.

Nebraska's Petar Malesev owns the nation's top jump with a leap of 7 feet 5 inches. His teammate Sheldon Carpenter has cleared 7'4-1/2" already this season. Both are NCAA qualifying marks.

K-State will enter Itai Margalit and Ed Broxterman in the event. Margalit has cleared the provisionally qualifying mark of 7'1" on more than one occasion.

Broxterman cleared 7'3" on Dec. 9 before a ruptured appendix prevented him from competition until Jan. 28.

"Petar has jumped well all season," Nebraska coach Gary Pepin said. "Carpenter has been a little dinged up this season, but I think he's jumping well again."

Rovelto said all of the events should be fun to watch. Last season, more than 150 athletes surpassed NCAA qualifying marks at the Husker Invitational.

"I think it's going to be a very, very competitive meet," Rovelto said. "There is no reason to think the meet won't be better than last season."

The K-State track office needs volunteers for the Big Eight Indoor Championships Feb. 24-25 as well as the NJCAA Indoor Championships March 24. Contact the track office at 532-6567.

Farrell's only entry to move for a year

Entrance may move to northwest corner in 2 weeks

JASON DURANDO
Collegian

The main entrance to Farrell Library will be relocated again.

"The best as we can determine, the entrance will move from the present location on the southeast corner to the northeast corner in about two weeks," Brice Hobrock, dean of the library, said.

The northeast corner is the corner closest to Willard Hall.

Hobrock said the move could happen as early as Feb. 23 so workers can start construction on the area where the entrance is now.

"It wouldn't surprise me much if it occurs closer to March 1," he said.

The reason for the delay is that there are still several water, steam and power lines that need to be rerouted around the building.

Jerry Carter, University architect and director of facilities planning, said a fire corridor must also be constructed on the east side of the reference department in order to connect the south stairs.

"The transition of the entrance was supposed to occur between semesters, but there were some delays. In order to be in agreement with the fire marshall, the main stairs must have a fire corridor," he said.

Hobrock said the movement of the entrance should occur overnight, but it could take longer.

"The movement of the entrance should occur overnight, but it is possible for there to be a few days in transition," he said. "There is literally construction all around us. The contractor wants 360-degree access to the building, so it will inconvenience some people, but it has to be done."

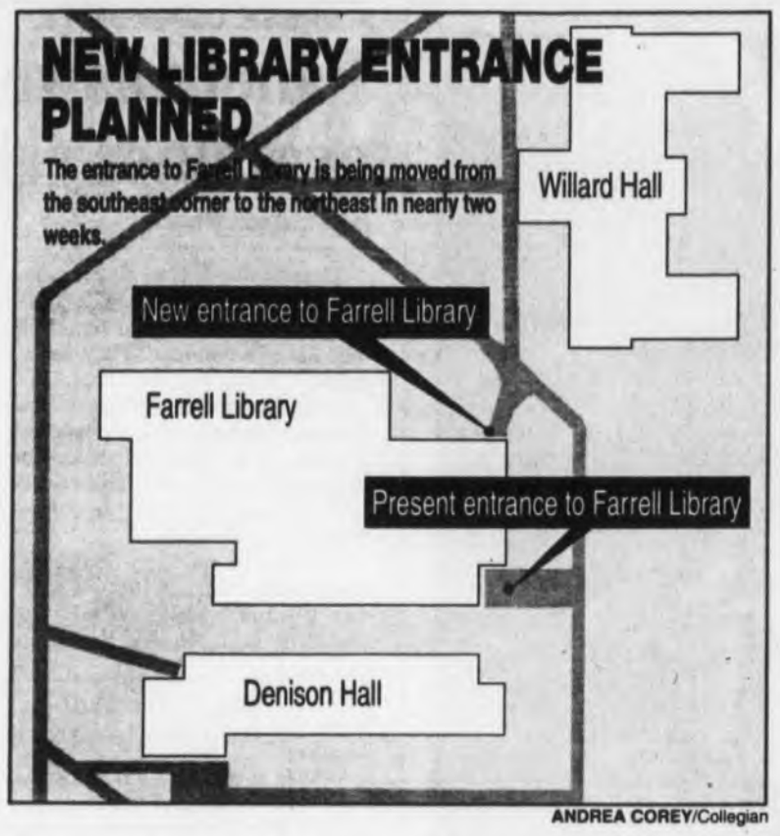
The move is only a temporary one, Hobrock said.

"It would remain there for about 12 to 14 months and then move again to the northwest corner so construction can finish on the northeast corner," he said.

Computing and Network Services, which is located in the basement of Farrell, may be temporarily inconvenienced by the move of the door. It uses the basement to house some of its larger mainframes and computer systems, which serve the entire K-State computer system.

When the door is moved, power may have to be cut to CNS.

Larry Robertson, operations supervisor for CNS, said there could be some temporary problems with the mainframe.



"We were told that they might have to cut power to us for a short time, but we still don't know how that will affect the mainframe. It might just be for an hour or less," Robertson said.

This means the computers in offices like the registrar's office and the enrollment center could temporarily be shut down.

Robertson said although the main construction right now involves the basement, CNS has not had any problems with the construction so far. However, he said he was a little worried about access to the center.

"As long as they can get in, they can find us," Robertson said.

Carter said the rest of the library construction is still on schedule.

▶ BOARD OF REGENTS

Bicknell appointment rejected

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Senate on Thursday rejected the appointment of Gene Bicknell, one of the state's most prominent businessmen, to the Kansas Board of Regents.

Bicknell's nomination was thwarted by Senate Republicans on a 20-20 vote, one vote short of confirmation. Thirteen Democrats and seven Republicans voted for confirmation.

"It's very disappointing," his wife, Rita, said after watching the vote from the Senate gallery.

Bicknell, a two-time GOP candidate for governor, alienated many Republicans after he lost the August 1994 primary to Gov. Bill Graves.

The primary campaign turned bitter toward the end, and a month later Bicknell endorsed the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Jim Slattery. He made the endorsement despite a pledge he had signed in February 1994 to support the Republican candidate for governor, regardless of who it was.

In October, outgoing Democratic Gov. Joan Finney, who did not seek re-election, appointed him to the board. He began serving immediately for a term that was to expire Dec. 31, 1996.

After Graves took office, he did not express opposition to Bicknell's appointment and did not publicly intervene.

Some Republicans suggested it appeared as if Finney appointed Bicknell to the board in exchange for his endorsement of the Democratic candidate. Bicknell denied the allegation when he testified before the Senate Education Committee.

Bicknell, a self-made Pittsburg millionaire, holds a master's degree in business administration. He served on the school board in Pittsburg and as the city's mayor.

He unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for governor in 1986, as well as last year.

NIN show picketed by Phelps' followers

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER
Collegian

While Fred Phelps' entourage protested, Nine Inch Nails sent the packed Kansas Expocentre into a downward spiral of sight and sound.

The brainchild of avant-garde rock artist Trent Reznor, NIN performed Wednesday night in Topeka. Opening was Seattle's Melvins and the Jim Rose Circus.

Melvins replaced Pop Will Eat Itself, who canceled because of illness, said Soo Hyun of Formula Public Relations. The crowd seemed to appreciate the grungy Melvins more than they probably would have liked PWEI's synth rock.

The Jim Rose Circus defies description. Simply put, Jim Rose is the "massacre of ceremonies" of, and occasional participant in, a human torture act.

Here are a few of the printable tricks.

Mark E. Ray, a guitarist who helps play the music during the circus, put down his axe to have a concrete block smashed on his chest while he lay on a bed of swords.

The tattoo-covered second half of the circus' musical duo was the Enigma. He stepped from behind the keys to swallow a sword and then bend over with it still in his gullet.

Rose's long-time cohort, the Amazing Mr. Lifto, hoisted a concrete block on a chain attached to his nipple rings while Rose chanted, "Lactate! Lactate!" and "I see milk!"

The final performer was

Despite the differences among fraternities and sororities on this campus, they discovered one thing they have in common. They are all greek.

Panhellenic Council, Black Pan-Hellenic Council and Interfraternity Council at K-State discussed the differences and similarities between each system Thursday in the K-State Union Courtyard.

"I want to work on continuing improving relations between the two groups," Mike Mcree, IFC president, said. "Having the groups get together, we have had good luck in the past. We thought we would try something different during noontime to improve attendance."

About 25 people attended the forum, and questions from the audience were answered by panel members from each organization.

Mcree explained the responsibilitiy of IFC.

"We oversee 25 different fraternities on this campus. One major difference between the black fraternities and us is we have open rush. You can join anytime during

Baritone's tour stops at McCain

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

MUSIC
Wolfgang Holzmair, a chamber musician and baritone, will perform at 3 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium. Tickets cost $16 for the general public and $8 for students and children.

Wolfgang Holzmair, a critically acclaimed chamber musician and Austrian baritone, will perform at 3 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium as part of his third-consecutive North American tour.

Holzmair began the tour in New York City at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He then stopped in Detroit, Berkeley and a few other U.S. cities. The last date on this short U.S. leg of his tour is Sunday.

The music Holzmair is performing on this tour includes Mahler #8, Haydn's "L'anima del Filosofo" and Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer." On his European tour, he will perform three of Schubert's song cycles and make his La Scala debut.

Holzmair didn't always study music. He graduated from the Vienna University of Economics and then enrolled in the Vienna Academy of Music and Dramatic Arts to study voice and lieder, a type of German art song.

Lieder is one of Holzmair's most popular styles of music. He is considered to be the best at performing lieder currently on tour.

"I don't know that he has a favorite composer or a piece of music," Christine Rogers, publicity manager for Shaw Concerts Inc., said. "However, Schubert (a prominent lieder composer) suits him very well."

More than just a lieder singer, Holzmair has performed with major opera companies in Europe and will make his La Scala debut in late 1995 and his U.S. debut in early 1996.

A well-known chamber performer, Holzmair regularly tours Europe with the Trio Fontenay.

Now recording exclusively for Philips Classics, Holzmair has an extensive discography of music, with numerous lieder from several composers included.

Holzmair likes to perform a variety of different parts. He is currently studying a role in Wagner's "Die Metstersinger."

"You have to give the audience something special," Holzmair said in an article in the Jan. 26 edition of the Bay Area Reporter.

"A good voice isn't enough. I can feel right away if an audience is with me. And if they are, I can dare to take risks, to go even more deeply into the music."

BSU pageant open to all students

Dear Cassandra,

Why is it acceptable for there to be a Mr. and Ms. Black Student Union pageant (conducted in Union Station this past weekend)?

If we are supposed to be equals, why do I see blacks creating a separation they supposedly fought so hard to overcome?

Signed, Oppressed

Dear Oppressed,

There's no rule that you can't join if you're not black. Join BSU. Not only would you have the opportunity to see what they're really about and what they do for all people and not just people of color, but you'll have plenty of time to work on that misguided and whining attitude before the contest.

Crack a smile, lose easy money

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

Grover flew out in a magic red cape.

Bob Goldthwaite screamed about tongue sandwiches, and a man came out in a werewolf costume.

While the crowd of about 100 was roaring with laughter, the student sitting in the chair couldn't crack a smile.

Krack Me Up, a comedy act that tours colleges across the country, offered $25 to any student who could last through three minutes of impressions, jokes and outrageous costumes without cracking a smile.

Audience members were asked to drop their names in a box before the show, and then after 45 minutes of stand-up comedy, the contestants were chosen.

Laura Walker, senior in criminology, said her friends put her name in before she arrived at the Union Station Thursday night.

"I knew they were going to call my name, and sure enough, I was the first one," Walker said.

Walker said she was so nervous she was shaking on the stage.

"Super Grover is one of my favorites on Sesame Street," Walker said. "I thought I was going to lose it. The second one was irritating so it was easy not to laugh at him, and for the last guy, I said, 'Hey, I made it this far — I'm getting 25 bucks.'"

Walker said she didn't think she was going to make it through all of the one-minute sketches by the comedians.

"I didn't think I would last more than 10 seconds," she said.

The next two contestants burst into laughter after being taunted by puppets and a guy who had a hard time getting dates.

Angela McClure, K-State alumna, said she had a tactic for surviving the three minutes of comedy.

"I would bite the inside of my mouth," McClure said. "It worked as a child."

Craig Harms, junior in biology and pre-medicine, said he enjoyed all three of the comedians.

"It's great," Harms said. "They're funny. I like their material. After watching them, honestly, I'm not sure if I could make it through."

To tickle the crowd's funny bones before they got up on stage as contestants, each comedian performed a 15-minute routine.

MIKE WELCHHANS/Collegian

Laura Walker, senior in criminal justice, celebrates her win after Kevin McPeek and two other Crack Me Up comedians failed to make her laugh Thursday night at K-State Union Station.

Kevin McPeek, who has been a comedian for the past five years, walked out from behind the colorful Krack Me Up screen in a black cowboy hat and black clothes.

"I'll bet you all are saying the Marlboro Man really let himself go," McPeek said.

McPeek then reenacted a typical conversation on a 900 number.

As he held up an imaginary phone and shifted his eyes, he said, "Yeah, I'm 18. I'm wearing a T-Shirt and jeans. What are you going to do to me? Oh ... hi, Mom."

McPeek finished off his routine by talking about the beauty of driver's-license pictures.

"When an officer pulled me off the road, he looked at it and said, 'This isn't you,'" McPeek said. "Then I said, wait a minute."

Then McPeek squished up his face and said the officer then said, "Yeah, it is you."

The second comedian to come out from behind the curtain was Joel Zimmer, who has opened for Adam Sandler.

Zimmer did everything from impersonating Axl Rose in the church choir to cracking jokes about his days in college.

Part of his routine was also his experience at a dance club, when his co-workers taught him the "Water Sprinkler Dance."

He waved his arms in the air and rotated his hips back and forth. Then, he did the "Lawnmower Dance," where he kicked an imaginary lawnmower.

Singer mocks Phelps, destroys keyboards

The final performer, the Armenian Rubber Man, pulled his body through the head of a tennis racket for the audience.

Then came NIN.

Reznor leaned into the backlit sweat-yellow scrim hiding the stage a few times before tearing it down to kick off the violent "Mr. Self Destruct," the opening cut of "The Downward Spiral" album. The crowd surged dangerously towards him.

The next song was "Sin." The guitar-driven live version sent the crowd into a tumult. Reznor wrapped himself in audio tape before pretending to rape guitarist/bassist/keyboardist Danny Lohner. The keyboard Lohner was abusing teetered before all three fell to the stage.

The next song was the "March of the Pigs." In spite of a computer glitch that put the music out of synch, the crowd went berzerk.

During this song, Reznor spoke about the anti-homosexual picketers outside the arena.

"The pigs picketing outside can all go straight to hell," Reznor said before launching the song into an extended ending.

A few songs later came the highlight of the show. The most intimate piece from "The Downward Spiral," a track called "Hurt, was performed behind a projection screen. The black-and-white film shown on it explored the Zeitgeist of postmodern existence: the angst, the senseless brutality, the death.

The band launched into a few more songs before NIN destroyed its keyboards during "Down In It." They tore into "Head Like a Hole" with help from Mark E. Ray before leaving the stage.

By then, the guitar grind, the heavy strobe lighting, the violent tantrums of the band and the globs of computer-driven noise could have sated most. It was only fitting that NIN came back to perform its homage to sensory overload, "Closer."

At the song's end, Reznor mentioned the picketers again.

"My god doesn't hate fags. My god hates people like those assholes outside," Reznor said.

NIN played a few more songs then left for good.

In concert, Reznor creates a theater of noise, pain, aggression and release. The live shows are highly recommended to anyone who likes to slam it up or sit, observe and listen to something out of the ordinary.

Black greeks stress lifetime loyalty at forum

the year. Open rush provides a more relaxed atmosphere," Mcree said.

Debbie Gill, Panhellenic president, said the 12 sororities at K-State have formal rush dates, not an open rush year-round like the fraternities.

Black fraternities and sororities each have individual ways of obtaining new members.

"Each organization has its own different process of getting new members. We call it the intake process," said Dionne Lewis, vice president for Black Pan-Hellenic Council.

Lewis explained that the intake process differs depending on the organization's national rules. These rules are kept secret.

Black greek organizations also emphasize a lifetime commitment starting in the collegiate years.

"They have a continuing history and affiliation that goes on beyond the college years. It is national and international," Freeman Davis, adviser to the Black Pan-Hellenic Council, said.

Black fraternities and sororities also differ in that they do not have houses where all their members live together.

"There are some unique things about us. We don't have houses. We don't feel it is an important part to keep strong among each other," Lewis said.

Black Pan-Hellenic Council is in charge of eight black greek organizations. Lewis said each one individually is unique compared with the others.

They work within the community and have social gatherings with each other.

Concern was brought up by Elsa Diaz-Bautista, graduate student in business administration, about keeping organization within a sorority without a house.

Lewis said the best way for them to handle business is to shift the responsibilities among each other.

"We are constantly working as a team. You just do the best you can with what you have," Lewis said.

Working together comes into play in all aspects of fraternities and sororities, so they set time aside to go on retreats to get away together, Gill said.

Faculty benefits rank below peers commitment of our faculty," Coffman said.

John Bunch, associate professor in business management, said faculty members who will leave because of the low salaries are the ones K-State really wants to keep, but they move on because someone else is paying more.

The issue includes salaries, but fringe benefits are also a problem for K-State, Ron Downey, director of institutional research and analysis, said.

"You can't hire someone with just a salary. A university or college must also have competitive fringe benefits and start-up packages for research opportunities," he said.

Downey said K-State is competing with Stanford and other peer institutions, which offer competitive salaries, fringe benefits and research possibilities.

"We must play to the market offering competitive salaries, but then salaries must continue to increase. Otherwise, the gap between K-State salaries and other peer institution salaries becomes wider and wider," he said.

Miles McKee, professor of animal science and industry, said high salaries for entering faculty members is not always positive.

"It's almost bad to hire people at a high starting salary and then not be able to increase the salaries of faculty who have been here awhile," he said.

Low faculty morale is a side effect of low salaries and uncompetitive benefits, Bunch said.

"As you become an older faculty member, the newer faculty member receives higher pay than someone who has been here for two years. This in turn causes low faculty morale," he said.

Downey said in recent years K-State's budget has decreased in terms of contribution, but tuition keeps going up and up.

Solutions to the salary deficit must come from the state government, which funds all public institutions, including K-State and the University of Kansas, he said.

"Legislators see that a professor is making twice what someone from their hometown is making and views this as doing quite well for themselves. Therefore, they don't see the need to increase salaries," Downey said.

Downey also expressed concern that the Legislature did not seem to understand the needs of K-State or those of the other publicly funded institutions to keep up with the competition.

"We are not competing against the small-town people. We are competing with universities for our professors with the salaries and fringe benefits that we can provide," Downey said.

Coffman said this challenge must be addressed through state legislatures.

"Year in, year out, faculty salaries have always been top priority. The University and the regents have been extremely aggressive in pushing salaries through the legislative process," he said.

Downey pointed out that any salary increases will only go to faculty who have merited it according to their superiors.

Coffman concluded that K-State will not give up on finding ways to increase K-State salaries, although there are problems.

"No legislature can commit for a future legislature, so how long it will take for K-State to catch up is simply not predictable," he said.

Band rocks residence hall

The residents who could be most affected by Insipid's basement playing are the first-floor residents, including Porter. So far, it hasn't been much of a problem, Porter said.

"We had a floor meeting, and I told everyone there was a band practicing downstairs," she said. "They said, 'If we're disturbed, we'll tell them to stop.'"

This puts a fairly long leash on Insipid, allowing the band to play on.

"We usually play 'til somebody tells us to be quiet," Parker said.

Besides common courtesy, the band has other reasons to carefully choose when they can play.

"We don't do it if we have tests to study for or other stuff to do," Boren said.

Next semester, the band members are planning to leave the residence-hall circuit and get a house to practice in, Boren said. In the meantime, the band hopes to find a vocalist or write some lyrics, then hit the bar scene.

"I think we all want to go somewhere with this," Porter said.

"We are still trying to get some stuff worked out — add some more songs and get some mikes before contacting anyone."

Rafferty said the band's current goal is to play a show before April.

If you do happen to catch the band in a local bar, you won't hear anything you've heard before. Insipid is adamant about its refusal to play cover songs.

"I've got this thing against cover bands," Porter said. "I think the worst band that writes its own material is better than the best band that plays someone else's music," he said.

Rafferty puts it in spiritual terms.

"A cover band is still a cover band," he said. "We wanted to give expression to our creative energies."

against my old adviser," he said.

According to reports published by the College of Agriculture, ag education is ranked second in starting salaries, with salaries somewhere between $26,000 and $28,000. It is just behind feed science.

Ag teachers make $4,000 to $5,000 more than a typical education teacher. They have extended contracts and more responsibility. There is also on-site supervision and FFA contests, Harbstreit said.

The demand for ag-education teachers is continuing and is expanding at the local level.

Harbstreit said K-State needs to graduate 25 to 30 to fill the job market. There is a shortage of 200 to 300 ag teachers nationwide, he said.

"If we are going to meet the needs, we have to grow. If not, we will be importing teachers from other states," Welton said. "K-State graduates serve the local needs better."

Welton said there are jobs waiting out there for graduates. Half of K-State graduates go into teaching; the rest are picked up by industry.

Harbstreit said that ag education makes students very marketable and gives students a broad base on education.

†Deferred Apple Computer Loan offer expires February 17, 1995. No payment of interest or principal will be required for 90 days. (Some resellers may require a deposit to hold merchandise while loan is being approved.) Interest accruing during this 90-day period will be added to principal, and the principal amount, as so increased, will thereafter bear interest which will be included in the repayment schedule.
*Monthly payment is an estimate based on a purchase price of $1,931.52, which includes 8.5% sales tax, for the Macintosh Performa 636CD system shown above. Including loan fees, the total loan amount is $2,044.00, which results in a monthly payment obligation of $33.50. The monthly payment above was calculated using an estimate of sales tax in San Francisco. If the applicable sales tax is 8.75% (Chicago) or 7.0% (Philadelphia), the monthly payment would be $33.58 or $33.04, respectively. Computer system prices, loan amounts and sales taxes may vary. See your authorized Apple Campus Reseller or representative for current system prices, loan and tax amounts. Loans are for a minimum of $1,000 to a maximum of $10,000. You may take out more than one loan, but the total of all loans cannot exceed $10,000 annually. A 5.5% loan origination fee will be added to the requested loan amount. The interest rate is variable, based on the commercial paper rate plus 5.35%. For the month of November, 1994, the interest rate was 10.85% and the Annual Percentage Rate was 12.44%. 8-year loan term with no prepayment penalty. The monthly payment and the annual percentage rate shown assumes the 90-day deferment of principal and interest described above and no other deferment of principal or interest. Students may defer principal payments up to 4 years, or until graduation. Deferment will change your monthly payments. The Apple Computer Loan is subject to credit approval. Apple Computer Loan and 90-Day Deferred Payment Plan offers available only to qualifying students, faculty and staff. Conoco/DuPont donates grant

Departments split grant, plan for new programs

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

K-State's College of Engineering is $71,000 richer.

"It's a good-sized grant for various departments and the minority program," Don Rathbone, dean of engineering, said.

Gordon Dowell, director of publications at the KSU Foundation, said Conoco-DuPont is one of a group of corporations and businesses that have had a tremendous influence on education by providing money for scholarships, equipment and other activities.

Eight academic departments within the College of Engineering will share the money.

The mechanical engineering department will gain $20,000. The chemical engineering department, the Center of Hazardous Substance Research and the chemistry department will get $10,000 each.

Computer and Information Sciences will receive $6,000, while $5,000 will go to the electrical and computer engineering departments.

Engineering minority education and accounting will both gain $5,000.

Some of the money has a designated use that was decided by the donor. The use of the discretionary money will be decided by the dean and department heads, Dowell said.

Kenneth Ray, coordinator of management of community and government affairs at Conoco/DuPont, said the company wants to help students in order to make them more ready for the work force.

"One of our goals is to try to achieve the greatest effectiveness," he said.

Despite the competition of other universities, the company's tradition with K-State has been a long one. Conoco/DuPont has supported K-State for 37 consecutive years, Ray said.

"We have limited dollars for support of education with competition being worldwide," he said.

But K-State has benefited over the years.

"They're one of our best supporters," Gary Hellebust,

Instead of borrowing notes

New business makes profits out of taking notes

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

Hidden behind stacks of textbooks in the basement of Varney's Book Store is one of Manhattan's newest businesses.

Jon's Notes is a note-taking service started 10 years ago by a high-school student named Jon, a hemophiliac who wanted a job he could do even when he was sick, said Jan Trulson, manager of the Manhattan Jon's Notes.

His first office operated out of a cookie store in Lincoln, Neb. Like that branch, the Manhattan office is independent of Varney's, which provides the roof over its head.

For $29.50, a student can purchase a subscription to a semester's worth of notes in one of the 13 large lecture classes offered this spring, Trulson said.

Or, if they need notes from only one unit of the class, test packets can be purchased for $9 to $12, depending on how many lectures fall between tests.

"We try to stay under 70 cents per lecture," Trulson said.

Any student with a vision or hearing disability is eligible for free copies of the notes, Trulson said.

Usually, lectures are available within 48 hours after a class, sometimes within 24 when a test is coming up, Trulson said.

But for those looking to Jon's as another excuse to cut class, Trulson said, Jon's is not your answer.

"We are not a way to skip class. Students have to go to class. They are not going to make it without going to class," she said.

Jon's purpose, Trulson said, is to provide students with a supplement for their own notes.

"A lot of kids cannot take good notes," she said.

In most cases, two students enrolled in the class take the notes. Then a graduate student employed by Jon's combines the two sets of notes together and types them.

To be hired by the company, Trulson said, a student must have a 3.0 grade point average or higher, and they must attend class every day.

"I'm very happy with the quality of note-takers we have this semester," Trulson said.

Jon's Notes employs 30 students on a part-time basis as note-takers, office workers or to pass out advertising fliers. Providing extra income for students is part of the company's mission, Trulson said.

Sheryl Schmidt, senior in family and consumer economics, works for Jon's as an office assistant and takes notes for one of her classes.

When students purchase the notes, Schmidt said, they can pay better attention to understanding the lecture and less time trying to write down what the professor said.

But what about the professors?

Trulson said in many cases professors do not know one of Jon's employees is in their class.

She said other services were

Senate approves budget, votes to decrease salaries

LISA ELLIOTT

Compensation for the long hours spent working on student government activities isn't going to get any better.

Student senators targeted the attorney general, the senate chair, photocopying, the Consumer Relations Board and the graduate assistant in the office for budget cuts.

Senate approved the Office of Student Activities and Services budget around 2:30 Friday morning.

Senators debated and voted on the salary for the Senate Allocations chairman and the attorney general salary three times and the Consumer and Attending Services allocation twice during the evening.

The first amendment was presented by Mark Tomb, arts and sciences senator. The amendment decreased the Allocations Committee chairman salary from $2,000 to $500.

The second amendment, presented by David Winkler, human ecology senator, increased the salary to $1,500, and the third amendment decreased the salary from $1,500 to $1,000.

All three amendments passed.

Brandon Clark, arts and sciences senator, said he was concerned that qualified people would not take on the position because the long hours would preclude them having another job.

Clark said the financial incentive helped get the quality people now filling the position. The allocations chair position is more or less a full-time job, he said.

"No one in this organization does more to serve students than the chair of allocations," Clark said.

The current salary works out to be around 80 cents per hour, Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, said.

"People aren't going to be willing to do it for 80 cents an hour in the future," Henry said.

The person gets paid a pittance for what they do, Winkler said. He said he thought the investment should compensate for the return.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said he didn't think the financial incentive really made a big difference in the quality of the person filling the position.

"How I use my money determines the return I will get," LeDoux said. "I can sink my money into a lot of things and not

▶ BIRTHING RENOVATIONS WON'T INTERFERE WITH HOSPITAL SERVICE

Full services will be available at Memorial Hospital despite some upcoming changes.

The changes will occur for about eight months — from mid-March until mid-November.

Cheney Construction Inc. of Manhattan has signed a $736,000 contract for the renovation of the obstetrical unit.

The renovations will include the addition of four state-of-the-art birthing rooms with a private shower and whirlpool bath.

Also included in the project will be a new surgical suite for Caesarean section deliveries, a recovery room and expanded nurse stations.

The new construction will involve about 1,700 of the 9,000 square feet to be renovated.

"Most importantly, the project will be staged with minimum interruptions to the hospital," Julie Davenport, director of communications, said.

Davenport said the hospital has come to the point where its facilities are not meeting the current need.

"The configuration of space doesn't fit the population of patients. It's been a growing need, and right now, the timing and the budget work," she said.

The focus of new renovations is to create a more home-like atmosphere.

"Research has been done that shows that people do better in a home-like environment," Davenport said. "It's better for the patient."

▶ CLINTON THREATENS TO VETO CRIME BILL

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton upped the stakes Saturday in his battle with the Republican Congress over how America should fight crime, pledging to veto any attempt to scrap plans to put 100,000 more police on the streets.

The president threw down the veto threat as House Republicans vowed to push ahead with a rewrite of last year's crime bill, shifting money from prevention to prison-building while giving communities more choice in how they spend federal crime-fighting dollars.

"They want to replace an initiative guaranteed to put 100,000 police on the streets with a block grant program that has no guarantees at all," Clinton said in his weekly radio address.

▶ NEW SENTENCING GUIDELINES CREATE RUSH OF APPEALS IN COURT

WICHITA (AP) — New sentencing guidelines have led to an unprecedented number of criminal appeals in Kansas.

Courts, prosecutors and state officials are scrambling for money and time to handle them all.

Sentencing guidelines that began July 1, 1993, changed the way punishment is decided, and lawyers are testing every word of the new law in court.

Since 1992, the number of appeals jumped 68 percent statewide; from 1993 to last year, the number increased 60 percent.

"Everything is appealed," District Attorney Nola Foulston said. "A defendant will plead to a case, the court will give them a sentence within the sentencing guidelines, and they'll appeal it as being oppressive — after they've entered a plea and knew what the consequences were.

"No one denies that the defendant has a right to an appeal, and no one denies there isn't a right to free access to the justice system, but it's getting ridiculous," she said.

Most of the appeals challenged defendants' sentences, according to figures from the state appellate public defender's office, which handles most criminal appeals. In January, 95 percent of the appeals were over sentencing disputes.

Jessica Kunen, chief appellate public defender, said appeals make the system work.

"When we have a whole new sentencing scheme, so many errors are committed that review is absolutely essential," she said. "We're developing new law. We're assisting the whole system."

POLICE REPORTS

Reports are taken directly from the daily logs of the K-State and Riley County police departments. Because of space constraints, we do not list wheellocks, calls for escorts and minor traffic violations.

K-STATE POLICE

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11

At 12:13 a.m., an officer made a traffic stop and suspected that the driver of a vehicle, Jana Homant, was possibly under the influence of alcohol. Upon testing, it was found that she was over the legal limit to drive. She was arrested for DUI and transported to Riley County jail.

At 12:18 a.m., the Riley County Police Department, K-State Police and a Riley County ambulance responded to 1803 Laramie St. for a female subject who had fallen from the fire escape. The female refused medical treatment.

At 4:03 p.m., RCPD, 600 Colorado St., advised that the Manhattan Fire Department was responding to a fire at Jardine Terrace outside building X. It was advised that it was a small grass fire and was under control within minutes.

RILEY COUNTY POLICE

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11

At 8:39 a.m., Dusty Markham, 1965 College Heights Road, Phi Kappa Theta, reported a vehicle damaged. Loss was $300.

At 1:02 p.m., Donna Puke, 2400 Charolais Lane, reported criminal damage to property. Damage was done to six oil-water paintings and to a dining-room table. Total loss was $3,000.

At 1:12 p.m., Michael Lee requested to speak with an officer regarding his ex-wife's dog. The officer advised that the ex-wife will be entering to pick up the dog. She will call if assistance is needed.

At 5:19 p.m., Curtis Mitchell, 919 N. Fourth St., was arrested for DUI at the 3000 block of Anderson Avenue. Bond was $1,000.

At 10:30 p.m., Jeffrey Stolenberg, Kearney, Neb., was issued a notice to appear for driving on a suspended driver's license at Rebecca Road and Anderson Avenue.

Opera singer gives strong performance

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

Manhattan's live-music scene got a kick in the pants on Sunday afternoon when classical baritone Andre Solomon-Glover gave an inspired performance of operatic music at McCain Auditorium.

The afternoon's varied repertoire was sometimes intense and sometimes very tender, yet always fueled with passion.

To begin the program, Solomon-Glover sang Roland Hayes' soulful, spiritual "The Life of Christ." It included the prelude "Prepare Me One Body" and the postlude "Were You There?"

The piece included short songs such as the inspiring "Live a Humble," the compelling "He Never Said a Mumberlin' Word," and the somber "Lit'l Boy."

"Were You There?," a common and welcome church hymn to most people, resonated in the auditorium with an immense relevancy. It was a powerful moment to conclude the piece.

The second piece was Maurice Ravel's "Don Quichotte a Dulcinee."

After intermission, Solomon-Glover performed John Musto's "Shadow of the Blues." It is set to poetry by Langston Hughes.

The piece is intentional social commentary on homelessness and race, Solomon-Glover said.

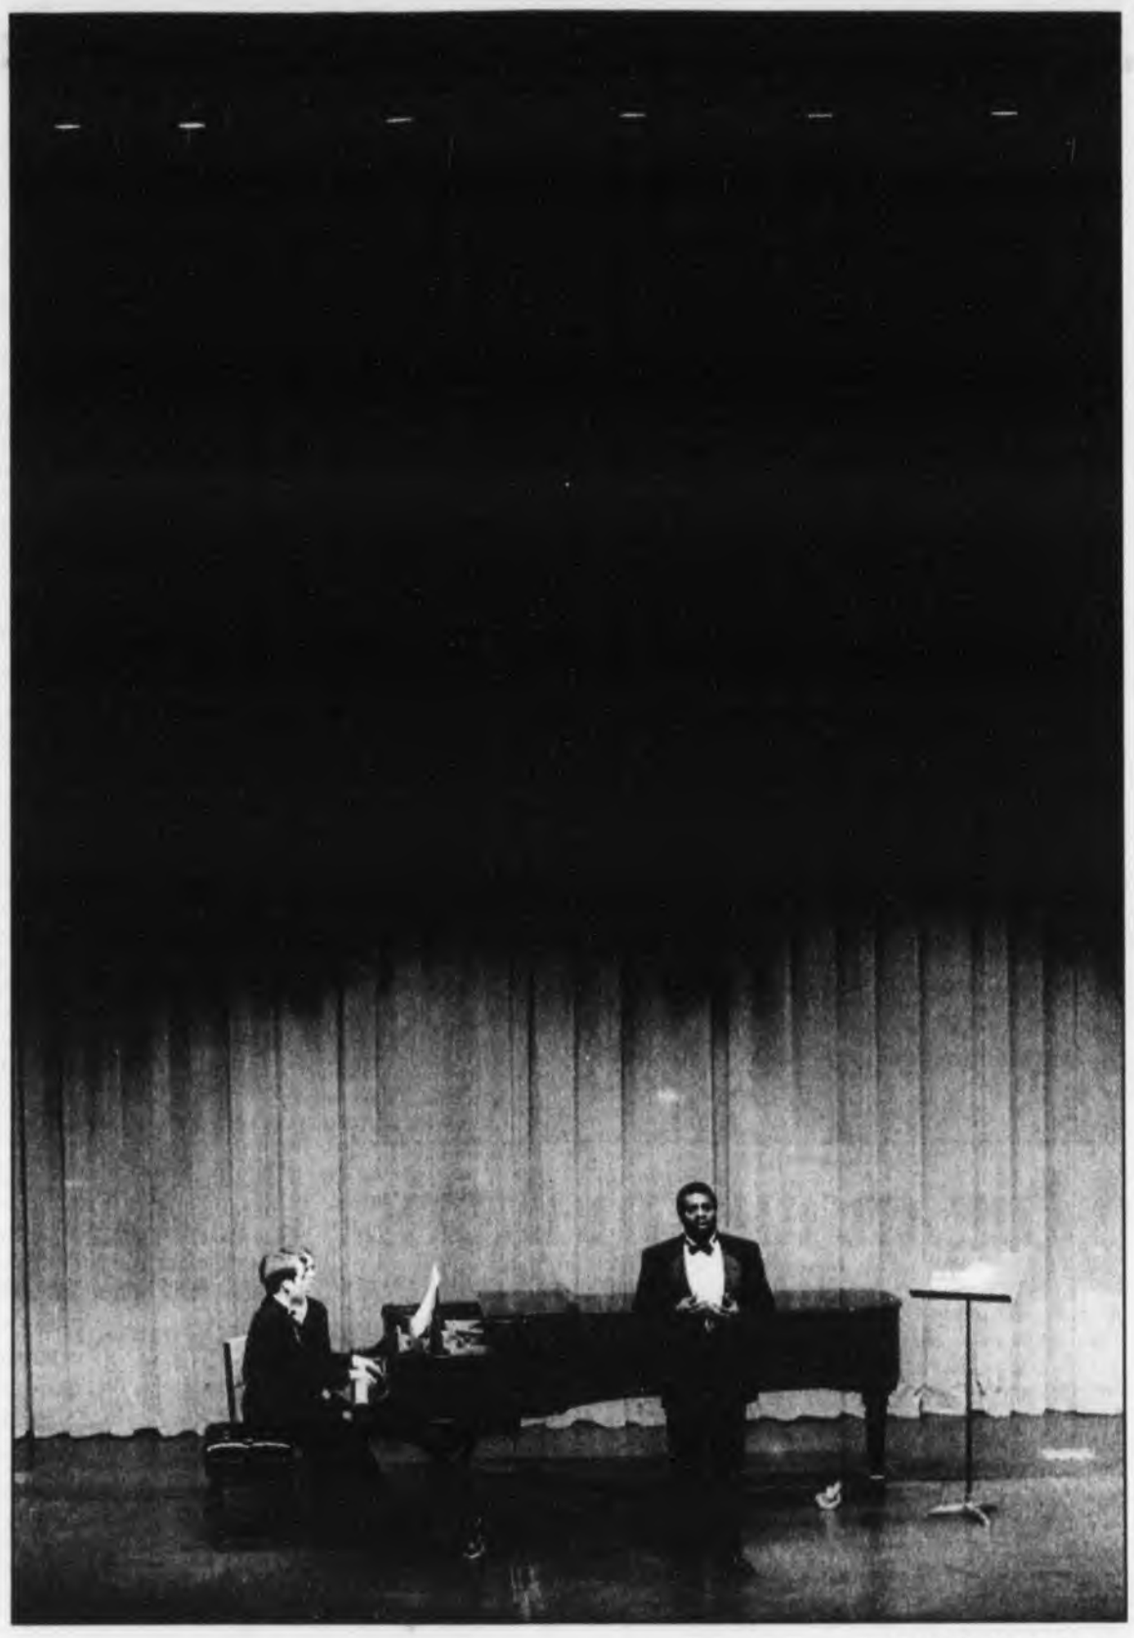
His performance peaked with the four emotional songs of the piece, particularly "Could Be." The sparse lyrics were jam-packed with feeling, providing a perfect platform for Solomon-Glover's compassionate delivery.

The final piece was Robert Schumann's "Dichterliebe," Opus 48.

Solomon-Glover said he has studied the piece for 15 years, both in and out of school, but has never gotten the chance to sing it. He said it is his favorite song cycle.

Solomon-Glover toured last year as Porgy in the production of "Porgy and Bess" that came through Manhattan, although he didn't perform here.

He will make his Carnegie Hall debut on Tuesday in the role of Vitellius in Massenet's opera "Herodiade."



Solomon-Glover was sumptuously accompanied on the piano by Thomas Bagwell.

McCain Auditorium looked and felt very much like the weather. There was a gentle audience sprinkled out about the seats and a frigid breeze blowing from the ducts. It's been cold in McCain the last few performances.

The weather probably did play a part in keeping people from turning out.

Solomon-Glover was called in to perform in place of Wolfgang Holzmair.

Holzmair was scheduled for Sunday, but because of a throat infection, he had to cancel. He has been rescheduled to perform at McCain in February 1997.

Ag students meet members of Legislature

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

Agriculture students got a rare opportunity to chit-chat with the Kansas Legislature on Thursday.

About 15 College of Agriculture students got to know some of the members of the Legislature when the Agricultural Alumni Association of K-State sponsored its annual legislative reception in Topeka.

"This is the fourth year we've had the event. It's a chance for alumni and members of the College of Agriculture to meet and interact with the Kansas Legislature in whatever way they wish," Bill Amstein, ag alumni coordinator, said.

"For the alumni, it's also an opportunity to meet old friends and make new friends among the alumni of our college," he said.

"It's a great opportunity for students. I wish we could get more people down there," Bryndon Meinhardt, vice president of Ag Student Council, said.

"It's good public relations for the University, and it helps to open the communication lines with the Legislature," he said.

"Those of us who were ambassadors greeted the senators and legislators at the door and introduced ourselves," Ag Ambassador Staci Stuber said.

Stuber said it was an overall success.

"The Legislature seemed happy to meet us, and I think they liked it that we knew who they were," she said.

"I was most interested in meeting alumni and K-State faculty. I got to introduce myself to some of the instructors I will have in the future and also said hello to some of my current ones. It was a good way to make myself known," Stuber said.

Travis Ellis, president of Ag Student Council, said it was a real fun evening.

The refreshments were all foods produced at K-State.

"Everything was a hit. The meat was fresh, the bread soft, and the ice cream — oh, it had the Call Hall touch to it," said Ellis.

Ellis said he discovered how small the world really is when he was introduced to a lady who ended up knowing his grandma.

"She knew where I lived and everything. It was really fun. We went back and talked over the good ol' times," he said.

Meinhardt said the speech by Coach Bill Snyder was a highlight of the evening.

"Snyder's speech was great. It was really appropriate because he talked about college being a team effort," he said.

Student Senate is efficient in budget cuts

It is refreshing to see Senate working to lower the amount of student fees needed and spending the student money it does have wisely.

Thursday night, Student Senate finally had to face the unsavory task of sculpting its own office budget.

The senators trimmed their budget for efficiency without eliminating or wounding any important programs.

The Office of Student Activities and Services budget started at $153,189. The Senate Allocations Committee cut the allocation to $143,058. Senate finally approved $139,482. Most of the cuts came from SGA salaries. Student government officials work hard for their salaries, so we thank SGA for being willing to make do with less.

Senate does not have direct control over tuition, but it does control student fees.

It is refreshing to see Senate working to lower the amount of student fees needed and spending the student money it does have wisely. Cutting $13,707 from the OSAS budget leaves money that could be allocated to other worthwhile programs on campus.

Looking for ways to more efficiently spend student fees makes a lot more sense then cutting programs like University For Man to the bone.

Trim and save is much better than slash and burn.

Bigotry, hatred big moneymakers

You know, I have an appreciation for lewdness, bad taste, boundary-pushing and bawdiness.

I can appreciate an off-color joke that pokes fun at the status quo, brings the pompous down to size, and exposes those nasty nasties that we "aren't supposed to talk about." (Sex! Masturbation! Farting!) When it's all in good fun, I'm all for it.

But I have to wonder about a line that has been crossed when bad taste becomes downright offensive — when it encourages hate and divisiveness among peoples, and especially if it is done in the name of profit.

I received some e-mail last week from a reader informing me of some t-shirts that crossed that line, which were being sold at Manhattan Town Center. So I went to investigate.

Hot Line Gifts in the mall seems to be a decent-enough store — its focus is on T-shirts, novelty gifts and bawdy greeting cards. But two of the T-shirts on the wall made me squirm.

One showed a parody of the Trix cereal rabbit and reads, "Silly Faggot, Dix are for Chix," and the other featured a Confederate Stars & Bars, which read, "It's a White Thing — You Wouldn't Understand."

"It's one of our best sellers," said Deborah Burtnett, manager of Hot Line Gifts (of the "silly faggot" shirts). "We sell a lot to K-State fraternity-types."

The "white-thing" shirts are a big seller, too, Burtnett said.

"They sell mainly to military types and high-school students," she said.

When I asked Burtnett what she thought about these shirts, she told me she was "offended by them, too."

"Everybody who works here hates them," Burtnett said. "But they sell, and as long as people keep buying them, the owners insist that we keep them in stock."

Burtnett surprised me when she told me that she had complained to the store's owner, who lives in Kansas City, about the shirts. But apparently money is the bottom line, and so the shirts go on being sold, despite complaints.

"I'll sell one to you, but I think you're a bigot for buying it," she said.

Burtnett showed me the box the "white-thing" shirt decals are shipped to her store in. On the outside of the box, it says "racist shirts."

I have to admit a level of sympathy for the manager of the store.

It's not as if she had done nothing — she has complained to her employer about the merchandise she is being asked to sell.

KEVYN JACOBS

I don't envy her position, either, being caught between beliefs and money. I wonder how many of us, including myself, would give in to the realities of paying the rent and buying food over idealism.

Hot Line Gifts does, of course, have every right to sell the shirts. I know that they are selling because there is a market for them, and trying to ban them certainly wouldn't work — the sentiments behind the shirts are still there. It is the sentiments that kill, not the shirts.

The sentiments behind the "Silly Faggots, Dix are for Chix" shirt are plainly heterosexist, reducing people like myself to second-class citizenship.

The shirt insists that there is only ONE acceptable role for interaction between men and women, and as long as men like me refuse to play those roles, and don't adhere to what are considered "proper" roles for men, we lose credibility and become laughingstocks.

I am the butt of derisive humor because of whom I love.

The sentiments behind the "Its A White Thing — You Wouldn't Understand" shirts seem even more insidious because of the Confederate flag — a flag which for many citizens of this country means slavery, loss of freedom, Jim Crow and inferiority under the law. This shirt doesn't mean "White Pride," as some would have you believe.

It means white superiority, invoking an age when your status as a human being could be based on the color of your skin.

I'm white, I DO understand, and I am disgusted.

What makes these shirts so offensive isn't their humor — and yes, I do see the humor in them.

But they use that humor as a weapon to divide.

The wearers of these shirts are saying, "Look! I'm heterosexual, and I'm better than you, you lowly faggot," or "Look! I'm white, and that makes me superior to you former slaves."

I know I will probably be accused of making more sales for these shirts by writing about them here. I know darn well that controversy sells. But I also believe in talking openly and honestly about difficult subjects, and only through exposing pain can we heal it.

I'm not calling for a boycott, nor am I demanding that Hot Line Gifts take off its shelves items it has every right to sell. I doubt that it would work anyway, or do any good in the long run. But I do hope that if you see someone wearing one of these shirts, you will pull them aside and explain why that shirt bothers you.

In an age of increasing incivility, it makes me sad to see entrepreneurs going out of their way to make a fast buck off of tensions between groups.

But such is the nature of entrepreneurship, I suppose — supply and demand.

It makes me even sadder that there IS a demand, to see how far we haven't come.

As long as there are still those who aspire to divisiveness, intolerance and hate, there will always be those who will be willing to profit from that hate, making a buck off of the pain of those who suffer.

And so the hate shirts continue to sell.

▶ PARKING

Proposal doesn't make sense

Dear editor,

In response to Mr. Darell Edie's statement that he has not received any negative comments concerning the proposed parking garage, perhaps he should attempt to talk to more students. For four years, I have seen the parking problem debated. The current proposal is a bad idea for several reasons.

First, there IS NOT the "huge" parking problem that many people want to believe. On a daily basis, there are empty parking stalls behind Weber Hall. The walk from that parking lot to the center of campus is approximately 12 minutes — a very brief walk. No matter how much money we spend, we cannot all park next to the building into which we are going.

Second, if all parking lots are full, why not walk from home? There are people who live only blocks from campus, yet they leave an hour early to park close to their class building. If you don't want to walk, car-pool. This saves money on gas, car maintenance and parking permits, as well as saving the environment. Bicycling is even better — it's free, quick and healthy.

"No matter how much money we spend, we cannot all park next to the building into which we are going."

JOE MACKEY
first-year student in veterinary medicine

Third, we don't need to spend more money. Options are available that don't require spending millions of dollars. If a lack of parking stalls really exists, then limit permits, increase the permit price to people living inside a certain radius of campus or give permits only to people outside a radius. Anything is better than spending millions of our dollars.

Finally, Memorial Stadium is just that — a memorial. You don't desecrate memorials for the sake of convenience, which is exactly what putting a parking garage in it will do.

The parking survey was only sent to a small fraction of students, and even fewer returned it. Maybe the problem isn't what some people want to believe?

▶ CHRISTIANITY

Columnist needs tolerance

Dear editor,

In John Hart's Thursday column, "Christians must face credibility crisis," Mr. Hart sure has outdone himself. In stating that tolerance is "the spineless ethic of never offending people," he has indeed proven that his version of Christianity is sorely lacking in the credibility department.

Mr. Hart, let me define tolerance for you: it's realizing that your neighbors practice lifestyles and faiths that are quite different from your own, yet instead of reacting in the knee-jerk-convert-the-godless-heathens manner, you step into their shoes for a while and try to understand their points of view. That, my friend, is not a sign of spinelessness, but of strength. Why? Because in doing so, you're admitting that you just might not have all the answers to life. Practicing tolerance might give you a perspective that is every bit as valuable as the one your Bible teaches you.

Who knows, Mr. Hart? If you practice a bit of tolerance yourself, your credibility problems might be solved; other people may start tolerating your views.

▶ VALENTINE'S DAY

Pets don't always make good gifts

Dear editor,

I am writing in regards to the Feb. 9 article concerning unique Valentine's Day gifts. In the article, a student gave the suggestion of buying puppies and kittens for Valentine's Day gifts.

"Also, please go to the animal shelter and check out the pets there. They are all wonderful and all want you as much as you will want them."

KATE SPILLER
senior in animal sciences and industry

Please don't! Puppies and kittens are most often bad ideas for gifts. Let's think about this for a minute.

How can you be sure your significant other really wants a pet?

Pets are a big responsibility, maybe one they would rather not deal with at this point in their life.

They require time and attention, food, toys and medical care including spaying/neutering and initial shots, followed by booster shots and annual vaccinations.

Many landlords have a "no pet policy," and even if you are allowed to have cats and dogs, is your apartment spacious enough?

Does your roommate have concerns/allergies?

Do you have time to exercise the pet daily?

Are you able to make a commitment to the animal for the next 10 to 15 years?

Please stop to consider these things. At the end of every spring semester, the animal shelter is often at capacity with pets that college students have abandoned or brought in because they no longer want the animal or can no longer keep the animal.

These animals are kept as long as possible, but most must be euthanized.

Please do not contribute to this sadness this Valentine's Day.

How romantic are unwanted pets?

If you still think a pet is the perfect gift for your valentine, consider giving them just a collar, leash or toy with a "coupon" for the redemption of a puppy or kitten after the initial excitement has died down and everyone has time to think rationally.

Also, please go to the animal shelter and check out the pets there. They are all wonderful and all want you as much as you will want them.

Happy Valentine's Day, everyone!

Lack of accurate information gives Styrofoam a bad reputation

KATHLEEN MASTIO

The environment has become a very tricky subject because there has been so much inaccurate information given to consumers.

Plastic products have been labeled the mugger of the environment for the better part of the last decade.

This notion has been perpetuated by companies like McDonald's that have sent the message that Styrofoam is bad for the environment. This is not the case.

Styrofoam uses less energy and produces fewer waste byproducts than its paperboard counterpart. Styrofoam is recyclable and can be made to be biodegradable. Paperboard is for the most part coated in wax or plastic, making it neither biodegradable nor recyclable.

Styrofoam is obviously the more ecologically friendly of the two.

McDonald's polystyrene foam (Styrofoam) suppliers had even founded a recycling firm to recycle their plastics or Styrofoam waste in addition to their other waste. McDonald's didn't even notify their suppliers before pulling the plug on their Styrofoam containers.

Misinformed consumers pressured McDonald's into abandoning their styrofoam containers, even though they are better for the environment. Manufacturers of polystyrene foam have not used CFC's for the last decade.

This is just one example of how friends of the environment have done more harm than good. Don't be fooled by all of the misleading information.

The process used to make paperboard food containers produces more waste than the process used to make polystyrene foam containers. Polystyrene containers produce 46 percent* less atmospheric waste than their paperboard equivalent. In addition, the amount of total water-borne wastes are 42 percent* less for polystyrene containers.

It is good to see companies like Hardee's making a move to recyclable food containers partially made from recycled materials. This is important, not only in regards to pollution and waste level, but to conservation, as well. Polystyrene foam containers use 30 percent* less total energy than similar paperboard containers.

Many companies, such as Jergens, Tide and Resolve, have started to manufacture products that are available in collapsible containers. These containers are recyclable, but should they make it to a landfill, they take up a significantly smaller amount of space than their predecessors.

Producing smaller packaging is known as source reduction. While reducing the amount of waste packing is important, recycling is still the best alternative.

It is great to know that greek organizations and K-State residence halls are recycling. They are recycling everything from plastic to aluminum. These efforts are extremely important if we are going to make a difference in the world around us.

On the whole, manufacture, consumption and disposal of plastic products saves energy and pollutes less than paperboard alternatives. All of these factors have numerous benefits for the environment.

It is time to do what is environmentally correct, not what is politically correct. As consumers, we are given a tremendous amount of power to shape the policies companies institute.

We need to speak out in the name of the environment against the misguided policies put into practice. The harsh reality is, most of those agendas are misleading and harmful.

"We have been conditioned to think of ourselves as more wasteful than we truly are ... What we forget is everything that is no longer there to see ... We do not look behind modern packaging and see the food waste it has prevented or the garbage it has saved us from making," observed William L. Rathje from the University of Arizona.

I was once told a proverb about a wide road leading to and a narrow road leading back. This applies to the unrealistic representation of plastic and its role in our day-to-day lives. The time has come for us to take the narrow road back from propaganda and speak the truth about plastic and the environment.

▶ TUITION

Per-credit option proposed

AMY SIMON
Collegian

Students and administrators are looking to change the tuition structure at K-State in hopes of making the system more fair and equitable.

The University will propose to the Kansas Board of Regents that tuition be charged strictly by a per-credit-hour basis. Currently, students taking seven hours and above pay the same tuition rate.

Students would begin paying tuition by the hour for the fall 1997 semester.

"It is purely an issue of fairness," said Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. "We currently have students taking less hours subsidizing students who are taking more hours."

Krause and Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, spoke about linear tuition during open period of Student Senate on Thursday.

"Students taking seven hours currently pay twice the amount per hour as students taking 14 hours," Rawson said. "This is the inequity in the system."

The new tuition structure would not mean an increase in revenue for K-State, Krause said. It would only distribute tuition costs more evenly.

Both administrators said linear tuition would increase the flexibility of the University to use fees as it sees fit. Rawson said this is even more essential since the availability of future state funds is in question.

"The bottom line is that we can't count on the state of Kansas for funding," Rawson said.

Fort Hays State University and Wichita State University both operate on a per-credit-hour system, Krause said. Setting this fee structure would also create a single fee structure for both the Manhattan and Salina campuses.

Changing the fee structure would not keep people away from taking classes outside their major for enjoyment, Krause said.

"Based on what has happened at other colleges, this will not narrow students' field of study," Krause said. "Students are going to take the classes they want to take."

Changing to a linear-fee structure may help to keep the closed-class list shorter.

"Our current fee structure promotes students over-enrolling in classes," Rawson said. "That limits course availability for students."

The financial-aid formula would be adjusted accordingly to fit a new tuition-fee structure, Krause said. Students would also be able to collect refunds when dropping a class, and they would have to pay for additional hours when adding a class.

Senate passed a resolution supporting the linear-fee structure with a cap at 15 hours.

Academic Affairs Committee proposed a resolution supporting a linear fee structure with a cap of 12 hours.

The committee was concerned with making sure a cap was placed on a linear-fee structure, Scott Rottinghaus, academic affairs committee chair, said.

Rottinghaus gives two reasons for supporting a cap on per-credit-hour tuition.

"Without a cap, it discourages top students from taking classes for their enjoyment," Rottinghaus said. "If you want to graduate in four years, it also increases the cost of your college tuition."

This fee structure would increase the cost of a degree for a traditional student because tuition would increase if a student enrolled in more than 14 hours a semester, Rottinghaus said. The degree with the lowest hours required involves 15 hours per semester.

Patrick Carney, arts and sciences senator, sponsored the amendment to raise the cap from 12 to 15 hours. He said this was a compromise between the current system and a system without a cap.

This resolution will now go to President Jon Wefald and his staff, Rottinghaus said. He said he hopes the recommendation of Senate will be considered in Wefald's recommendation to the Board of Regents.

The Kansas Board of Regents committee on tuition will first consider this recommendation next month

Band breaks from Grateful Dead

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

A crowd of mostly students crept toward the stage, accepting an invitation to what seemed to be a groove revival when Lawrence's L.A. Ramblers performed at Snookie's Bar Thursday night.

Once a Grateful Dead cover band, the band's new compact disc titled "Live" is now available at Bone Pile records in Aggieville.

It was recorded in December at the Bottleneck in Lawrence.

Unlike their last release, "Lost in Nogalis" on Tailspin records, the new one includes a new vocalist, guitarist and keyboardist.

Drawing the spotlight was guitarist Chuck Waldrop.

His risky rifts inflicted a thriving undertow that was cross-stitched into a rolling funk tapestry intertwining with the rhythm section.

Waldrop has been playing for 15 years.

"Jobs were always something on the side," he said. "Even full-time jobs were only part-time next to my music."

The Ramblers' ramblings seemed to orbit the songwriting talent of rhythm guitarist Brad Boerger.

"I don't understand the writing process," he said. "I live in a constant fear that I will never write again. I think it's more a process you observe than something you do," he said.

Vocalist Stephanie Turner, who has a bachelor's degree in women's studies and African studies, said she is glad to see the band's music transcend its association with the Grateful Dead, although she confesses that she will always be a dead-head.

"Their influence isn't as pronounced as it was before," she said.

"We're really trying to move away from it, but there will always be an underlying 'deadesque' in the music."

She carried a constant ethereal smirk throughout her sailing vocals, bringing a sound that could combine the spirit of the Cowboy Junkies and Bhagdad Jones.

Hiding behind the drums is Stan Hartman, whose versatile and undefinable style is the ingredient that weaves the harmonic brew together.

Keyboardist Billy Pilgrim has been a full-time musician for the last 12 years and recently started a graphic-design business. Pilgrim brings a vibrance and fire to his music and in the dynamics of the band.

Pilgrim and Turner seemed to slip into a semi-stand-up scene between songs that brought out the genuine chemistry and laid-back humor that make their music an adventure.

Part of their compatibility is that they don't take themselves or each other too seriously.

Although most of Boerger's inspiration comes from the traveling between shows, being on the road is not as glamorous as being on the stage, he said.

"All the work and the effort driving gets to be a drag, but there's this natural high you get from it that you can't get anywhere else. You can't compare it to anything," bassist Joe Comparato said. "It's powerful. It makes it all worth it," he said.

Boerger sacrificed a well-paying sales-management job after 14 years to focus on music and literally starve at times.

"This country is culturally dysfunctional, but we had taken it as far as we could part-time," Boerger said.

Like a chorus of rocking chairs and crickets, the natural current of the music was real and raw. It was so real you could almost close your eyes and taste it.

COVERAGE DELAYED

Because of bad weather and road conditions in Colorado and western Kansas, we were unable to include coverage of the K-State-Colorado basketball game in today's paper. Look for coverage on Tuesday's Sports page.

In the final moments of the Cats' upset of No. 15 Kansas, K-State coach Brian Agler encourages his players to play tough defense.

While the tempertature dropped and the snow fell outside, K-State heated up Bramlage Coliseum with an 80-73 victory over arch-rival Kansas.

The Wildcats, 13-9, snapped a seven-game losing streak against the 15th-ranked Jayhawks, pulling their Big Eight record even at 5-5.

"This is the biggest win since I've been here," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

Though Kansas scored first on a free throw by senior Angela Aycock, the Cats went on an 8-0 run and never looked back.

Senior Shanele Stires and freshman Brit Jacobson scored K-State's first 13 points on the way to a 15-point lead late in the first half.

"We came out to play ball," Jacobson said. "We came out right away and took control of the tempo."

The Wildcats were able to contain Aycock in the first half, holding her to just seven points on 1-of-5 shooting from the field.

"Lisa (Gaitor) did a good job on Aycock. We kept rotating people on her, and she did get tired at times. We just couldn't keep her off the free-throw line." Agler said.

Kansas came out strong in the second half, drawing fouls on the Cats early and shutting down K-State's offense.

However, a Wildcat three-pointer rained in every time it looked like the Jayhawks would close the gap.

Three-point shots by Stires, junior Carlene Mitchell and sophomore Missy Decker kept the lead in double figures until midway through the second half.

Then a 23-10 Kansas run would cut the lead to one with just 3:34 remaining.

But Stires came off a Jacobson pick to nail another trey, bringing the Cats back to life.

Two free throws by Jacobson were answered by a baseline jumper from Aycock.

However, with the shot clock expiring, Mitchell put the game away with a penetrating layup.

Fouled by the Jayhawks' Shelly Canada, Mitchell hit the lay up and free throw, converting the traditional 3-point play and giving the Cats a seven-point lead.

"Teams seem to concentrate more on Shanele and Missy, so when I get open I have to hit the shots," Mitchell said.

The rest were all free throws, as the Cats held on for the victory.

"Let me congratulate K-State. They played a heck of a ball game, and it was a great win for them," said Kansas coach Marian Washington. "It was disappointing for us, but you can't take anything away from how hard they played."

Stires led all scorers with 31 points on 4-of-5 shooting from behind the three-point arc, adding eight rebounds and six assists to round out her game.

Jacobson and Mitchell each added 14 points, and Decker contributed 13.

"This is a real uplift going into Oklahoma and Oklahoma State," Decker said.

"They're both beatable teams. We just have to go down there and do what we did today."

Even with the impressive victory, the Cats' coach said there is a long way to go.

"I feel like we're still improving," Agler said.

"We're not the best team we can be yet, but we're definitely headed in the right direction. I've got a feeling this team's not done yet."

Winter storm plays havoc on Cats in Utah

Opponents suffer accident; BYU and Utah defeat Cats

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

A winter storm that dropped eight to nine inches of snow in Salt Lake City forced an early end Sunday morning of the women's tennis match between K-State and Weber State.

The event was canceled after an accident involving the Weber State team bus was reported.

The incident occurred between Salt Lake City and Ogden, Utah, the location of the Weber State campus. No one was injured in the accident.

For K-State, the entire weekend may as well have been snowed out. The trip to the state of Utah produced only one victory for the Wildcats.

The lone win came in No. 1 doubles against Utah on Saturday. Karina Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole teamed up for a 6-3, 1-6, 6-4, victory over Angie Olson and Linda Engblom.

For Kuregian, the No. 9 singles player in the country, the trip produced nothing but heartaches.

Kuregian dropped her third straight match to Utah's Mirja Wallmark 6-2, 6-4.

On Friday, Kuregian and the Wildcats were in Provo, Utah, to face the 20th-ranked Brigham Young Cougars.

Kuregian, making her first appearance after a disappointing performance at the Rolex National Indoor Championships, fell 6-3, 7-5, to Cherie Kanoshiro, a player she earlier defeated at regionals.

As a team, K-State saw its record drop to 3-3 after 9-0 and 8-1 losses to Brigham Young and Utah, respectively.

Steve Bietau, K-State tennis coach, said his team had trouble the entire weekend.

Kuregian

"We struggled," Bietau said. "That's a good way to put our entire trip. We struggled a lot with ourselves and a lot more with the other team."

Bietau said the squad was somewhat surprised with its opponents.

"BYU is a very good team," Bietau said.

"Utah was stronger than we expected. I don't think we knew how good they really were. I obviously can't be too excited about the way we played."

Next up for the Wildcats is a Feb. 25 home match with the New Mexico Lobos. The matches will be held at the Cottonwood Club.

▶ MAY HOPES TO DISPROVE TALK OF HEIGHT DISADVANTAGE

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Sunday was show-and-tell day for quarterbacks at the annual NFL scouting combine.

The two expansion teams — Carolina and Jacksonville — have the first picks in the draft, and they could also use it to select a quarterback.

K-State quarterback Chad May was at the combine, along with five other college standouts.

"I've come down here just anxious to throw the football," May said.

May discounts talk that he might be too short to be successful in the NFL.

"I don't think the height makes that much difference. Steve Young just won the Super Bowl. He's 6-foot-1, so I have a half inch on him. I think I've got a quick release and a strong arm," May said. "I think the NFL will worry about that more than my height."

▶ RICHMOND NABS NBA ALL-STAR MVP HONORS IN PHOENIX

PHEONIX (AP) — Former K-State forward and current Sacramento King Mitch Richmond was selected as the most valuable player of the NBA All-Star Game Sunday.

The Western Conference rode the touch of Mitch Richmond on Sunday to beat the Eastern Conference 139-112.

Richmond led all scorers with 23 points on 10-for-13 shooting and captured the most valuable player award in his third All-Star game.

"This just caps off how we've turned things around in Sacramento," Richmond said about the Kings playoff possibilities.

Finnegan: Vietnam re-visited

When Michael Finnegan left the fighting in Vietnam in 1964, he never thought he would return.

But 30 years later, this K-State professor of anthropology has just come back from a visit to the place he vowed never to go back to.

In the early 1960s, Finnegan was in the Navy. While he was in Vietnam, he was part of an underwater demolition team that did security checks.

Finnegan said that members of his team would try to smuggle fruit jars labeled as bombs on to American and Australian ships. The "bombs" were marked with the time they were supposedly set to go off. After the time on the jar had passed, Finnegan's team would call the ship to tell them they would have just exploded if the fruit jar had actually been a real bomb.

Finnegan said this was to maintain high levels of security.

Finnegan spent the past month on a search-and-recovery, priority case mission in Vietnam. This is the second excavation trip to Vietnam Finnegan has been a part of. His first excavation trip to Vietnam was in January 1994.

Finnegan's trip was part of the 33rd Joint Field Activity. The trip Finnegan took last year was part of the 27th Joint Field Activity. Joint Field Activities are sponsored by both the American and Vietnamese governments.

Finnegan said that all of his bad memories about Vietnam were behind him by the time of his trip and that he was very excited, especially since there would be no one shooting at him.

Because he fought in Vietnam, Finnegan said he has a deeper sense of patriotism.

"Part of the reason for doing this is for patriotic reasons," Finnegan said.

In 1989, Finnegan was hired as a civilian consultant for Central Identification Laboratory Hawaii. All identifications made by the lab must first be viewed by a civilian consultant.

Finnegan said he decided he could do a better job as a consultant if he had the opportunity to go on a search-and-recovery mission and get the experience of being in the field.

After proving to CILHI that he wasn't as fragile as they thought he was, Finnegan left for his first search-and-recovery mission.

"I do a better job on my end having been there and lived in the situation," Finnegan said.

The JTF decides which sites are to be excavated, and then CILHI organizes the basic team, Finnegan said.

Finnegan's recovery team was comprised of 12 members: a commander who is typically a military captain, an anthropologist, a noncommissioned officer in charge, a team medic, a life support analyst, four mortuary affairs specialists, a photographer, a linguist analyst and an explosive ordnance disposal specialist.

"These people are picked to some extent with an eye on the mission," Finnegan said.

Finnegan said he was chosen in part for his ability and in part for having worked with the team commander before.

"The team was good," Finnegan said. "They worked hard and got along quite well together."

During the trip, Finnegan's team stayed in a provincial guest house. Finnegan said to the Vietnamese, the quarters were exceptional, but to the team, they were marginal. Finnegan said some of the problems at the guest house were doors that didn't close, not enough warm water, lights that didn't work and an inch of water that never left the bottom of the bathroom floor.

"When you're working very hard physically as well as mentally, you don't need to put up with these things," Finnegan said.

Finnegan said the team took all of their own food as well as 300 to 400 cases of drinking water. Drinking the water in the village could have caused intestinal problems because of the bacteria and parasites it contains, Finnegan said.

"When you're working that hard, you can't afford to pick up a bug," Finnegan said.

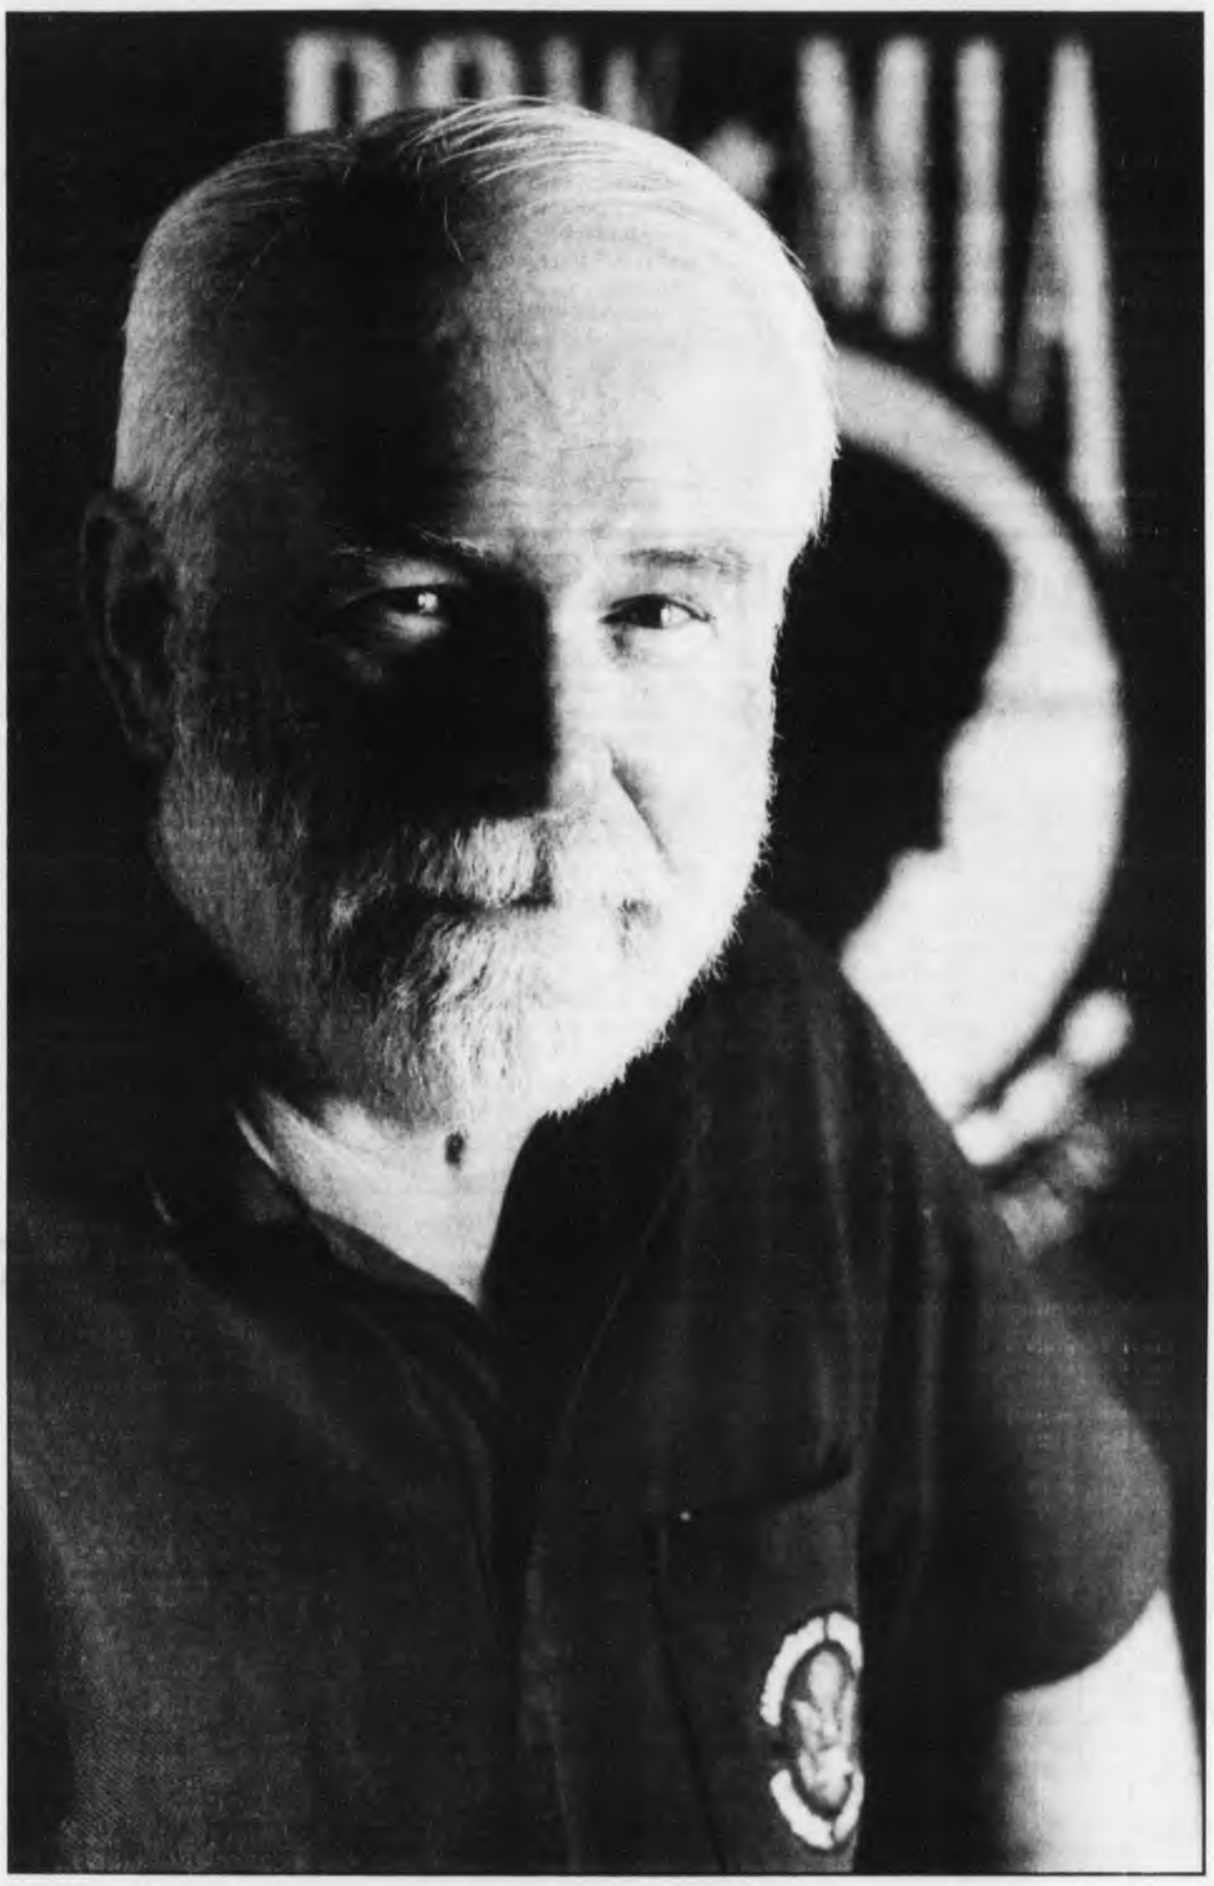
Finnegan's team worked a 25-year-old crash site of an American F4D, also known as a phantom jet, that was on a mission over North Vietnam. It received damage from a surface-to-air missile fired by the Vietnamese. Finnegan said it was thought that the missile exploded underneath the aircraft. Shrapnel from the missile damaged the aircraft, which then lost control.

The second-seater successfully ejected, parachuted, was captured and became a prisoner of war. He was released during Operation Homecoming in 1973.

At the time of his return to the United States, he was debriefed and told the government what he could about the crash. Finnegan said it was assumed that the pilot of the plane rode the aircraft into the mountain top.

"We know the name of the pilot, where it happened, when it happened," Finnegan said.

From the information the United States had and the information the Vietnamese government had, Finnegan said that the governments thought there should be some recoverable remains. Finnegan said that is when the project became a priority case.



This was the case assigned to Finnegan's team.

"I think we found enough biological remains to positively identify the individual," Finnegan said.

Finnegan said the remains were turned over to the Vietnamese government, which will then turn them over to the American government in a political exchange. Once the U.S. government has the remains, they will take them to CILHI where they will be positively identified.

Finnegan said he thought the pilot's family was notified as soon as the team found human remains. But the remains will not be turned over to the family until after they are positively identified by CILHI.

Also recovered from the site was life-support equipment. Life-support equipment is equipment that is attached to the pilot. Finnegan said this means that the pilot did not eject from the craft before it crashed.

Michael Finnegan, professor of social anthropology, recently returned from a six-week trip in Vietnam, where he helped excavate the remains of MIAs. Finnegan, who served in Vietnam in 1963 prior to the outbreak of the war, said the remains were found in the last plots of a rice paddy excavated.

Examples of the life-support equipment found were the buckle that held the pilot into the seat, the oxygen hose that ran from the oxygen mask and a couple of pieces of the pilot's helmet.

Finnegan's team also found five D rings. A D ring is a heavy piece of metal. Four of them accompany each parachute, and each F4D has three parachutes: one for the pilot, one for the second-seater and one to slow the aircraft down.

Finding five D rings, Finnegan said, means that two parachutes were present at the time of the crash. Therefore, the pilot did not eject from the plane before it crashed.

The plane crashed in the province of Hoa Binh near the village of Tong Dau. It hit the canopy of the jungle. Finnegan said the plane was probably traveling between 125 and 350 miles per hour.

Finnegan said the region near the crash is a karst mountainside. A karst terrain has a limestone deposit filled with ground water. Karst terrains usually are cavernous and have many sinkholes.

"It can be very rugged, rocky stuff," Finnegan said.

Finnegan said eyewitness accounts say more than 100 people were at the site of the wreck within an hour of the crash. The people, many of whom were ethnic Thai, started scavenging the site for metal pieces from the wreck. Finnegan said the village people began carrying the aircraft down the mountain.

After the metal was carried away, the site was abandoned, and the environment began to take over.

When Finnegan's team reached the site almost three decades later, razor sharp, 12-to-15 foot elephant grass had taken over the area. Finnegan described the grass as almost impenetrable. The grass had to be cut down in order to begin the excavation.

Finnegan said it took 65 laborers three days to clear an area 150 meters wide and 180 meters up the mountain, which had a slope of 30 degrees.

"You're talking in excess of four football fields," Finnegan said.

Finnegan said if a person were standing on the mountain and fell over, they'd have a 30-percent chance of falling on elephant grass stubble or karst.

"It's almost like falling on a bayonet in terms of hazard," Finnegan said.

Every morning, the team had to climb one mile up the mountain to get to the excavation site. The climb was so steep that in the first 30 feet horizontally, the team had climbed up about 60 feet.

"It was an exceedingly strenuous hike every morning," Finnegan said.

Finnegan said going down the mountain wasn't as hard on the lungs, but he used so many muscles in his legs that he was sweating just as hard going down the mountain as when he climbed up.

Using strings and stakes, the team staked out a sight 35 meters by 50 meters. It was marked in 5-meter squares. Finnegan said the team was able to excavate 29 of the 5-meter squares using shovels, pick axes and trowels.

The surface of each square was taken down 10 centimeters. Then, in each square, a 1-meter wide by 5-meter long trench was dug 10 centimeters deeper than the rest of the square.

Finnegan said this is a test to show sterility, making sure there is no plane or human remains in the square.

All of the dirt taken from the top 10 centimeters and from the test trenches was screened through a mesh screen.

Finnegan said that using a grid system and excavating in this way helps to keep the process scientific and find as many remains as possible.

Back at home, Finnegan's office was filled with books and papers, native spears and hats, teeth and bones and dozens of pictures of his family.

When he is away on trips, Finnegan said his family worries about him.

"My wife, I think, really worries from time to time," Finnegan said. "She knows I'm competent, but she still worries.

"We're just kind of used to this kind of thing, though" he said. "I spend a lot of time in weird places doing odd things."

Putting aside conflict

Students pray with Clinton, focus on relationships

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Two K-State students prayed with President Clinton last week.

Jon Daugharthy, sophomore undecided, and Todd Stover, junior in public relations, attended the National Prayer Breakfast in Washington, D.C., Feb. 1-3 with 3,800 other people from around the world.

"Blacks, whites, Koreans, Democrats, Republicans, Independents and leaders from nations who continually fight put their differences aside for one day and were all there for Christ," Stover said.

The annual event in Washington, D.C., occured during a three-day period and featured a speech from Clinton, an opening prayer by Vice President Al Gore and a cluster of activities organized by senators and congressmen.

The Presidential Prayer is conducted to encourage the model Jesus Christ's life, which promotes relationships between international leaders, community activists, politicians and students, said Bob Fleener, K-State graduate and religious organizer in Washington, D.C.

"It is a time when friends in Christ, some old and some new, gather together and pray," Fleener said.

The event promoted the qualities of reconciliation and forgiveness to increase friendship, Daugharthy said.

"The idea is that the model of Christ is universal, no matter what your background, religion, gender or status — he is applicable," he said.

Daugharthy said the prayer taught that if people would respond the way Christ did in situations, then there would be fewer problems in the world.

"From a relationship standpoint, Christ was a reconcilator with God, so he would be the perfect model for us today," Daugharthy said.

During the prayer, the students also took time out to form new relationships that Stover said he would never forget.

As the students were going back to their hotel after playing pool on Wednesday evening, they stopped and talked to "Carlton," a homeless man on the street.

"It was really amazing. He had so much to offer, and it occurred to us that that night we were talking to a homeless man, and the next morning we were listening to the president speak," Stover said.

Fleener said Daugharthy and Stover, along with a student from the University of Kansas, went as representatives from the Midwest.

He said the students chosen had attended a Kansas leadership forum the previous spring and stood out as people who integrated faith into work and everyday life.

Note-taking business receives scrutiny, praise for its product not obtaining permission to take notes on a class, so Jon's stopped asking as well to stay competitive.

She said the note-taking business has been tested in the Florida court system and was found to be legal.

However, she said, she would gladly show any professor a copy of notes from their class.

Jon's would like to be able to have every professor's permission, however, because note-taking companies are relatively new at K-State, Schmidt said, and most professors do not have anything to compare the idea to.

"Since it is such a new thing, it's hard for them to grasp," Schmidt said.

Schmidt, who has worked for Jon's since it began locally in late August, said last semester the company had to get permission to take notes and got off to a slow start.

"We are trying to get it going. If we had to wait for permission, we'd be stuck like last semester," she said.

Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science, was unaware until contacted for this article that notes for his U.S. Politics class were being sold.

"It is sure not helping the people in the class," he said. "I do not condone it or appreciate it."

William Fateley, professor of chemistry, said buying the notes for his Chemistry I class is a waste of time for students because his notes are available for check-out at the chemistry library.

The only advantage Fateley can see to purchasing the notes is students cannot take the library notes home.

However, he also said he would not be against anything that would help students learn.

"If it will help students, then I'm all for it," Fateley said. "If it improves the education process, I'll vote 100 percent for it."

Paul Oldfather, sophomore undecided, said while he can see the notes being helpful for students with poor note-taking skills, he foresees that many students will buy the notes as another excuse to skip class.

"Lazy people will just go home, sleep and buy Jon's Notes," Oldfather said.

Jon's Notes has nine branches, including offices at the University of Kansas and the University of Missouri.

Corporate funding helps K-State executive vice president of the KSU Foundation, said.

Hellebust said Conoco/DuPont has taken a major leadership role. It is in the top group in both the number of years it have contributed as well as the amount.

Over the years, Conoco/Dupont has contributed over $1.5 million in cash and equipment to K-State.

"Few corporate relations are as strong as the one that links K-State and Conoco/DuPont. Financial corporate support makes our programs stronger and creates an expanded pool of technically proficient and well-trained students," Hellebust said.

Rathbone said Conoco/DuPont has always been a good supporter of the College of Engineering.

"They've been very good to us. It's been a long-term process. The close ties are good for the company, and they are good for us. It has worked both ways," he said.

Rathbone said many of K-State's graduates have been hired by Conoco/DuPont, including an executive vice president.

Ray agrees with the benefits of the two-way street.

"We are looking to fields like chemical engineering, research and supporting technologies at the University that we recognize as important to our company and technology," Ray said.

Conoco/DuPont is also the sponsor of the annual Presidential Faculty Awards program.

The program gives four Conoco distinguished teaching awards and two Conoco distinguished graduate faculty member awards during spring commencement.

In the fall, they present one Conoco Presidential award for contributions to minority education, Charles Reagan, executive assistant to the president, said.

Band talented but lacking stage presence

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

Back Porch Mary brought a tremor of classic rock to Charlie's Neighborhood Bar Saturday night, but its stage presence didn't measure up to the power of the music.

Despite their negativity and hollow presence, it is a part of the movement of local bands that is proving there is no definable sound to Manhattan's metamorphosing live-music scene.

The western Kansas trio is made up of drummer and vocalist Jeremie Krehbiel, junior in music education; guitarist and vocalist Mike Krug, sophomore in history; and bassist Monty Black, junior in computer science.

"We are the product of a virgining punk scene out of the middle of nowhere," Black said.

Some of the band's obvious influences are Led Zeppelin, Jimi Hendrix and Metallica.

"They're good," said Angie Gimbert, freshman in psychology. "They're loud, but they're good."

Although the music was technically very impressive, as performers, the group seemed to project a growl and corrosive anxiety that was at times distracting. Krug had a rugged voice and an Elvis-resembling smirk that shadowed the intensity of the music. His presence as a vocalist was upstaged by his skill and talent on the guitar, which is what the crowd seemed to respond to most.

Joining the band on vocals, Justin Stahlman, sophomore in graphic design, added the missing thrashing enthusiasm and vocal talent.

Stahlman was formerly a member of the bands Nightone Drama and Black Orchid.

The band brought in a draft of synthetic rage that was more a bitter and defensive moodiness than a pure pissed-off-ed-ness.

"The music has a lot of hate," Krug said. "That sounds cliché. Everybody writes about hate, but our music is more all-encompassing, covering all emotions," he said.

A lot of the testosterone in the crowd seemed to drift easily into the pace of the impotent rage, as the crowd was mostly of the male species.

"The music scene here leaves you wanting more, and people just don't know what to think of it," said Miranda Champion, the band's manager and freshman in elementary education, "but we decided we were going to take it as far as we can take it."

If that means playing in bars for the rest of their lives, then they will play bars, she said.

Krug agrees.

"There are so many bands in Manhattan that are really good — Spine, Ten Thumb, Sufferbus, Blind Fly. There's definitely something here if people will just come out," he said.

"They're not just doing music. They mean it."

The band contends that they are the most egoless band there is.

"We'll open for any band," Krug said.

But the band makes no apologies for themselves.

"We don't answer to anybody but ourselves," Krehbiel said. "If they dig it, they dig it. All we ask is for people to have an open mind."

Crush may lead to sticky situation

Dear Cassandra,

I've developed this crush. I have fallen for my house mom. What's strange is that this is no infatuation, I've fallen in love. I have always found older women attractive, but the feelings have never been this strong for anyone else. I'm not worried about my feelings for my house mom, but I'm worried that my brothers will find out and not understand.

Signed, Checkmate

Dear Checkmate,

I'd say, don't worry about what your brothers say. If you are secure in your feelings for this woman, be happy. Make sure you think about your house mom's feelings for you. You may be placing her in an awkward position.

Disc jockey Dave Stelle announces the next song to be played on KXBZ B-104.7, Manhattan's only FM country-radio station.

Country station gains following

SHELLY FOGLE
Collegian

In the beginning of September, TV tunes drifted through the air waves and into the ears of curious listeners.

It was the dawn of Manhattan's only country-music radio station, KXBZ-FM 104.7.

"The first day, we played nothing but TV theme songs to create an entry so people would wonder what we were doing," Jeff Greunke, station manager, said. "K-State students were thirsty for something different."

Drawing from an 800-song library, B104.7 features a top-four countdown at 9 p.m., a request line throughout the day and a top-30 country countdown on the weekends.

The station has also been involved in several promotions since its debut.

Working closely with TW Longhorn's and Silverado Saloon, B104.7 has sponsored two free concerts.

The group Western Flyer and Nashville recording artist Steve Kolander performed at TW Longhorn's, Greunke said.

"Both acts were named to the new-faces tour and are up-and-coming acts," Greunke said.

In addition to the free concerts, the station has also sponsored concert ticket giveaways to Chris LeDoux, Sawyer Brown, George Strait and Patty Loveless performances.

Another promotion was a fantasy vacation for two at a five-star resort anywhere in the world.

Henry Houston, Junction City resident, won the five-day vacation.

"I was tickled. I couldn't believe it. I thought, 'How about that.' This is better than winning the lotto," Houston said.

Houston and his wife, Judy, plan to spend their vacation in England visiting friends.

Greunke said at the radio station, the DJs focus on playing today's hot new country music.

Steve Kelly, evening disc jockey at B104.7, said they play the new songs to avoid going from playing a new Tracy Lawrence song to playing Conway Twitty, Kelly said.

"We catch a lot of flak for that, but we think people would rather hear the new stuff," Kelly said.

Roommates Teri Leichner, sophomore in veterinary medicine, and Colleen Lewis, junior in veterinary medicine, listen to the station.

Leichner said she was featured giving a hog call on the air.

"I was bragging about being the Oregon hog-calling champion, which I really am not, and my roommate told the disc jockey," Leichner said.

"They called me up and had me do the call on the air. They kept playing it for a week."

Leichner said Manhattan needed a local country radio station, and B104.7 has quite a big following.

Lewis said she enjoys the new station.

"I hardly ever switch off of the station," Lewis said.

Although there is no direct competition in Manhattan for country-music radio, the station does have to deal with competition from Topeka stations, such as KTPK-FM 106.9, WIBW-FM 97.3 and the Junction City station KJCK-AM 1420.

According to in-house research at 97 Country, they get tuned into, but they are nobody's favorite station, Kevin Wagner, program director for 97 Country, said.

"The pie is a lot bigger up here than it is down there," Wagner said.

97 Country recently completed research that showed that B104.7 has no effect on the station, Wagner said.

He said people like the Junction City stations better.

"The Topeka stations have been around, and they are established," Kelly said. "That will happen to us in time."

For their marketing needs, B104.7 uses the marketing department of KMKF-FM 101.5 and KMAN-AM 1350. Otherwise, the stations are separate business entities.

"Our advertisers are like, 'Thank goodness you are here.' We try to keep the money local," Greunke said.

The station operates on 50,000 watts.

"We reach Lawrence to the east, close to Salina to the west and the Nebraska border to the north," Greunke said.

Condom gram sale in Union this week

CARRIE COX
Collegian

Lafene Health Center is sponsoring Save a Sweetheart Week in order to remind students of the risks of unprotected sex.

Lafene will be selling condomgrams for 50 cents today and Tuesday from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the Union and from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. in the residence dining halls.

"The condomgram contains a condom along with information about how to protect yourself and others from sexual diseases," Cindy Burke, Lafene health educator, said.

Burke said the condomgrams include pamphlets covering topics such as sexually transmitted diseases, AIDS and correct condom usage.

"Our goal is to promote healthier behavior for students," Kelley Fink, Lafene health educator, said. "We want them to take a personal look at themselves and what they believe, what their values are."

Fink said the information, presented in a fun and humorous format, relieves tension for most students and allows them to talk about issues involving sex.

Burke said she agrees.

"Some people buy them as a joke, but what we're doing should be seen in a very serious manner. Sometimes people need something like this to open up the communication between them," she said.

The condomgrams will be available with an envelope so students will have the option of sending it if they don't feel they can deliver it by hand, Burke said.

Lafene has sponsored the project for several years.

"We get a good response. In a couple of days, we can usually sell about 200 of them without very much advertising," Burke said.

Fink said students are not the only ones purchasing condomgrams for their loved ones.

"We have people from the Union and K-State faculty and staff who buy them for their sons and daughters. It's just a good way to let somebody know you care about them," she said.

Fink said she believes people who claim Lafene is promoting sexual behavior do not understand the main purpose of the campaign.

"We're not saying go out and have sex with everyone and anyone. We want people to be prepared beforehand, before they have to worry about what they might do if they find themselves in a sexual relationship," she said.

Fink said that overall, she thinks the campaign works to improve communication and prevent sexually transmitted diseases.

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Bea Kendrick, sophomore in business, and Marc Mileski, Fort Riley, sing "Ain't that America" during their last performance at Rowdy Trouty's Saturday night. Mileski, a soldier at Fort Riley, is being transferred to Texas.

Duo plays last set together; guitarist transferred to Texas

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

Local artists Marc and Bea played their last show together Friday at Rowdy Trouty's.

Marc Mileski, part of the guitar duo and a captain in the U.S. Army, is being transferred to Texas. He went out in style.

People of all ages were jam-packed inside the small bar. The mirrors on the walls gave the illusion of spaciousness. Moving was a problem, but listening was easy.

Mileski introduced himself and his companion, Bea Kendrick. He wore a blue vest, a black T-shirt and jeans. She wore a red dress. Each also wore an Ovation guitar.

The first series of chords were struck, and a basic three-chord rhythm emerged from the black EV monitor speakers bolted to the ceiling.

Kendrick, sophomore in business, sounded a lot like Edie Brickell, and at one point in the song, Marc began whistling. It was a nice touch, and it got people in the groove of the music.

Both artists strummed their amplified acoustic guitars in harmony. His voice and hers blended together like a good whiskey sour — different styles that complemented each other.

This is a couple who perform together merely for the fun, not the fame, and certainly not the fortune. With incredible variation in vocal styles, Kendrick was able to quickly switch gears from a legato to Four Non-Blondes.

This was a tune that was very popular with the audience, and Marc and Bea encouraged the audience to join them in singing.

"I've listened to Marc and Bea since they played at the Gin Mill," Manhattan resident Sean Doerflinger said. "Bea's voice is great."

The acoustic duo has been playing in the Manhattan area for more than a year, Mileski said.

They met when he and Jeff Barrett had seen Kendrick play at the Espresso Royale coffee shop, he said.

"When I first heard her sing, I thought she had a beautiful voice," Mileski said. "I asked her if she could sing with me. She said, 'Sure.'"

And that kicked off a relationship in music that would last until the Army called Mileski to Texas.

"Unless we happen to be in the same place at the same time, we will probably not perform together again," he said. "She's a good friend. We'll keep in touch."

A television was fastened to the ceiling near the door, beaming "Duckman" into the minds of anyone bothering to watch it.

But most people had their attention fixed on the small, elevated section of floor, backed by mirrors, where Marc and Bea played.

Some people call me the Space Cowboy ... yeah, some call me the gangster of love ... Well, some people call me Maurrice ..."

It was an instant hit with the audience. Mileski's vocal rendition of the Steve Miller Band classic was modeled perfectly.

Marc and Bea's music made it easy for everyone in the audience to get together and enjoy the Friday night.

Mike Troute, owner of the bar, said Marc and Bea fit well into the bar's music lineup, which includes Jeff Barrett, Six and Down, and blues/jazz once a week.

"They have a good crowd that follows them — they put on a great show," he said. "It's too bad Manhattan has got to lose good talent."

Almost nobody could see that more than Kendrick, who has played a lot of guitar with Mileski during the past year. Kendrick said she is now trying to find a new music mate. The qualifications are someone who plays the guitar and sings, preferably male.

"As soon as I find someone to play with, we'll start to play," she said. "I'll miss Marc, but you know, you got to keep going."

Senate debates job requirements, salary cuts for student positions

get a very good return."

Consistency was the theme for salary cuts all evening.

The attorney general salary was also heavily debated.

Tomb, who introduced 10 amendments Thursday night, presented an amendment decreasing the allocated salary for the attorney general from $1,200 to $500.

"An increase of $500 to $1,200 is just not justified," he said.

Tomb said Senate should be consistent.

"It's $500 now. It should be $500 in the future," he said.

Tricia Nolfi, senate adviser, said the attorney general has as much responsibility as the heads of the other branches of student government.

Nolfi said the low salary created a huge discrepancy between the heads of the other branches of government.

Although Nolfi recommended senators vote against the amendment, it passed.

Clark tried to raise the salary with an amendment providing for a salary of $1,500, but his amendment failed.

Clark said he wanted to raise the salary to a level consistent with the salaries of the heads of the other branches.

"The judicial branch is probably more important than anything we've ever done," Clark said.

Current Attorney General Nonnie Shivers explained the responsibilities of the position. The attorney general works 20 to 25 hours a week, interacts with administration and deals with issues involving student conduct.

"Just because it's behind the scenes doesn't mean it's less important," she said.

Bill Muir, faculty representative, proposed an amendment raising the attorney general's salary to $1,000. The amendment also failed.

"Good people have applied in the past. I see no reason to raise it," said Chuck Haynes, business senator and member of the attorney general recommendation committee.

The third salary controversy was over the Consumer Relations Board director's salary. The request was for $4,320, which the allocations committee reduced to $3,000. Another of Tomb's amendments decreased the amount to $2,000.

The person filling the position has to take consumer classes in order to be qualified for the position, he said.

"I don't think any student in our office should make more money than our student body president," Tomb said.

Bryndon Meinhardt, chairman of the Privilege Fee Committee, said other people get paid $500 a month on campus to do the same thing the CRB director does. The money spent on the position goes directly to the students, he said.

The services provided by CRB include apartment searching, roommate matching and landlord and tenant relations, he said.

Haynes said the person who fills the position should be doing it for the experience and not for the money.

"No one has said it is a worthless service because it's not," LeDoux said. "It's a very good service."

LeDoux said Senate should be trying to get the budget under control.

"Saying we're cutting down, tarring and feathering CRB is ludicrous," he said. "We're not pulling our toenails out."

Clark proposed an amendment raising the allocation to $4,320. He said consistency should not be the rule of thumb.

"The quality of the person you're going to get is proportional to the money you're going to pay them," Clark said.

The CRB director is a 12-month position, he said. The salary needs to be at a level that will allow the director to be able to afford to live in Manhattan during the summer and turn down other offers, he said.

"Meat, fat, whatever. Let's just cut our budget," Tomb said.

Patrick Carney, arts and sciences senator, said Student Senate should live within its means.

"We shouldn't raise salaries when our budget can't sustain it," he said.

Tomb's last two amendments attempted to cut the salary for the student secretary and eliminate funding for the graduate assistant in OSAS. Both amendments failed.

Student Body Vice President Brad Finkeldei asked the senators to keep consistency with the student secretary's salary. The student secretary works 15 hours a week in OSAS.

"I hope no one is going to argue that she's going to do this to put it on her résumé," he said. "I love working for the students, but I don't want to spend six hours punching buttons on a fax machine. That's why we have a secretary."

The graduate assistants are professional advisers, Nolfi said. Sometimes she can find a graduate student who would like to work in OSAS for credit and not for money, but she can't guarantee she'll be able to find one, she said.

After hours of debate, the final roll-call vote began at 2:30 a.m. The budget passed 33-16-2.

KSU KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY
Principal-Counselor-Student CONFERENCE
The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1995 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU Academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty.
You are welcome to drop by between 10:30 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 16. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Fundraiser helps bell chime again

Chimes Junior Honorary is helping to restore the Bluemont Bell.

Carrie Loomis, president of Chimes and junior in biology and pre-physical therapy, said she read the story about the Bluemont Bell in the Collegian and thought it would be a good project to help with.

"This is something future Chimes can continue helping with," Loomis said.

Loomis said they spoke with Helen Cooper, Assistant Director of Facilities Planning, who said the group needed to raise $300 to $500 to have the bell cleaned and polished.

Matt Perrier, junior in animal sciences and industries, said the bell is covered with graffiti and will require a chemical washing.

"The money we will raise now basically goes toward cleaning up the bell," Perrier said.

In order to raise the money, Loomis said they sent fliers to the sororities and fraternities asking them to make a $25 donation. For each contribution made, their names will be put into a drawing for free designated driving service for one evening, she said.

Loomis said they also sent a letter to the residence halls challenging them to donate.

The residence halls cannot make a bulk donation, so it has to be on an individual basis, Perrier said. West Hall is donating all the proceeds from its aluminum recycling and is challenging other residence halls to do the same, Loomis said.

Loomis said they are also encouraging other students to make donations. The organization hopes to have a plaque placed on the bell that will list all the individuals and organizations that made donations, she said.

Loomis said they have already raised $150 to $200.

"We are going to reach the $300 pretty easy," Loomis said.

With the help of members of the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity, a motorist gets his truck out of a ditch after sliding off Manhattan Avenue Sunday afternoon.

Cars play pinball; people road sled on ice-covered streets

KIMBERLY WISHART
Collegian

Travelers who dared to venture out between Sunday afternoon and Monday morning had quite a surprise.

Motorists bounced their vehicles off curbs and other cars like they were in a pinball machine. People walked outside to find slick roads and their cars buried by snow, but that didn't stop most people.

The two inches of snow that fell Sunday was the culprit of 66 wrecks that took place between 2 p.m. Sunday and 9 a.m. Monday, Buddy Mays, lieutenant of traffic with the Riley County Police Department, said.

Only 14 accidents involved injuries, and those were minor.

"We had all kinds of heck break loose around three o'clock on Sunday," Mays said. "That's about the time people decided they should go home. People adjusted this morning (Monday), so there weren't as many problems."

Mays said the traffic problems occurred because the roads were not slick when it first began snowing.

"When the snow first came, it seemed to melt or liquify, but then the temperature and wind chill dropped, making the roads slick with new snow on top," Mays said. "People didn't know they were driving on ice until they had to apply their brakes."

Although the snow kept falling and cars kept swiveling around, there were no power outages.

"As many cars as were thrown around, no one actually hit any of our poles," Curtis Flatt, KPL Gas Service, said.

Most of the accidents involved a road elevation, rounding a corner or stopping at a traffic light.

"It was the downhill tredge where people would usually get into trouble," Mays said. "There were also problems when travelers would come up on an accident and try to apply brakes. They would end up as part of the accident."

Mays said most of the wrecks seemed to be three or four cars, but none were serious pile-ups.

K-State Police responded to a road hazard that consisted of people sledding at Manhattan Avenue and McCain Lane.

"They were sledding in the roadway," Laurie Harrison, communications specialist, said.

"They were going to tell them to quit, but they were helping cars move along that little hill there, so they just told them to watch out and be careful."

Harrison said they only had a few reports because most accidents happened off campus.

Highway 114, which leads into Ogden, was an outer area that had some problems.

"There's an overpass that was bad and then the speed limit goes from 55 mph to 30 mph on a downhill go," Mays said. "People were just losing control."

The weather forecast for the rest of the week calls for warmer days and some chance of rain.

Human-rights advocate Randall Robinson speaks Monday evening in the Union Forum Hall. Robinson's speech was sponsored by Black Student Union and the Office of Multicultural Affairs as part of Black History Month. Robinson was forced to come directly to Forum Hall straight from Manhattan Municipal Airport as his original flight from Kansas City was canceled, followed by a delay in the flight he ended up taking into Manhattan.

Speaker stresses global awareness

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

K-State students should get out of Kansas, Randall Robinson, a prominent human-rights advocate, said Monday.

"Your education cannot be complete until you see the world," Robinson said.

Robinson was the keynote speaker for Black History Month Monday night in Union Forum Hall. He discussed U.S. foreign policy in Africa and the Caribbean.

Robinson is the executive director of TransAfrica, an organization dedicated to shaping popular opinion to achieve more progressive U.S. foreign policies toward Africa and the Caribbean.

Although one in eight Americans cannot find these areas of the world on a global map, students should understand the issues these nations are facing, Robinson said.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

"Why should students care about refugees in Haiti?" he said. "Because the world is one place. There are few problems, if any, in which our country has not played a role."

As citizens of a democratic nation, Robinson said students have a responsibility to take an active role in determining the direction of foreign policy.

"We need a public that is aware of what the goals of our policy should be," he said. "Democracy is more than election. It is participation."

Robinson said many people, including those developing foreign policy, are unaware of dangerous global situations until they explode.

"People in this country treat foreign policy like my brother and I used to go to the movies. We would just show up, not knowing what we were going to see. Sometimes we went in the middle, sometimes in the beginning, sometimes in the end," he said.

"This is how we make policy decisions in this country. We have no concept of how problems arise until we are faced with the conflict."

Robinson said students can begin their education by learning as much as possible about other cultures.

For couples — Set the Valentine mood with food, workshop

After the neatly wrapped chocolate assortment is devoured and the fresh bouquet of red roses stuck in a vase, it's time to take your sweetie out on the town.

For "some romantic music to dance to by the fireplace," Rusty suggests coming down to Last Chance. Red heart strawberry Zimas will be flowing, and ladies will receive a single, red rose at the door, he said.

Down the street at Silverado's, Fabian Shepard will be performing a 2-1/2-hour comedy show. The cover for couples will be $6, and the gentlemen get a free rose at the door to give to their sweetheart, John Farrell, owner, said.

Another option open to all students is the Black Student Union discussion on relationships at 7 p.m. in Union 207.

Freeman Davis, adviser and coordinator to the National Pan-Hellenic Council, and Olga Davis, assistant professor of speech, will be facilitating the discussion.

Issues of creating a better climate for a relationship will deal with dating relationships as well as relationships that evolve out of dating, Davis said.

"Anyone who shows up can benefit from this," he said.

Jawwad Abdulhaqq, president of BSU, said he expects a pretty good turnout.

After feeding your mind, the stomach is next. Carlos O'Kelly's is serving up fajitas for two, complete with a dessert of two small strawberry sundaes for $15.95.

Raoul's Escondido is offering the same type of fajita dinner for two, with cherry tarts for dessert and two 7 oz. bottles of wine included. This meal will cost $19.99.

At Giorgio's, a lasagna, salad and breadstick dinner will go for $6.95 a person with margaritas for $2.

Whether you go out or stay in, a movie is always a safe way to end the night.

For singles — Being single doesn't mean you're alone

CHARITY WOODSON

Valentine's Day is one of the year's best holidays — if you're part of a couple, that is.

Being single on Valentine's Day might mean that you won't get flowers and chocolates from that special someone, but it doesn't have to mean that you'll be alone.

Manhattan offers many alternatives to the typical Valentine's Day experiences.

For those of you wanting to kick up your heels and do a little dancing, the band Rio will be performing at TW Longhorn's.

Longhorn's assistant manager Keith Eyestone said the band should start playing around 9 tonight.

Eyestone said he expects a big crowd.

"There will be a lot of couples coming out to two-step, but it isn't just for couples," he said. "We want everyone to come."

If dancing isn't your thing, but laughing is, Silverado Saloon will be having a nationally known comedy act to celebrate Valentine's Day.

Fabian Shepard and special guest Jeff McGill will take the stage at 8 p.m., John Farrell, Silverado's owner, said.

The show will have a $4 cover charge for individuals and a $6 cover charge for couples, he said.

Silverado's will also be having champagne and roses available to give to your sweetheart, whether you bring one with you or find one there.

If going out on the town doesn't suit you, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex will be having a Sweat With Your Sweetie workout session.

All of the afternoon workout sessions will be combined into one session at 5:30 p.m., Sara Forsyth, assistant complex director, said.

"Everyone is encouraged to bring a friend," Forsyth said. "It doesn't have to be a significant other. It can be a friend or a roommate."

Forsyth encourages people to come to the workout session even if they don't have anyone to come with.

"Most of the exercising is done in pairs, and if you can't find someone, come alone and

NEWS BRIEFS

ANONYMOUS CALLER ALLEGES STUDENT THEFT OF PARKING MONEY

An alleged theft of parking fees from Bramlage Coliseum, which was reported by an anonymous caller in January, remains unsolved.

The anonymous caller reported to the K-State Police that a student working for Bramlage, who collected parking fees, had been stealing money since last fall, Capt. Robert Mellgren of the campus police said.

He said the caller gave the campus police a suspect's name, which they gave to Bramlage officials for further investigation.

Bramlage officials were unable to come up with any parking fees that were missing and couldn't prove a theft occurred, Mellgren said.

"Until Bramlage says something, we can't take any action," he said. "It's in Bramlage's ballpark now as to what we do next."

Charlie Thomas, director at Bramlage, said Bramlage officials couldn't find any discrepancies in their records to indicate that a theft may have occurred.

Thomas said he doesn't believe the person who was accused of the theft is still employed at Bramlage but refused to comment further on who the suspect was.

About 20 to 25 people collect money for parking at Bramlage.

Thomas said 99 percent of the parking money collected is handled by students.

"We put a lot of trust in our people that work out there," he said.

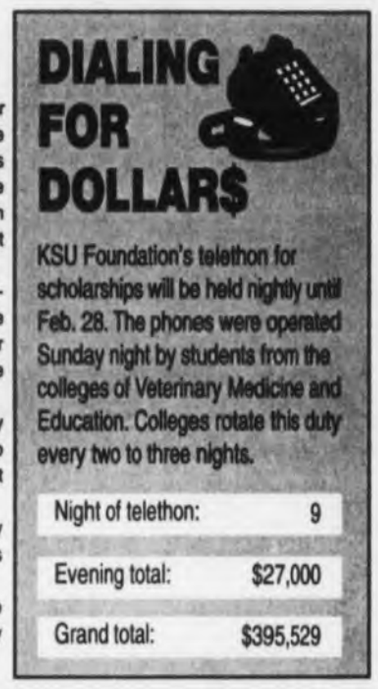
LOTTERY MAKES $47.7 MILLION



TOPEKA (AP) — The director of the Kansas Lottery told the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee on Monday that the state received $47.7 million through ticket sales during the last fiscal year.

That compares with $5.4 million the state received from the Kansas Racing Commission for the budget year that ended June 30.

Most of the money raised by the Kansas Lottery goes to Kansas economic development programs.

Some lawmakers, particularly in the House, said the Kansas Lottery should be abolished.

If the Legislature does not vote to continue the lottery, the agency will expire July 1, 1996.

KANSAS SENATE APPROVES REDUCTION IN AUTOMOBILE TAXES

TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate on Monday approved 28-12 a measure that would sharply reduce the state's motor-vehicle taxes, the highest in the nation for new and late-model cars.

The bill, proposed by Gov. Bill Graves, would cut taxes in half on automobiles, vans and trucks during a 10-year period by reducing the assessment rate from 30 percent to 15 percent. It would not affect recreational vehicles, which are taxed differently under a 1994 law.

The measure went to the House, where there are a variety of other car-tax reduction proposals.

There has been speculation that lawmakers might want to amend the bill to provide Kansas car owners with an even bigger tax cut.

Critics of the measure, mostly Democrats, said it would not reduce taxes overall but would simply shift the burden to other types of property. They said homeowners and commercial property owners are already saddled with enough taxation.

Sen. Richard Rock, R-Arkansas City, called the bill a piece of feel-good legislation.

"This does not cut a program. This does not cut a service," Rock said. "This does not cut anything. This is a tax shift. This is not real."

Under the measure, the assessed valuation on motor vehicles, which is currently 30 percent of actual value, would be reduced by 1.5 percentage points a year during the next 10 years, reducing it to 15 percent.

Revenue from motor-vehicle taxes goes to school districts and local units of government.

However, Graves' plan keeps the 35-mill school property tax on motor vehicles.

Alternative education

Expelled students get 2nd chance at learning

BRIAN HEIAR
Collegian

The local school district is trying a new method to keep children who have been expelled from school off the streets and out of the juvenile courts.

The Manhattan Area Alternative School is a program set up by the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district to allow the education of students living in the Manhattan area who have been expelled for violent behavior from middle and high schools, said Laura Clark, director of special services and community outreach.

The school was started because while these students' violent behavior is inappropriate for a school setting, they still need to be educated, Clark said.

There are currently six students enrolled in the alternative school. The staff of the school includes two teachers, one paraprofessional and one social worker, Clark said.

The smaller setting this provides is meant to allow the attention necessary to help these students, Clark said.

Some students enroll in the school voluntarily. Others are required to enroll by court order, Clark said.

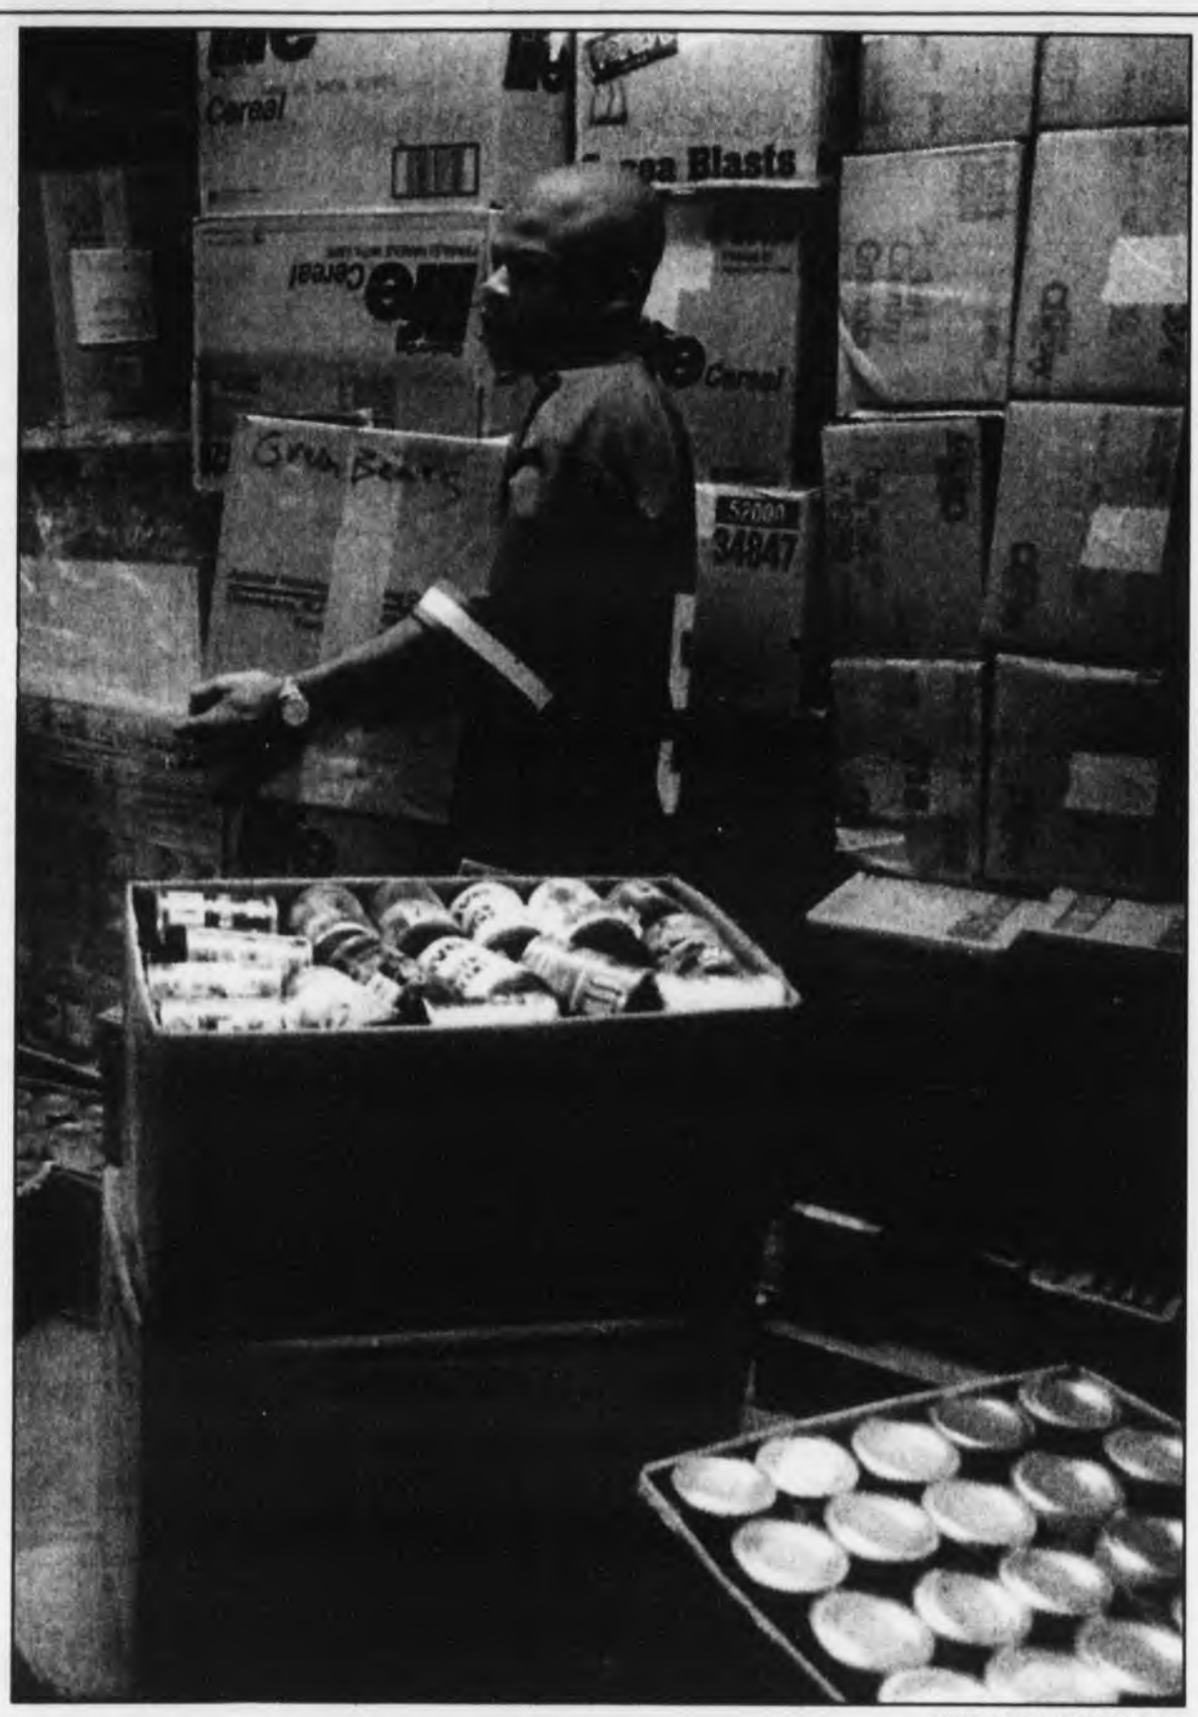
"The school is going very well," Eden Bloom, teacher at the school, said. "We haven't had any losses yet. We just keep adding new students."

The school was started in November. It is housed in the HTX building at Fourth and Humboldt streets, which also houses the Riley County police investigations office, Clark said.

The school district rents the space for the school from the county, Kim Wells, director of juvenile intake, said. Wells shares her office with the school.

The students receive computer instruction and also use the same textbooks found in the normal middle and high schools, Marlene Reed, teacher at the alternative school, said.

The alternative school is a school of choice, Bloom said.



"The fact that the kids want to come to the school is a good sign," Bloom said.

The school teaches the same classes as the normal schools, Reed said.

The purpose of the school is a transition to getting these students to where they can go back to a regular school, Reed said.

The student handbook for the school states that the Commission seeking new ideas for old jail problems

BRIAN HEIAR
Collegian

The Riley County Commission is trying to put together a proposal for a new jail after the county's last proposal was rejected in the November election.

The county commission invited several citizens who have attended meetings on the subject of the jail in the past to a work session Monday afternoon. The meeting was conducted to get input from citizens.

The county is required to build a new jail because of lack of room in the current county jail. A proposal for a jail and law-enforcement complex was voted down in 1994.

Because of overcrowding, the county will come up with proposals until one is accepted.

"We need to go back to the drawing boards," Russ Frey, county commissioner, said.

Frey also discussed bringing in an outside consultant to come up with a fresh proposal for the jail complex.

"We need to look to the outside to get some new approaches," said Jim Williams, chairman of the county commission.

Because the old proposal did not pass, the county has no option but to hire a new consultant, Karen McCulloh, county commissioner, said. She also said the public was not properly convinced with the last proposal.

One of the difficulties with selling a proposal is that the county cannot ask on the ballot which part or parts of a proposal that the voter does not like, McCulloh said. Therefore the county cannot know which part or parts of the original proposal were the deciding factor in its defeat.

The county should also get more information to the people before a proposal goes to a ballot, Williams said. The question of separation of the jail and police complexes was also discussed.

Frey proposed the county look at other communities with similar needs and find out how they handle their jail needs.

The building design will depend on the site, so the site must be decided upon before the plans can be designed, McCulloh said.

McCulloh proposed giving three separate sites to the planners so that an acceptable site can be decided upon.

The county commission will not sell a proposal to the public until the county is sure that the proposal is the best possible idea, Frey said.

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Students will use, not abuse, Jon's Notes

It is possible that some students might lean on the notes too much to get them through the tests and the class.

We all have missed class at one time or another.

What if you could get the notes you missed in lecture in a class you didn't have any friends in? You can. Varney's Bookstore in Aggieville sells Jon's Notes, a note-taking service for 13 large lecture classes. Varney's is providing a service that can help more students than it will entice to skip class.

Yes, Varney's is a private business trying to make money, but it is also a service that has a use. There are students who have learning disabilities or just couldn't keep up with the class and need extra help.

It is possible that some students might lean on the notes too much to get them through the tests and the class. But students could always rely on Cliff Notes for material from books they were supposed to read for class. A student could rely on a friend to take their notes. Students haven't done these things on a huge scale before. Why start now?

Abuse of these notes is possible, but not probable. Will larger amounts of students start skipping class? No.

There was no true substitute for going to class and reading required material, and there still isn't a true substitute.

Office is misrepresented

Dear editor,

I was very disappointed with "Senate To Debate Office Budget" in the Feb. 9 Collegian. The article contained several inaccuracies that I feel should be corrected. Additionally, I think it was inappropriate to single out one of the six institutional services that Student Senate funds on the day its budget was to be reviewed and approved. Due to the misstatements, the Office of Student Activities and Services, Student Senate and Allocations Committee were portrayed in a negative context.

The first inaccuracy was contained in a quote that stated "We do not let student-group budgets shift." Dozens of student-group budgets are shifted annually. It is unfortunate that the Collegian failed to consult the appropriate sources to obtain accurate information.

Another inaccuracy concerned the printing of the University Activities Board handbook which was reported to contain "very few, if any changes." In fact, the entire handbook was revised, and a completely new format was implemented. It is unfortunate that the Collegian failed to consult the University Activities Board about the nature of the actual changes made to its handbook.

The final and most glaring inaccuracies printed were contained in the statement that "it was unfortunate that Senate treats its budget differently than the budgets of other groups that come before it."

First, the budget in question here is for the Office of Student Activities and Services, which contains the executive, legislative and judicial branches of the SGA; University Activities Board; the Consumer and Tenant Affairs Office; Legal Services for Students; and a general office budget. In fact, the legislative branch, which includes Senate, has a recommendation of only $6,228 of the total recommendation of $143,058.85 for the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Secondly, the Allocations Committee utilized the same guidelines for evaluating the Office of Student Activities and Services budget that were utilized to evaluate all institutional service budgets and worked very hard to ensure equal treatment of each. It is simply untrue to say that any special treatment was given to the Office of Student Activities and Services. Again, the Collegian failed to consult proper sources and report accurate facts.

The inaccuracies of the article clearly jeopardized the future potential of the Office of Student Activities and Services to serve the students of K-State University. I'd have been happy to provide the Collegian with the correct information. Unfortunately, I was never asked.

Garage is a good idea

Dear editor,

I am writing in response to the many articles written about the parking situation. I thought I'd put my two cents worth in.

Sid Stevenson's letter in Thursday's Collegian is a good example of the general nature of the complaints about the Memorial Stadjum parking garage. Dr. Stevenson brings up several drawbacks to the parking garage proposal about to be brought forth. One objection is that there won't be enough open space and "play areas." Hello ... McFly! (thunk-thunk tapping on the forehead). Let's get our priorities straight here, people!

"Walking into a job interview after getting your pants leg caught in the chain isn't the best way to impress a recruiter."

MARCUS ADINOLFI
senior in information systems

We are going to have to make some sacrifices. It comes down to a matter of weighing each alternative. Is it more important to be able to toss the ball around in a nice grassy area, say for maybe eight months of the year? Or should we try to lessen the nightmare of trying to park in the Union lot in the mornings.

I am an avid cyclist, riding to campus through rain or shine, and as such, I can usually sit back and enjoy reading about the many whiners and complainers of the parking situation. But I must admit that there are times when it is necessary to drive. Walking into a job interview after getting your pants leg caught in the chain isn't the best way to impress a recruiter. With the present situation, those of us fortunate enough to have to wear a suit must prepare to run a gauntlet just to find a parking space.

Putting a parking garage within Memorial Stadium probably isn't the most aesthetically pleasing thing to do, but it is a solution that has practical benefits for almost everyone. It is time to stop proposing and start implementing.

Appeal process lacks sense

Dear editor,

I have never complained about the parking problem at K-State. Recently, however, I was in a situation that confused me and even irritated me. On Feb. 2, I was one of the lucky students who found a space in the lot by Waters Hall.

When I came back from class, there was a $15 parking ticket on my car for not having a valid permit. I took my permit from my mirror and the ticket to the parking office in Burt Hall. The person at the window told me I had to appeal the ticket (crazy me for thinking it could be voided since I already had a permit).

I filled out the appeal, and the process was explained to me. The appeal goes to a judge, then to another judge. If one of the judges denies the appeal, it goes to the appeals board. If it is denied there, then I have to pay the $15, $20 if it is not paid within five days. If it is not paid, I will not be able to enroll until the fine is paid.

I have to wonder how many students might have to pay an extra $15 or $20 because of this system. Fifty-five dollars is bad enough for a permit, but $70 or $75? By the way, should anyone have to go through this process, don't forget your postage stamps, because the postage for mailing the appeal results is paid by the ticket holders.

Parking garage isn't the answer

The proposed parking garage is a stupid idea, not to mention a very expensive one.

SHAWN HARRIS
GUEST COLUMN

Do people realize that it is projected that our parking passes will at least double in cost?

Maybe the people who proposed the garage don't read the Collegian. In an article last week, the statement was made that 70 percent of the students are getting some form of financial aid.

Other articles have mentioned that budget cuts in the government will soon make it difficult to get SEOGs, and some scholarships as funding to these programs will be drastically cut.

Still another past article stated that Gov. Bill Graves is proposing raising our tuition to raise faculty salaries.

A fourth article stated that the Board of Regents has been discussing raising the tuition at all Regents institutions.

The cost of getting an education is already growing out of control — let's not add an unneeded parking garage to this expense.

I would like to issue a challenge to every member of the parking committee. On three days of your choice, each of you should search our campus for a parking spot. Check all of the lots, not just the close ones. I have always found a spot to park. The lot behind Weber is never without spots. Yes, it is on a corner of our campus, but so is Memorial Stadium.

People wouldn't be parking much closer to their classes if we end up building this parking garage, anyway.

The lazy people who don't like to walk will still want a spot as close to their destination as possible.

These are the same people who claim that there aren't enough parking spaces. If these people want to be closer to their buildings and are willing to pay for this luxury, then I suggest that they take cabs to class.

Building the proposed garage won't get you any closer to where you're going; it will just waste some of that cab fare for days when you're feeling exceptionally lazy.

Many students, including myself, don't have a lot of money.

It's not easy to try and put yourself through college. Some of us would rather spend our money on food, rent, tuition, books and things other than a garage that won't make our lives any more convenient.

Every semester, the cost of education increases. It's really easy to make this cost continue to go up. Build a garage here, give the Union a facelift there, it all adds up.

On the other hand, financial aid doesn't increase every semester to help offset these costs.

It's really nice that some parking committee somewhere decided that all of the students and faculty that have to drive into campus every day should have to pay at least twice as much money to park in the very-near future.

Never mind the fact that the majority of students and faculty that got the parking survey voted in favor of other alternatives.

The majority of the faculty voted to restrict permit sales, excluding people from within a three-block radius of campus from purchasing permits. More than 900 of the students that were polled chose not to respond to the survey.

This is more than likely because they don't think the problem is worth their time.

Trust me, if those people thought this alleged parking problem was so bad, then they wouldn't have responded. Most people love to bitch. All they need is for someone to ask their opinion. This is exactly what the parking survey did. They didn't respond because they had better things to do with their time.

Obviously, the parking issue wasn't very important to the majority of the students polled.

I'd love for the parking committee to give me a better hypothesis than the one I just stated.

Better yet, why don't you tell the students and faculty why our opinions don't matter, since it's entirely our money you're planning on spending. I'm sure one of the reporters from the Collegian would be happy to publish justifications so that the whole student body and faculty would have a chance to read them.

It must be so convenient to be able to say, "I want to build something, so I'll just charge somebody else for it." What about those of us who are expected to pay for it? Should those of us that work go to our employers and say, "Boss, I've decided to charge you an additional two dollars an hour for my time because I've incurred new expenses in my life"?

When we don't have money, we do without. Maybe you should do the same.

I'll bottom line it. You're not spending your money. If you want students and faculty to pay for this proposed garage, then you damn well should be asking for our opinions, but not through some minor survey.

I'm proposing a campus-wide vote. The consumers that will be charged should have a choice on if we want to buy ourselves a parking garage.

If the majority of us want a parking garage, then I'll gladly help pay for it, but not until then.

I'm sure there are a lot of you out there who have an opinion on this issue. Express it! Write in a letter or talk to somebody in the SGA office.

We need to push for this vote until we get it. They're counting on us to be indifferent. Let's make sure things are done our way for once.

After all, they're talking about our money, and we're entitled to be included in decisions on how it is spent.

Where's that naked little brat with the bow 'n' arrows?

ERIN MANSUR-SMITH

Legend has it that during the third century A.D., a young man was thrown into jail for trying to spread his religious beliefs.

While he was there, awaiting his fate, he fell in love with the jail keeper's young and beautiful daughter.

The man did everything he could to win her heart, but the daughter was vain and cruel. She would not give him what he longed so much for.

The day came when he was to be executed for crimes against the state (for that's what the government did in those days), and the young man grew very sad. Part of him, the spiritual part, felt bad he had not quite fulfilled the mission he had undertaken for his god.

However, there was another little piece of him, the part of a simple man, that was sad because the jail keeper's daughter had never said she loved him.

As the young man was led to the stake he would be burned upon, he walked with his head down, his heart heavy.

A crowd had gathered to see his death; they were taunting and without compassion for his pain.

But courage came to him as he was being tied to the post, and he faced the crowd without flinching. He thought of his god and of the woman he loved, and it gave him perseverance.

Before the kindling at his feet was lit, the martyr asked one of his guards to lean forward and whispered in his ear his final request.

The guard, who respected his grace in facing death so bravely and calmly, promised he would do as the young man requested him to.

That evening, the guard went to the jail keeper's daughter with a box, carefully wrapped. He told her the story of how the young man had died and gave her the present, saying it had been his final request that she receive it.

The jail keeper's daughter was moved in her soul. Realizing how badly she had treated him, she was struck by remorse and shed tears for him. When she opened the box, she found in it the young man's heart, still beating.

Pure in its deeds and desires, it had remained untouched by the flames that had consumed his body.

He had given it to her because, while the whole of his soul belonged to his god, his heart would always be hers.

Ever since then, so one story goes, we have celebrated a day of adoration, named for the man who literally gave his heart away: Valentine.

When I heard this story, I was overwhelmed with an incredible feeling: nausea. Not merely because I can vividly imagine what the jail keeper's daughter must have felt like, receiving a bleeding, beating hunk of burnt flesh from some religious fanatic, but also because mutilation seems like a pretty appropriate beginning to a day dedicated to the wholesale slaughter of the concept of love.

Let me explain. Last year, I wrote a column about Valentine's Day that earned me the title as the world's most Cupid-hating, card-burning, flower-ripping, unromantic person that ever walked the face of the earth.

The truth is, I still am.

Unlike last year, however, I am not going to whine incessantly about what is wrong with having a holiday celebrating the bonded-pair. I am reformed. I am not at all resentful of what the lovers, dreamers and insert-your-own-noun-ending-in-"ers" have done to a very plain day and a very simple concept of expressing affection.

Due to extensive therapy, I have learned to let go of some of my anger. I am no longer the embittered person who once lobbed walnuts and other small projectiles at the hugging, kissing creatures walking around campus, trying to break their loving gazes into each others' eyes long enough to keep them from walking into buildings and other immovable objects.

My motto has become: Let the breeders have their day. I'm all right with that.

I can take it like an adult because I have found a way to get into the true spirit of Valentine's Day. Come this Feb. 14, I'm going to burn someone at the stake.

Have a happy, happy day.

Friends sing what they know

STEVEN YOUNG
Collegian

The best way to get to know the country band Rio is to listen to its music.

Sitting in the cramped back room just off the stage at Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, amid numerous equipment cases, Rio's members said they believe music should reflect a person's background, feelings and personality.

The musicians, wearing their Wrangler jeans, long-sleeved shirts, boots and felt cowboy hats, said their music is a representation of their background.

"We're not playing dress up for the weekend," Joe Miller, bass guitarist, said.

"If we weren't playing music, a lot of us would probably be in agriculture somehow. This is something that really comes from the heart."

Every member of Rio said he was a country boy at heart.

Miller, who grew up in western Kansas amidst wheat and cattle, graduated from K-State in May with a degree in agricultural journalism.

"It seems like country music and agriculture go together," Miller said.

"I started playing in high school. My first band was country. Rock just wasn't me."

Brent Barrett, who said he is a small-town farm boy, graduated from K-State in December with a degree in animal science.

Barrett said he played rock 'n' roll for a while before he looked at himself and decided that country music was what he wanted to play.

Shane Laurence, lead guitarist, works part-time as an egg handler at a farm east of Manhattan on U.S. Highway 24.

Laurence said the diversity of themes available in country music is attractive.

Dave Jorgensen, the lead singer from the small town of Perry, said a band can say anything in the lyrics as long as it's done tastefully.

"You can talk about getting drunk, God, mama, home or having an affair," Jorgensen, who has been in nothing but country bands, said.

There are some songs Rio will not perform, even if it is country, the band said.

"If there's a popular tune out that we don't like, we won't play it," Barrett said. "Even if every person in the bar is going to dig it. If we don't like it, we don't play it."

Jorgensen said the band doesn't exactly play the crowd.

"We play a lot what we like and what we feel is good music," Jorgensen said.

Rio prefers songs with traditional country styles, such as honky tonk and western swing, Miller said.

RIO

Rio will perform at 9:30 p.m. tonight at TW Longhorn's in Aggieville.

The band does not go for commercial cheesiness, which is achieved when the producer obviously arranged everything, including the artist, while sitting in an office, Laurence said. "We tend to have a lot of respect for people who write their own songs because you can see them coming through in their own music," Laurence said.

Rio said Chris LeDoux, George Strait and Dwight Yoakam are among the performers they respect.

Laurence said he would like to sit in on one of Yoakam's sessions because of Yoakam's lead guitarist.

Every other member said they would like to perform with George Strait's Ace in the Hole Band if given the chance.

Jorgensen said he would like to just once play and sing with a great, well-known band like Ace in the Hole behind him.

"I've got my own Ace in the Hole, so I don't need his," Jorgensen said.

Miller faked tears of joy at the sentiment.

That action demonstrates how comfortable these guys are with each other.

"We're all basically the best of friends," Barrett said.

"There's no sense in having an attitude in the music business. If you've got an attitude, you're not going to get along."

Jorgensen said if someone has an attitude in the music business, it better be hidden.

As friends, they will do about anything if it's legal, Miller said.

Keith Eyestone, assistant manager at TW Longhorn's, said Rio has good harmonies, a strong lead singer and excellent musicians.

"The good thing about us is that we're all young," Jorgensen said.

He said Rio only has room to improve.

"A lot of heart to get there, too," Barrett said.

Blues, acoustics bar has Mississippi influences

MIKE HILL
Collegian

A bar whose idea was founded on the Mississippi River has made its way to Manhattan.

Rowdy Trouty's, which opened in summer 1994, offers live music every weekend. This may not be new to the Aggieville bar scene, but the sound of the blues and acoustic music is new to Aggieville weekends.

Mike Troute, owner of Rowdy Trouty's, said he got the idea from growing up on the Mississippi River.

"I'm from Illinois right along the Mississippi River," he said. "There are a lot of real small bars that play live entertainment like the blues."

Troute said he patterned Rowdy's after those bars.

"We used to take a boat from bar to bar, and I tried to frame Rowdy's after those bars I grew up with," Troute said.

Troute said he didn't want to make Rowdy's into the traditional Aggieville bar.

"I tried to set Rowdy's up so it wasn't the mainstream Aggieville bar," he said.

"I wanted it to be as popular for middle-aged people as for the students."

Troute said he knew if he was going to try to get middle-aged people and students in the bar, he had to find some common ground they could stand on.

"The live entertainment was part of the bar's original plan, but also entertainment that everyone would enjoy no matter what the age," Troute said.

Rowdy's has a variety of entertainment, from the jazzy sounds of Seven and Six Minutes Down to acoustic guitarist Jeff Barrett.

"We're always looking for the hometown bands or anybody who wants to give it a shot," Troute said.

Students said they agreed the live entertainment makes Rowdy's something special in Aggieville.

"This bar is definitely the best in Aggieville," Larry Keller, senior in marketing, said. "You can go and just hang out with your friends or even take a date there. With the live entertainment you know it will never be boring."

Don Reece, senior in marketing, said the music was a welcome change to Aggieville.

"It's always happening and exciting. The music can make you feel like you're in a movie," he said.

Loss ties K-State with CU in the Big Eight cellar

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

Life on the road hasn't been that friendly to K-State this season.

This statement couldn't have been more true for the Cats' on Saturday, as K-State lost to Colorado 82-68 in the Coors Events Center.

Colorado 82
K-State 68

After taking an early 2-0 lead, on a left-handed layup by Tyrone Davis at the 19:37 mark, the Buffs would go on a 13-4 run taking a seven-point lead, which they would never relinquish.

Despite shooting a cold 38 percent in the first half, the Cats never were behind by more than 12 points and entered the locker room down only 41-33.

K-State coach Tom Asbury, whose team fell to 11-11 and 2-8 in the Big Eight, said the Cats have had problems getting the ball in the basket for most of the season.

"We've had about 22 games of ringers," Asbury said.

"That's guys who just don't hit the ring.

"You know you're going to have a bad night when Ted Allen throws a 40-foot pass that goes in the basket."

The pass that Asbury was referring to was an ally-oop to Donnie Boyce in the first half, which went in the basket for three points.

But there were other things that hurt the Cats.

CU shot 57.4 percent from the floor, which is the highest percentage the Cats have given up this season.

Colorado sophomore Fred Edmonds made a big contribution during his first start since mid-December.

"Fred Edmonds started this game because he works the hardest in practice, and I was pleased with his play," said Colorado coach Joe Harrington, whose team ended a six-game losing streak with the win.

Edmonds led a balanced Buffs scoring attack with a career-high 21 points and six rebounds.

The news wouldn't get much better for K-State.

Around the six-minute mark of the first half, Demond Davis suffered an ankle injury, which took him out for the rest of the game.

Despite losing Davis, Asbury said the Cats wouldn't have been affected much by having him in the second half.

"He's our leader, our captain. But his loss wasn't that big of a factor in the second half," Asbury said.

"It looks like he will get a little rest for the next week or two."

The second half wasn't much better for the Cats. K-State's poor shooting continued as the Cats shot 34 percent in the second and a combined 35 percent for the game.

K-State stayed close for most of the second half but just couldn't get a run started.

"We played well enough to keep us around — even down 12 with five minutes to go," Asbury said.

Things just didn't seem to fall into place for the Cats Saturday.

A good example of this was late in the second half, when Tyrone Davis made a shot that was called off because of offensive goaltending by Belvis Noland.

"Belvis was trying to go for the boards. You can't be critical. He's just trying to get up there and be active. He's just got to stay out of the cone — that's the bottom line," Asbury said.

Despite the loss, the Cats held the Buffs' leading scorer, Donnie Boyce, to 11 points on two-for-eight shooting from the field.

"He was certainly no contributing factor to them," Asbury said.

Even though the Cats did a good job of containing Boyce, Asbury said the Cats just couldn't hit their shots, which includes going three-for-23 from behind the arc.

"Three-for-23 — that answers every question that all of you have," Asbury said.

"There's not a lot more questions than there is when you shoot three-for-23 — who in the world are you going to beat?"

Junior forward Tyrone Davis led the Cats with 23 points and eight rebounds. Junior guard Elliot Hatcher poured in 11. After the game, the players were not allowed to speak with the media.

Asbury said this was the first time he has ever gaged his players.

"I'll be the one to say the stupid things."

Shooting woes continue during K-State's loss to Colorado

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

"When you can't shoot, you can't win," K-State coach Tom Asbury said after the Cats' 84-68 loss to Colorado Saturday.

The Cats continued a four-game skid by shooting only 35.9 percent from the field.

K-State has not shot better than 39 percent during that four-game stretch, averaging only 37 percent.

The Wildcats couldn't get points on the board even though they attempted a season-high 64 field-goals.

"Every time we'd have a wide-open shot, we'd miss it or do something stupid like offensive goaltend," Asbury said.

The Cats weren't hitting three-point attempts either, going just three-for-23 from downtown.

The 13-percent mark is the lowest for the Cats, who are averaging 33 percent on the year, since an 11-percent outing against Wichita State Jan. 3.

Asbury said the Cats weren't taking poor shots; the shots just weren't falling.

"We had a lot of great shots," Asbury said. "I mean, we had three or four bad ones there, but when you go three for 23, you've got some unbelievably good shots."

The Cats' shooting woes have continued all season, breaking 50 percent only three times in 23 games.

The Cats haven't shot consistently since the Dec. 22 game against Marshall, when they shot 48 percent. Since then, the Cats have averaged only 38.6 percent from the field.

Asbury said even though the team was having problems, he doesn't see the team losing intensity.

"The sun will come up tomorrow, I guess," he said. "It's just tough on the road. Life's tough on the road."

A bright spot in the game was junior forward Tyrone Davis. Davis scored a team-high 23 points, the second time he has broken the 20-point mark this season.

Junior guard Elliot Hatcher and senior forward Belvis Noland were the only other two Cats to reach double figures against CU.

"Ty played well. He competed hard," Asbury said. "We probably didn't get the ball into him enough, but he hits eight of 10 shots."

As a team, the Cats haven't managed to get members to score in double figures consistently. Asbury said he wasn't sure how to solve the Cats' shooting problems, but they weren't going to give up.

"There might not be an answer," Asbury said. "We'll go back and work hard and see what we can do. We will keep working. We're not going to quit."

The Cats will try to improve their offense for Saturday when they face their in-state rivals, the Kansas Jayhawks, at Bramlage Coliseum.

Stires proves she belongs with the best

The year was 1987, and I was still playing basketball. The boys' freshman team had a scrimmage against the girls' varsity. I had just come off a screen and was given the ball three feet from the basket.

WHAM!

"Sorry, Danno. Nobody gets a freebie while I'm on the court."

And so I was introduced to Shanele Stires.

We had known each other for some time but had never been quite so, shall we say, close. She smiled as she picked me up off the court, reminding me that I really wasn't dead.

You can still see that intensity (with a bit more control) at every women's basketball practice and game. Despite the odds, Shanele never gives up, and she never gives in.

As a sophomore, I shared a class with Shanele. We both started the day with Ron Overeem's world history class. It was there that I discovered her talent as a rapper. (By the way, she still knows all the words to "Surf or Die," perhaps the dumbest song ever recorded.)

Shanele always kept us smiling, again something you can see every day. At practice, she's the first to recognize hard work and the first to help correct a mistake. And when practice gets long, and everybody is too tired to think, it's Shanele's rousing chorus of "Oh Missy, you're so fine. You're so fine you blow my mind. Hey Missy!" that gets the entire team singing, smiling and working again.

And Missy Decker gets embarrassed.

By the time I got to K-State, I had to follow Shanele in the local papers. She had done well on the Wildcat track team but left for Cloud County Community College to play basketball. Though not recruited out of high school, she was tearing up the juco circuit at a position she had never played before — center.

I caught up with Shanele after the season had ended. I got her in a game of one-on-one at the YMCA during spring break.

While taking me to school (I think she beat me 15-9, but she was recovering from tendonitis), she told me she had to choose between KU and K-State.

Kansas had a winning tradition and would always make the NCAA tournament.

K-State would provide play time and a probable starting spot from day one.

The rest is history.

A second-team all-conference selection as a rookie and again last year, she was chosen to the first team this year in the preseason. Now, she's challenging for Big Eight Player of the Year honors.

"Shanele Stires is a great player," said Kansas coach Marian Washington after Sunday's 80-73 Wildcat victory, the first in Stires' tenure with the Cats.

"She's been one of the key players ever since she got to Kansas State, and we all respect her. She did a nice job."

Nice job? Coach, dropping in a few buckets off the bench is a nice job.

Shanele led all scorers with 31 points. She hit four of five from three-point land (yes, she still plays in the post) and seven of eight from the charity stripe.

She pulled down eight rebounds, dished out six assists (from the post) and grabbed a steal. All while turning the ball over only three times and collecting one personal foul — a charge.

DAN LEWERENZ

Nice job, indeed.

"Shanele is just a tremendous player," K-State coach Brian Agler said after the game. "She's starting to really be a thinker on the floor. She kept the team composed. She knocked down the big shots when she had to. She got fouled when she had to. She made the big rebound when we had to have it. She makes the pass to open people."

A little better, but let's not be modest.

"You take a team like K-State has been in the last few years, and how she has done, and I think she gets gypped because we aren't nationally ranked," teammate Brit Jacobson said.

"If we were nationally ranked, she'd be one of the top players in the nation. She's 5-foot-11 posting up 6-foot-2 girls and making them foul her, She averages I don't know how many points. That girl is an all-American ball player, and there is nothing more to say about her."

By the way, Brit, she's averaging 19.9 points per game, 20.8 in conference play.

And the Kansas game was the game of her life. Though they dominated the first half, the Cats were called to task in the second. A pair of KU free throws cut the K-State lead to one with 3:34 remaining.

"Then Shanele just comes down and buries a three-pointer," Agler said.

"At crucial times, she's going to be looking to get open," said Decker, who fed Stires for the trey.

And did she know it was going in?

"Yes. I hadn't touched the ball in eight or nine possessions where I had a good look at the basket. So I told the team in the huddle to try to get me the ball, and I was looking to pull up and shoot it because we needed something to get us over the hump. I saw Aycock's outstretched arms coming at me, and I thought 'I'd better get this off quick.' There was no arch on it, but it went in," Stires said.

And it sealed the game, lifting the spirits of the Cats and shattering the Jayhawk run.

"Then Shanele just brought us together and settled us down," Jacobson said.

"She said, 'We're going to get this. This is my graduation present.'"

And what a present it was. The win came in Stires' last regular-season game against Kansas.

Are there any regrets?

"Looking back, it's been tough not being as successful as they have been," she said. "but a win like this today is sweet enough. This makes up for everything.

"This is huge. Huge, huge, huge, huge, huge."

If only Mitch Holthus had been there to say it.

"No no no, he's big — I'm huge. There's a difference. He's just big. Huge is even bigger."

You're right. This was huge. And it was sweet. And I'll be willing to wager that it won't be your last huge performance.

Congratulations, Shanele. You've made it where every young athlete has always dreamed. You're at the top of the game — a game you play for fun that's all the more fun for you playing it.

"Surf or Die?"

You'll just keep on surfin'.

TODAY'S MEDITATION

Today is the day I will begin to take responsibility for myself. I will no longer care about the petty opinions that others have about me. In fact, today I might just go around naked. It's my life and it's too short to live it by someone else's rules.

Reader torn between 2 men

Dear Cassandra,

There is a man I have been dating on and off for the past few weeks. We have never gotten more serious than a kiss or two, but I feel very close to him.

Lately, I have developed a crush on a man I have just recently met. He doesn't know how I feel about him.

The man I have been dating wants to get closer, and I feel like I could have a relationship with him, but my heart is still divided by this other guy.

Signed, Divided

Dear Divided,

Confront the young man you have a crush on and see how he feels about you. Also, talk to the man you've been dating and see why he wants to make your relationship more permanent now.

Inscription

Mama's cryin' about an angel's death
Poppa sits and holds his breath
No one here can understand why he died by his own hand.

So in this hour we say good-bye
Don't hold your tears it's fine to cry
As the Angel raises his wings and Poppa takes a breath we'll all remember your life and not your death.

The Superhero

When tomorrow rains down
And the sun has found
A new little place
To shine his bright face
You are deaf by the absence of sound so eloquently you dance round
An imagination of haste
Searched at a gently roaring pace
And so by fantasy bound
To the wings of a gothic clown
From a superhero race
Where the summer solstice
Won't end until she takes her final bow
And so sadly the old sun has been found.

Cast Out

My mind cringes in jumbled confusion
and my soul is cracked, painfully ajar.
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

Always acting upon my compulsions,
I stumble upon you, wherever you are.
My mind cringes in jumbled confusion.

I hate to see you, my own reflection —
you're nothing, a shadow, an ugly scar!
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

Penance can lead me to my salvation,
but virtue can lead me only so far.
My mind cringes in jumbled confusion.

Dazed and lost, I come to the conclusion
that shouting my feelings is my savior.
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

Nowhere to run, nothing to hide under,
I brave myself, the dear dreaded scholar.
My mind cringes in jumbled confusion,
I mar what I touch, I am destruction.

Chance dance floor meets mixed reviews

MIKE HILL
Collegian

An established bar has a new look this semester.

Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon put in a dance floor three weeks ago in an attempt to remain one of the top bars in Aggieville.

Bo Harris, manager at Last Chance, said there were many reasons for installing the dance floor, but the main reasons were the need for change and the requests by people to hear classic rock at Chance.

"We always try to keep something new to keep people interested in Chance," he said.

Harris said it was hard to tell if it had helped the bar's popularity but that the dance floor seemed to be a hit with patrons.

"We've had a real good response to it," Harris said. "The dance floor has been packed every night."

Many Last Chance patrons seemed to agree with Harris.

"It gives people another place in Aggieville to dance to great music like classic rock, '80s tunes and disco," Arlin Ohmes, senior in psychology, said.

Other patrons said it was a nice change from the sometimes dull atmosphere at Chance.

"It gives you something to do other than just sitting around with your friends," Jamie Eck, junior in engineering, said.

Although some patrons supported the addition of a new dance floor, there were some who said they liked it just the way it used to be.

"I don't like the Chance dance floor because you used to be able to go there with all your friends and not feel any pressure about having to dance and meeting women," Aaron Green, senior in horticulture, said. "They just ruined that."

Graduates of K-State also said they found the dance floor a little disappointing.

"It brought Chance down to the same level of all the other bars," Valerie Kaufman, 1994 K-State graduate, said.

"Chance is now just another trendy-type bar looking to make a quick buck," Scott Brown, 1994 K-State graduate, said.

"They have lost the great atmosphere they had," he said.

Last Chance has a new dance floor, but the bar isn't planning to make any other big changes in the future.

Harris said Chance would be staying a 21-only bar and would use the dance floor as a stage for live music.

Target could mean jobs, revenue for Manhattan

MELINDA CARTER
Collegian

Target has plans for expanding into Manhattan, providing residents with an alternative in shopping.

Although starting and completion dates have not been set, one thing is certain.

"Target will definitely be in Manhattan," said Gene Cole, store team leader in Topeka.

The location has not been determined, but several sites are under consideration.

Jerry Petty, director of community development in Manhattan, said Target has looked at a number of sites to build in Manhattan, but he didn't know any specifics.

Cole said he thought one location for Target could be on the west side of town.

Mark Krebs, assistant manager of Wal-Mart, said, "I'm under the impression that the land is in the trailer court near Wal-Mart."

Krebs said the existence of Target wouldn't affect Wal-Mart's business.

Tony Maiorana, assistant manager of Kmart and junior in management, said he didn't think Target would have an effect on Kmart's business.

Petty did not seem concerned with the economic stability of other stores.

"The good stores stay in business," he said.

Petty said Target will bring new people to Manhattan, which means new money.

"It all adds to the economic viability of a town," Petty said.

"Target is my favorite store. I would definitely go there," Christy McIlvain, junior in animal science, said.

McIlvain said she likes the store so much that she plans on having the items for her upcoming bridal shower purchased there.

Another student was more concerned with Target's jobs.

"We have one in my hometown, and I've never been in it. But it would provide more job opportunities," Kit Chapman, sophomore in construction science, said.

Cole said a new Target generates between 150 and 175 new jobs. Target conducts mass hiring in an announced location.

It consists of an application process, an informative meeting about Target and two separate interviews, Cole said.

"It's like a fair, a hiring phenomena, a fun type of thing," he said.

Melanie Whyrick, Target employee in Topeka, said Target is a department store that has clothing, toys, home decorations, hardware and electronics.

"Basically," Whyrick said, "Target provides good, quality products."

Valentine's Day Personals

AMY, HAPPY V-Day. Will you be mine! Love Jeff.

ANGELA- THESE last six months have been the best of my life, let's make the rest of our lives even better. I Love You, Jim

B, TO her a tribute of love profound, Together in life our love was bound, Storms came and pushed our love away, This- the strong love a brighter day, Anger, resentment- such harsh words spoken, Hearts together once are now surely broken, What is love? Not secure, scarcely kind, No! It was me I had to find, Without you my good days are gone, These words may be silent- love lives on.

BO DEAN, Thank you for being so patient with me. I am also grateful for your efforts. Mooka.

CASIE- I was poor and ugly when you met me, and when we exchanged our vows. I've been poor and ugly forever, and I'm poor and ugly now. So to help you get through Cupid's short stay, this is what I will do: I'll disappear for Valentine's Day, and charge this Ad to you. So Happy Valentine's Day, Love Cliff.

DADDY JELLY- Thank you for all the love, care, walks, and water changes. We love you!! Yogi, Bear, Yurtle and The Fish.

DEAR RANDY, Three playful months of talks, laughs, hugs, snuggles, kisses, nibbles, tickles, cuddles, and you! Love, Marie.

DEAR SS (Sally), Are your legs tired? It should be. Looking forward to dinner tonight! Maybe Italian dessert and a little Tango? Happy Valentine's Day. WLYB, PC (Haffy).

DON BON- Our lives together have held a lot of strife but I'm still happy to be your wife. Happy Valentine's Day. Love, Anna Mae.

FORREST GUMP- Cupid must have had something wonderful in mind when he chose you and I to be Valentines! I couldn't wish for anyone better and I can't wait for the day we can say forever! I nub you! Babycakes. P.S. The mall?!

HAPPIEST OF Valentines to my love Kelly O' from Patrick.

I WANT to wish all of the residents of Edwards Hall B-Wing a very Happy Valentine's Day. Fondly, Nikki T.

ILENE, I bought you this personal just to say I love you! Will you be my Valentine? XOXO, Darren.

JD: HAPPY Valentine's Day! LTD

JOHN T.- The Japanese have a word for it. It's judo- the art of conquering by yielding. The western equivalent of judo is, "Yes, dear." I'll love you forever. Kim.

KAPPA SIGMA Men- I love you now and forever! Mom.

MARK- THANKS for the love we share- the respect, understanding, support, and all of the fun! Your "sweetie".

MATT D. I just wanted to make known how very special you are to me. Happy V-day. With all my love- Megan.

POOH, I love you very much, and look forward to spending the rest of my life with you. Happy Valentine's Day! Neffer.

RAIICHON- Happy Valentine's Day! Guess Who?

ROSANNA, WTCG Loving Jelly, BHYM, offers love, friendship, commitment, understanding, fun and a long fulfilling future together. Rice pudding mandatory!! Interested? Come home baby! I Love You.

SEXY MAN, Six months of Marriage has been fun. Still got that lovin' feelin'! Who says the sizzle dies when you get married? Can't wait until you get home tonight! I'll be waiting... Princess.

SHAUNESY, THANK you for being mine. I Luv U! Little Bunny.

TO ALL MY (OFFICE) Ladies, As the World Turns around you, and the Young and Restless guys seem to pass you all by, know this one thing, I notice you are all Bold and Beautiful. Have a Happy Valentine's Day! Pat H.

TO MY Husband Wayne, I love you with all of my heart. The best day of my life was the day I married you. There is no one else in this world that I would rather live the rest of my life with. Happy ninth Valentine's Day together. Love always, your wife, Deena.

WBJ- WANTED to wish you a special Valentine's Day! And also a Happy Birthday tomorrow! Thanks for choosing me. -AMM

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Learning other customs important

"As students, we are required to read our fill of Chaucer and Shakespeare, but never an ancient Chinese philosopher or an African tale," he said. "As a result, we have no concept of how the rest of the world lives."

In addition, Robinson said students must get out and see the world.

"Your education is not complete until you see your country from the outside," he said.

Students who take this opportunity to learn about other people's customs are better citizens, Robinson said.

"You make our country a better place because you have the knowledge to make better decisions about policy," he said. "Things don't just happen because they're right. Things happen because people armed with information and tenacity make policy work."

Ken Nance, sophomore in public relations, said he agrees with Robinson.

"People need to be more educated about the rest of the world's problems because it seems like we never catch on until the very end," he said.

Goodnow planning date alternative

Day are "Legends of the Fall" (7:30 p.m.) and "Nobody's Fool" (7:45 p.m.), both at Seth Childs Cinema. At Westloop Six Theatres, you can check out "Before Sunris,e" playing at 8 p.m.

The hottest cozy-up-with-your-honey videos, according to Blockbuster Video, are "Sleepless In Seattle" "An Affair To Remember," and "Ice Castles," as well as any Cary Grant movie.

Goodnow Hall second floor is planning an alternative for people who don't have dates or whose honey is out of town, Jamie Vandapool, resident assistant, said.

The movies start at 8 tonight in the second-floor lobby. All who come look forward to such flicks as "Casablanca," "Pretty Woman" and "Sleepless in Seattle."

find someone else already here," she said.

If Valentine's Day really makes you want to find a special someone, Campus Crusade for Christ is also having a program on relationships.

The program will be at 8 tonight, but the location has not been announced yet, Brent Watson, member of Campus Crusade for Christ, said.

"We will be discussing communication and self-esteem as it relates to relationships," he said.

Not everyone will choose to go out on Valentine's Day even with so many options available.

"I'm going to stay home and rent a movie," Michelle Menke, sophomore in biology, said. "If I went out, I would see all those other couples together and get depressed."

Students given options school also tries to help the students with skills such as conflict resolution, anger management and peer mediation.

On Fridays, the school does not have class. The students do community service, Clark said.

This work is meant to get the students involved in their community, Clark said.

The school itself is made up of three rooms. There is a group meeting room with several desks where the students meet for discussion and viewing video tapes.

There is also a kitchen with a table where the students eat their lunches. The third room has three computers in it for the students to do class work.

The students' views of the school differ from student to student.

"It's better than normal school," Brian Ebel, student, said.

Unlike in the normal middle school, he is doing his work and coming to class at the alternative school, Ebel said.

Jessica Hedgecock, another student at the school, said the school was all right and that the class work was about the same as the regular schools.

Several students said the school should have more students.

The school should have a bigger place with more students, Conrad Powell, student, said.

James Harrison, another student, said the school would be better if there were more girls there.

The students may get their wish.

The school is growing, and the school district is considering getting the alternative school its own building, Wells said.

The Painter

He's the original vandal, history's leaver of marks,
You've seen his work in subways, cemeteries and parks.

Content with nothing until it has his personal touch,
He unarmed Venus–some say that was too much.

Moons have lighted his art since the birth of time,
Depending on the target, he ranges obscene to sublime.

His initials were carved on the Titanic's prow.
His still life of apples made Eve wonder "How?".

Ancients witnessed crushing of berries, boiling of bark,
On Jerusalem walls he slashed "Jesus lies" in the dark.

Nothing or no one is safe from his stroke,
His likeness of Eva caused Hitler to choke.

His smile is alluring while he grafittis your soul,
Then he packs up his paints, after they've taken their toll.

There's one desecration I can never forgive,
The one that will haunt me as long as I live.

It's the sweetest of agonies, as yet the worst part,
That damn fool signed his name to my heart.

"Pangols"

Thursday, February 23 at 8 p.m.
McCain Auditorium
Kansas State University
General Public $15
Senior Citizen $13
Student/Child $7.50

Twenty sold-out tours to North America should tell you what crowd-pleasers this company of 40 dancers, singers and musicians is. "Pangols," their program for the current tour, is a West African word referring to the spiritual nature of all beings and things. Each dance in the program, whether telling a story or celebrating a movement or music form, explores the spiritual relationship between people and their environment.

"Senegalese dancing goes beyond excitement, way past zeal, far above frenzy, into some kind of kinetic nirvana. It erases that awful distance that so often creeps up between performers and audience." (Pamela Sommers, The Washington Post)

For tickets call 532-6428 or come to the McCain box office. Box office hours: noon to 5 p.m. weekdays; from 1 p.m. before weekend matinees; and from 5 p.m. before weekend evenings. Tickets are also available at Manhattan Town Center customer service desk, K-State Union Bookstore, and ITR (Fort Riley).

Skyler Dickson is 4 years old.

His innocent blue eyes mirror a happy childhood and a relatively worry-free life. His single mom, Jenny, gives partial credit to Head Start.

"I love Head Start," she said.

But, Jenny said, Head Start is a lot more than just a day care, and as soon as she heard federal budget cuts would reduce services offered at the Manhattan Head Start, she began researching and writing a petition.

As a senior in elementary education, Jenny, 23, needs Head Start to help her take care of Skyler. Five days a week, she gets out of bed at 8 a.m. and rushes her son to the Head Start program before she begins her school day.

Dickson is finishing her last semester before she begins her teaching practice and said she depends on Head Start monetarily and for peace of mind.

"If I lost Head Start ..." Dickson said, pulling back her long, straight hair while trying to find the right way to describe all the ways she would lose. As the thoughts rush through her head, she finally decides it is too hard to sum up.

"I do depend on Head Start a great deal," she said.

And so does Skyler. From 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday, Skyler goes to the Head Start or Wrap Around programs, where he can get three meals a day, free dental, hearing and medical check-ups, and virtually one-on-one teacher-to-child interaction.

Dickson said after working at several day cares and taking Skyler to a few, she could tell the difference in the Head Start program compared with another day care.

"Head Start just has the government funding, and they can go above and beyond," Dickson said.

But the program offers more than free day care and benefits, she said. The teachers at Head Start are professional, and they seem to really care about each child, Dickson said.

"If someone is seeing my child sometimes more in a day than I do, I feel bad that it's not me, and I want that person to be someone I respect and think is professional," she said.

The hugs and smiles given by Head Start professionals actually do mean something, Sally Frick,

Famed teacher to present ideas

SERA L. TANK
Collegian

The man who took New Jersey's Eastside High School from violence to a model school is coming to K-State.

Joe Clark, educator and author, will speak at 7 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Sarah Hadley, program adviser for UPC Issues and Ideas Committee, said the committee chose Clark because he is well-known and will attract a large audience.

"He has done some pretty respectable things to straighten out his inner-city high school," she said.

Clark is best known as the subject of the movie "Lean On Me," starring Morgan Freeman as Clark.

Clark is currently vying for the position of superintendent for the New York City school district, Patrick Carney, Issues and Ideas Committee chairman, said.

Carney said he heard Clark speak at Johnson County Community College a few years ago and was impressed with his ideas.

Carney said Clark will most likely tell students not to stand for the way things are now.

"The message he carries to students is that you have a chance to make a difference," he said.

Carney also said Clark's speeches are usually forceful and intense.

"The story he brings forward is one of empowerment. He'll tell us to get off our butts and do something," he said.

Hadley said Clark is known nationally as a highly motivational speaker.

"He'll probably tell you how if you set your mind to do something, you usually succeed," she said.

Clark's speech will be sponsored by the UPC's Issues and Ideas Committee as a part of Black History Month.

Carney said tickets to the event are free, but seats at McCain are first-come, first-serve.

"We encourage everyone to come as soon as possible. We are expecting a packed house," he said.

Sandpainting, song possible pain relievers

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

Wouldn't it be nice to look at a picture or design and end all of your body's aches and pains?

Native Americans have been doing this for centuries.

Ron McCoy, director of the Center for Great Plains Study and professor of history at Emporia State University, will give a presentation titled "Shamans, Sandpaintings and Songs: Healing Arts of Native America."

McCoy said the lecture will cover different strategies that various American Indian cultures use in the healing process.

The presentation will be at 7 p.m. Thursday in the Manhattan Public Library auditorium.

McCoy said he will focus mainly on the Navajo Indian healing process that uses sandpaintings.

"Navajo sandpainting is a graphic way of engaging the healing process," McCoy said.

"Sandpainting uses pictures to trigger healing in patients."

McCoy gained his knowledge of Navajo sandpaintings when he lived and researched for four years on a Navajo Indian reservation in northeast Arizona.

"Researchers of today are analyzing the link-up of the mind-body healing process," he said.

"Obviously there is a connection between the mind and body," McCoy said. "Therefore, more study is being done by non-Indian doctors and psychiatrists."

The presentation will include slides and drawings of sandpaintings and also a question-and-answer time for the audience.

The presentation is free and open to the public. The lecture is being sponsored by the Manhattan Library Association and KSU Friends of the Libraries.

Senate allocations debate focuses on BSU, ministry

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

Student Governing Association once again tabled an amendment that would cut UFM salary funding to nothing for the 1995-96 year.

No date was set for further discussion on the UFM salary funding.

SGA did pass allocation recommendations for the FONE Crisis Center, Apostolic Campus Ministry, Students for Sustainability and Black Student Union.

The funding recommendations for BSU and Apostolic Campus Ministry received the most debate.

The debate about BSU came from an amendment purposed to fund a third project for the group.

"To fund a third project is fair because BSU is very active and has accomplished a lot. They've done more than most groups I've seen," Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, said.

Funding more than two projects for any group is against the informal guidelines set by the Allocations Committee, Ben Clouse, committee chairman, said.

"It is unfair and ridiculous when nobody else gets a third project bylaw," he said.

The amendment was not passed, but BSU will receive $1,228 for the other two projects it is sponsoring.

Apostolic Campus Ministry will be given $289, but this was debated because it is a religious organization.

"It is a controversial issue to fund a religious organization, but we shouldn't have to worry about what the Supreme Court is doing if our campus lawyer says it's OK," Derek Kreifels, business senator, said.

SGA also completed business carried over from a previous meeting. Voting guidelines, constitution and bylaw revisions were passed.

The voting procedure will not be any different from what students are used to.

"This is the way it has been done, but it wasn't written anywhere, and we needed to make it official," Becca Korphage, arts and sciences senator, said.

Amounts for allocations are as follows:

- FONE Center will be given $11,802 to continue its suicide and crisis prevention services to K-State students.
- Two projects sponsored by Students for Sustainability will receive $1,263.

4-lane bridge construction allows business to expand

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

This is one of a continuing series of stories looking at the ways the building of the Kansas Highway 177 bridge can change businesses and lives.

Expansion was the name of the game when Burnett's Automotive was faced with eviction.

MAKING WAY FOR K-177

The Kansas Department of Transportation told Burnett's it was going to have to move.

Burnett's was just one of the businesses in the path of the construction of the new Kansas Highway 177 four-lane bridge.

Tom Burnett, owner, said the building, which was located on Second Street, was originally built to be a warehouse. But when Burnett's got into the commercial tire business, they also used the location for that business as well.

The building was a sheet-metal building and was built in 1986. Because it was designed to be a warehouse, the commercial tire business was just added into the space left over.

"We used to have to work outside at times," Dave Rogers, manager of the commercial tire store, said.

Rogers also said the new building, at 400 Call Road, was built to fit the business with the added space for expansion.

The option was given to Burnett's to purchase the old building and move it to a new site.

Burnett said they decided against buying the old building and moving it to a new site because the cost involved was too much.

"The building we required needed to be bigger and taller. Plus, we would have had to remove everything from the site and return the land to its natural state," Burnett said.

Burnett's moved in the middle of August.

KDOT reimbursed Burnett's $20,000 to relocate, and Burnett's spent $300,000 for the new building, Burnett said.

The expansion has more than doubled the building, from 4,000

▶ COMPUTER-TECHNOLOGY CORPORATION TO VISIT CAMPUS TODAY

A 70-foot semi trailer full of the latest in computer technology will visit campus today.

From 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., Silicon Graphics Computer Systems will be between Durland and Seaton halls, and visitors are welcome to talk to representatives and check out what Silicon Graphics has to offer.

Silicon Graphics is a company that is targeting everything from supercomputers to video games.

Company leaders have become involved in several partnerships with other companies that have helped Silicon Graphics exceed the developments of the competition.

The company has worked together with many large corporations, including AT&T and Nintendo. Silicon Graphics has also been involved in commercial animation, including a Listerine commercial and the graphic imaging in the movie "Forrest Gump."

"The entertainment industry is the technology driver of the decade. Today's audiences expect experiences that are realistic, exciting and interactive," said Mike Ramsay, senior vice president of Silicon Graphics' Visual Systems Group.

The work with graphic imaging has been used in several exhibits at Walt Disney World and Epcot Center.

The U.S. Army was also interested in the graphic work of Silicon Graphics at Disney World in hopes to incorporate some of the programs into the defense department.

Silicon Graphics has also worked on the video on demand server.

This allows videos to be shown on computer screens without the use of a VCR, Alex Ehrsam, Silicon Graphics representative, said.

Recently, Silicon Graphics has taken the lead in its involvement in medical technology and imaging. Ehrsam said in the future, doctors will be able to look at a 3-D image to operate on a person.

Right now, Iowa State students are working on creating the computer body image.

The semi, which is known to Silicon Graphics as the "Magic Bus," usually frequents corporations all over the United States, but the company is turning to the university market.

"We usually visit companies like Boeing and others in corporate America, but we're going to focus on universities like K-State. We want to make our high-tech machines at a lower cost that people can afford," Ehrsam said.

The University of Missouri recently purchased almost 100 machines from Silicon Graphics to use in the math and chemistry departments.

Architecture is expected to be a big market, and the company is working on an AutoCAD program on which the user can fly through the design using virtual reality.

For campus visits, Silicon Graphics will bring its latest developments in the computer industry and offer demonstrations in graphics programs and in virtual reality.

"Silicon Graphics is the virtual-reality leader in the world," Ehrsam said.

▶ FATALITIES AID IN DECISION TO LOWER STAGG HILL SPEED LIMIT

Individuals who are used to driving within a 30-mph zone in the Stagg Hill neighborhood will have to slow down.

Between 1991 and 1994, five accidents occurred at intersections in Stagg Hill, resulting in two fatalities, Jerry Petty, city engineer, said.

Results of a traffic engineering study showed that 85 percent of drivers passing through the neighborhood drive an average of 28 mph in a 30-mph zone, Petty said.

"In our opinion, lowering the speed limit to 25 mph can be justified because there are no sidewalks in the area, and there is considerable pedestrian activity in the streets.

"But I can't recommend lowering it to 20 mph based on the facts that I have from the study," he said.

Petty said most people are going to drive at the speed they feel is reasonable and as fast as the conditions allow.

CITY Commission

"But a few people will drive the posted limit, and when they mix with the people who are driving faster, the chance of accidents will increase," he said.

The city commission must decide if the speed limit will become 25 mph or 20 mph.

Another traffic study is tentatively planned in six months to see if the new speed limit is acceptable or needs to be changed again.

Mayor Helen Cooper said she would like to think of the Stagg Hill neighborhood as a pilot project.

"According to the results we get from the study, we may be able to apply them to the entire community," she said.

Neighborhood individuals concerned about safety put together a petition requesting the current speed limit of 30 mph be lowered.

"Does it make sense to protect our children at school with 20-mph zones and then not protect them when they're at home or somewhere else?" said Alice Blecha, member of Stagg Hill Neighborhood Association Board.

"They are forced to ride their bikes or walk in the street to their friends' houses. We urge a 20-mph speed limit. I don't think changing it to 25 mph will have the effect we're hoping for," she said.

Anil Pahwa, Stagg Hill resident, said the majority of people in the area have asked for 20 mph, and he would like to give it a chance.

"If they don't follow it," he said, "then they don't deserve it, and it should be moved up to 25 mph."

▶ ART REVIEW

Galleries display artistic talents

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

After walking around campus with freezing cheeks, wander into an art gallery for a few minutes and warm up.

If you haven't had the time to see various art exhibits around campus and Manhattan the past month, this week is your last chance.

Union Art Gallery

Ceramics by Hiro Fukawa are on display from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. until Friday at the Union Art Gallery.

At first, you might be taken aback by Fukawa's interesting installation, but it is visitor-friendly.

Fukawa has taken mirrors and added dialogues of expression on them, leaned them against three of the gallery walls and then filled the interior space with a very large metal creation, which looks like a bird cage fallen over.

What to think of it all?

There is no explanation given at the gallery, and Fukawa was unavailable for comment. It makes you wonder why Union Program Council didn't program an African American artist or show for Black History Month.

Chang Gallery

"High Ideals and Aspirations," from the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art, is on display from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday through Feb. 24 at the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall.

This little exhibit traces the Nelson, so beloved by Kansas-Citians, through its humble beginnings in the 1920s to the existing institution.

It's worth an extra five minutes to pop in and read the placards, but you won't find too much detail. There are some fascinating pictures of the building during construction, the original garden designs and the building on its opening day.

If you love the Nelson or haven't ever been there, this exhibit is a basic, understandable way to pick up some offhand knowledge about the museum.

McCain Auditorium

"The Works," an exhibit of works by masters of fine arts graduate students, is shown from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. until this Saturday in the McCain Auditorium lobby.

This show, a great chance to acquaint yourself with works by K-State students, encompasses many facets of the arts.

There are ceramics, paintings, digital prints and many mixed-media pieces.

Phyllis Epps' "Oranges" and "Walnuts," both digital art, are splashy color pieces with a hint of graffiti-art inspiration in their displays.

"Untitled," a wonderfully color-filled digital silkscreen self-portait by Robert Nellis, is practically life-sized, if not larger.

Next to it is Kim Logan's witty "The More I Like Dogs," a digital print infused with a little smart feminism.

Not to miss are Brad Finson's two pieces, "Tavi" and "Leprous Little Lepidopteran," made of acrylic, duralar and wood. These colorful skeletal constructions are either fun or scary; it's what you make of them.

They have the quality of a Frank Stella piece from afar, but upon closer inspection the bone-like frame supporting the colorful blanket-like surface is frighteningly rustic.

Strecker Gallery

"New Works by Gallery Artists," including Jim Munce and Dean Mitchell, is now showing through Feb. 28 at the Strecker Gallery in downtown Manhattan.

Munce, a K-State professor of art, excels with mastery at biblical-referenced etchings. He is perhaps one of the region's best artists, and any new work of his is not to be missed.

Equally adept at extraordinary creations is Overland Park artist Mitchell. He has created quite a name for himself with his brilliant watercolor portraits and his oils of houses.

Strecker Gallery hours are from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday.

Columbian Theatre

"Home and Away," a collection of paintings by Louis Copt and Allan Worthing, is now at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego.

The Columbian is open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday and from 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday.

Workshop discusses relationship problems, solutions

MIKE HILL
Collegian

Relationships are things that need to be built so they can stand the test of time.

The Black Student Union sponsored a workshop on relationships Tuesday night in the K-State Union.

Husband and wife Freeman Davis, coordinator of multicultural affairs, and Olga Davis, assistant professor of speech, were the speakers at the workshop.

Freeman said the word love has come to mean too many things in today's world.

"Love is a word that is often taken out of context," he said.

Freeman said the term falling in love is incorrect.

"Falling means tripping and falling, but love is something we don't trip into," he said.

Individuality is important in building a strong relationship, Freeman said.

"When you get married or start a relationship, it is important that the two people remain individuals," he said.

Freeman said divorce is sometimes necessary to keep individuality.

"Having divorce is putting up the exit sign so you can leave if you are losing your individuality," he said.

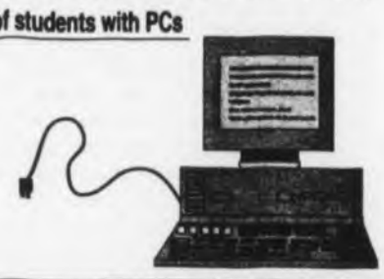
Olga said men and women must bring all their strengths and put them together to make relationships work.

"Men and women need to help each other to reach their full potential," she said.

Olga said love is something you must develop every day.

"Love is what keeps you young," she said.

Olga said she hoped the workshop would spark discussion.



"Even if we just started dialog, we are happy," she said.

Q: What do preschool-age children and college students have in common?

A: Both may be hurt if the Head Start program is cut from the federal budget.

Head Start is a program that educates and provides care for preschool-age children coming from poor families. In addition to helping those college students who must support children, it also provides valuable jobs for others.

It is a highly professional government program that encourages parents to be active in their children's learning process. It is certainly not a typical day care. Unfortunately, that is exactly what it is in danger of becoming.

The budget before Congress favors cutting programs similar to Head Start and then giving the money to the states in Block Grants. A Block Grant would not require any state to continue such a program at current levels.

This move could drastically cut both the child-care options and the work-experience opportunities currently available for K-State students. If you would like to see this program continue, write to your representatives and senators today.

Isolation can lead to racial tension

The following is an open letter to Joe Clark, who will be speaking tonight at 7:30 at McCain Auditorium.

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

Dear Mr. Clark,

It is an honor to have you speak at K-State during Black History Month. You would be welcome at all times of the year, but your appearance during the month of February puts your presence in an even more special light.

I lived in New Jersey from 1986 to 1992. I moved there from rural Indiana. As an outsider, I was overwhelmed by the urban blight that often lies only miles, even blocks, from comfortable, safe neighborhoods. Poverty and wealth coexist within a stone's throw of one another in New Jersey. You're no stranger to this.

Here in Kansas, Mr. Clark, we face different challenges. There are yawning gaps between the poor and the rich, but here the groups are often separated by greater distances and kept in lower numbers. The suburb of Overland Park, one of the wealthiest communities in America, is miles from Troost Avenue in Kansas City, Mo., one of the city's most depressed areas. This keeps people separated.

Wichita's well-to-do west and underprivileged east sides try never to meet eyes. Topeka has class and race divisions that have put it in the history books. Plenty of other small towns have few, if any, minorities that, because of the isolation of the towns, have their own unique problems to deal with.

In New Jersey, there are some 11 million people packed into an area that's smaller than one of Kansas' congressional districts. Kansas' population is less than one-fourth of New Jersey's spread out in a space five times as large.

The high population density and the proximities of populations force people of different backgrounds to at least see each other. Whether it's on the bus, on the train, at the Giant's game or at the boardwalk, most people in New Jersey learn to at least coexist with others who are different from them.

This doesn't end the divisions between people, but it puts a face on the situation.

On the other hand, some white people here in Kansas live miles away from minorities. Some spend their youths learning almost everything they know about minorities from television.

Those who go on to higher education sometimes have a difficult time grasping the diversity of the world outside of the sheltered one from which they came.

Some never do and return to their familiar, unchallenging worlds.

In addition, some Kansans are unapologetic bigots. Unlike New Jersey, where the racism may be covert, private or sometimes even absent, many Kansans of color find themselves the subjects of epithets from entire communities of people. Kansas hospitality exists for you — if you're white.

Kansas and New Jersey face very different but very real racial divisions. How can Kansas' people of color empower themselves when they are spread out so thinly?

Perhaps what is needed is the kind of strict but positive attitude you brought to Eastside High School in Paterson, N.J. Maybe you can serve as an inspiration.

Maybe Kansans of color can choose to stay on the high road above the muck of antagonism, retaliatory racism, vengeance and finger-pointing. The attitude of keeping a higher moral standard than an oppressor has worked throughout history in Ghandi's India, the Holocaust and in the movement that brought Topeka's board of education before the U.S. Supreme Court.

That's not happening now. You know that the civil-rights movement lost some of the wind in its sails by the 1970s because 15 years of work did not completely fix 400 years of damage. This malaise has permeated almost every black community in America in one way or another.

With the lack of opportunity, motivation and education for many minorities in Kansas, poverty of the soul is on the rise. Gang culture is increasingly filling the needs of young people caused by weakened families. Unlike in South Orange, N.J., though, the streets of Manhattan have not been a battlefield for decades. Instead, the destructive anger of black people from urban centers around the country is being transported like a virus to towns like ours.

Gone is the motivational anger that caused marches on Selma and Birmingham, Ala. Gone is the motivational anger that put the bat and bullhorn in your hand so you could try to make Eastside High a place of opportunity.

I'm left with questions, Mr. Clark: What can education do when students won't go to school? What can discipline do when parents let the police be their babysitters? What can leadership do when the people who need to listen are deaf to you? Are these questions even relevant?

Thank you, Mr. Clark, for coming to K-State.

Stay strong, and may God bless and guide you.

There's a season for all things, kittens included

KADY MASSEY

Today is the day after Valentine's, and I'll tell you what I got from my sweetheart. Nothing! That's right, nothing. OK, I got dinner, but aside from that, I got nothing.

No, I'm not going to dump him for two reasons: 1) We have too much of each other's stuff to ever untangle it all without a lawyer and 2) it's not his fault.

I can forgive him very easily because I, too, didn't know that there was a season for kittens.

Strawberries have a season; kittens you should be able to get whenever the urge arises.

I could have sworn I always saw people trying to give away kittens all year round when I was a kid.

Spike (he asked that I don't use his real name) and I have been talking about getting a cat for several months. We both like them and owned them before we met. Cats also have certain advantages over dogs in that they are lower-maintenance, tend to be quieter and are much less likely to attack the mailman and small children.

So on Monday, we sat in my kitchen and discussed what we would give each other for V-day. The usual stuff came up (lingerie, socks, blenders). Then, he suggested that this might be a good time to get that cat we've been talking about. Actually, the word "kitten" came up more often because neither one of us really wants to untrain someone else's cat.

This would also serve as the dry run before having kids — if we could successfully raise a cat, then maybe we would begin to fathom having children.

So we decided to be responsible and go to the animal shelter first instead of a pet store. I've always felt sort of odd about paying money for a kitten when I can adopt one and save it from the jaws of death. After looking in the phone book and figuring out where to go, we headed off.

On the way, we made a quick swing through Wal-Mart to buy cat supplies, fully expecting to take home a wide-eyed bundle of fluff.

Once there, we found out that all they had was full-grown cats. This would have been fine, but we were both pretty well set on a kitten. After a quick discussion with each other and some assurances from the nice lady working there that kittens wouldn't be in season until next month at least, we headed off.

This was the first I'd ever heard that kittens were out of season.

I suggested we stop by a friend of mine's house on the way home. Meg owns two cats and a puppy and seems to have animals fall into her lap without really trying. Meg suggested we call Konza Veterinary Clinic. They give away kittens for the price of the shots and the spaying or neutering. I called, and the lady who answered the phone said very politely that no, they hadn't had any kittens since before Christmas, but because the season for them starts next month, she expected scads of kittens then.

Dejected, disappointed and bewildered, we headed for home.

I finally broke down and called a pet store, only to be told politely but firmly that it was too early in the year to be looking for kittens.

So now I am the proud owner of a litter box, a bag of litter and a food dish but no feline housecats. Spike has given me an IOU for a cat, and I'm keeping my eyes peeled for any kittens that look homeless.

I've just been told by one of the reporters here in the Collegian office to try a place in Topeka, but I think this is getting a little out of hand.

All I want is a cat.

This has been an unusual experience for me. I had never considered kittens to be like peaches, and I had to enjoy them while they lasted.

I guess I'll have to wait for the first litters to appear in the spring, like crocuses.

▶ PARKING PROPOSAL

Stadium too useful to change

Dear editor,

I was disturbed when I read about the proposal to put a parking garage in Memorial Stadium. Obviously, there is more than a slight parking problem here at K-State, but sticking a parking garage in the middle of the stadium hardly seems the ideal solution.

There is something peaceful and relaxing about Memorial Stadium. It provides a refreshing change from the sidewalk, streets and narrow spaces between buildings, which tend to dominate the rest of our campus. It is nice at the end of a long day spent inside classrooms or at work to walk by the stadium and enjoy the marching band practicing, or a frisbee or a football game in progress. And a sunset, or sunrise for that matter, seen through the battlements of the stadium is perfectly beautiful.

"It provides a refreshing change from the sidewalk, streets and narrow spaces between buildings, which tend to dominate the rest of our campus."

LORI RANDALL
junior in modern languages/German

Somehow, I have the feeling that a parking garage, no matter how "aesthetically correct," would kind of tend to diminish the beauty of nature around the stadium and would definitely displace the band, joggers, the dog-walkers, the studiers, the frisbee players, etc.

I understand that the proposal plans to make up for this loss of open space by ripping up the lower half of the Union parking lot and planting it with grass. It seems that logic would dictate that grass remain grass, concrete remain concrete and a parking garage be constructed somewhere where there is already concrete. There are numerous existing parking lots around campus that would make far better sites for a parking garage than the stadium.

All of this aside, let us not forget why Memorial Stadium is so called. It is dedicated to the memory of those associated with K-State in World War I. Their names are listed on two plaques, one on the south wall of each half of the stadium. If the horseshoe were completed, these names would most likely get buried under a ton or so of rock and mortar. A generation from now, we will wonder why we ever called the old place "Memorial Stadium."

I seriously doubt that we would put a bike rack in the middle of our Vietnam memorial. That idea probably strikes most of us as tacky, absurd and irreverent. However, when one thinks about it, there is really very little difference between that suggestion and the idea of putting a parking garage inside what is essentially K-State's World War I Memorial. Those who died in any war deserve a little more respect than to have a bunch of people driving cars around in their memorial.

▶ PARKING PROPOSAL

Memorial Stadium should stay

Dear editor,

This whole business of putting a parking garage inside Memorial Stadium and thinking it will be OK as long as the top of it can't be seen above the walls of the stadium from the outside is ridiculous.

"Memorial Stadium is a war memorial that should not be desecrated, and it is also one of the few truly beautiful places left on campus."

MICHELLE ANDERSON
junior in civil engineering and mathematics

Memorial Stadium is a war memorial that should not be desecrated, and it is also one of the few truly beautiful places left on campus. Its old-fashioned architecture is very refreshing to look at, especially after looking at some of the modern buildings on campus, like "block of cement sitting on the ground" Bluemont Hall. I often go for walks at Memorial Stadium, and I enjoy very much the whole environment there. I also seldom see it unused. There are always people on the field or walking like me.

If we are to build a parking garage, it should be built by St. Isidore's, which is only about a block of walking farther from the Union, a small price to pay for preserving the beautiful Memorial Stadium. Surely all these people who are complaining about walking at most 20 minutes to class from B-2 and B-3 lots (which always have some empty space) wouldn't complain about two minutes of walking extra from how much they would walk if they parked in the Union lot.

▶ CHRISTIANITY

Love also means being tolerant

Dear editor,

I am responding to John Hart's latest column where he has once again tried to shame the entire campus into being good Christians. I still don't quite understand his "I got a more gooder Gawd and more better morals than you" philosophy. However, this is something I can live with; in fact, I'm quite used to it. What disturbed me was his insistence that tolerance is a "spineless" way to approach the world. He then gave us a lecture on what an agitator Jesus Christ was and how he wasn't afraid to annoy and offend others.

I have always held the belief that Jesus preached love to the masses, and not, contrary to what Hart's Jesus preached, hatred. Please allow me to ask the simple question: What is love, if it is not tolerance for the failings of others? What is love if it does not mean taking into account human shortcomings? For, how can any one human being ever hope to love another if they do not possess even the tiniest molecule of tolerance? I take issue with the idea that tolerance is the liberal's "spineless" way to treat the world with kid gloves and rose-colored glasses in a futile attempt to keep everyone happy all of the time.

"Tolerance is for educated adults, especially Christians, who have enough sense to know that not everyone shares their opinions."

JONATHAN SMALL
junior in English and history

Tolerance is for educated adults, especially Christians, who have enough sense to know that not everyone shares their opinions.

But unfortunately, being tolerant is a very difficult task, for it is always much easier to hate in the name of God than it is to really "love one's neighbor as oneself."

Tolerance is absolutely necessary to be a complete Christian.

In the end, Somerset Maugham, one of the century's greatest novelists, summed it best when he said: "Tolerance is not an umbrella you take when you think it will rain and leave at home when it looks fine; tolerance is a staff that you carry with you in all the circumstances of life."

▶ DIVERSITY

Whites don't understand others

Dear editor,

In last Thursday's Collegian, I was quoted as saying "People on this campus don't recognize that there are black students at KSU. We want the acknowledgement that we deserve." Nice try, but no.

What I said was that while we are not looking for approval or sanction from white students or faculty, this institution has a tendency to smile vaguely in our direction, hand us a few hundred dollars for a picnic or an article in the paper and call it a day.

The problem is far too many non-minority students think that because they have seen a Snoop video on MTV, they can relate to the black students' experiences.

There is no real effort between white and non-white students, differences black students are forced to learn, but most white students walk right by with subconscious blinders on.

That's OK, though. At the Black Student Union, with help from the multicultural office, supporters, faculty and students and most important ourselves, we will work it out.

K-State Chi Omegas celebrate 100 years by

The Chi Omega sorority is commemorating 100 years of sisterhood by reading to children across the nation.

Reading aloud

Chi Omegas are commemorating 100 years of sisterhood and the 80th year of the Kappa Alpha chapter at K-State.

The sorority is celebrating its centennial by promoting literacy through out the community with their read-aloud philanthropy.

"We will go to elementary schools around Manhattan and read to the students," said Melissa Ridgway, junior in human development and family studies and chairman of the centennial committee. "It is a nationwide philanthropy for all Chi O chapters."

There will be 175 Chi O chapters participating in the philanthropy this semester.

Local chapter members will be reading to and with students at five Manhattan public schools.

"It will be a very positive experience," Tracey Russell, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said. "It is an opportunity for us to give instead of just planning fun activities for ourselves."

Chi O was founded April 5, 1895, at the University of Arkansas in Fayetteville.

More than 300 alumnae are expected to return for the local celebration March 31-April 2.

"Throughout the weekend, different pledge classes are going to meet at different places," Ridgway said.

On April 1, they will have a luncheon at the K-State Union for alumnae and chapter members. That evening, a banquet and dance will be at the Manhattan Holiday Inn Holidome.

"I am excited to see the upperclassmen from when I was a pledge," said Jennifer Mueller, K-State admissions representative and Chi O alumna. "It'll be a neat experience to interact with older alumni."

Margie Michal, Chi O alumna, said she is also looking forward to attending the celebration.

"It's going to be great not only to see the current girls in the house, but I am looking forward to seeing the girls in my class that I have not seen for 12 years," Michal said.

Saturday afternoon, alumnae will participate in tours of the Chi O's house, campus and of the Theta Xi house, which used to be Chi O's.

"I think a lot of alumnae will enjoy walking around the house to see the improvements that have been made on the house," Mueller said.

Alumnae and current Chi O's are excited about spending the weekend together in celebration of the founding of their sorority.

"I am looking forward to centennial weekend because it is one of the greatest experiences to be here when we are celebrating the 100th birthday of Chi Omega," Nancy Radenbaugh, sophomore in speech pathology, said.

"It will be fun and different with the alumni at our formal," Heather Knedlik, sophomore in business said. "I am excited about meeting and talking with them."

All 126 K-State Chi Os are planning to participate in the founders' day celebration on April 5 in Kansas City. The event is being organized by the Kansas City alumnae and other Chi O's from the University of Kansas, Emporia State and the University of Missouri-Kansas City are planning on attending.

The chapter will also send representatives to the national celebration on April 7-9.

"More than 70 chapter members are planning to travel to the University of Arkansas to participate in the national celebration," Ridgway said.

"It makes my job worthwhile to know how much Chi Omega meant to them and now how much it means to us and being able to plan an event to celebrate together," she said.

BRIEFS & NOTES

ROCKY mountain low

Losing road games in the Big Eight isn't something new for K-State this season.

Saturday in Boulder, the losing continued as the Cats dropped one to Colorado 82-68 in the Coors Events Center.

The loss dropped K-State's record to 11-11 and 2-8 in the Big Eight.

The Cats only led once, which was on the opening basket. K-State would never lead again.

"We played well enough to keep us around — even down 12 with five minutes to go," said K-State coach Tom Asbury, whose team fell into a last-place.

K-State shot a frigid 35 percent from the floor, while Colorado shot a scorching 57.4 percent, which is the highest a team has shot against K-State this season.

K-State will host KU at 2:50 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage.

PHILL SPIKER

TRACK faces best

K-State took a partial squad to Lincoln, Neb., Friday and Saturday to compete against some of the best in the nation.

Belinda Hope established herself as one of the top runners in the nation with her victory in the 400 meters.

"The competition was a little different than I thought," Hope said. "Some of the times they entered with were a little faster than they actually ran."

Hope's time of 54.57 seconds provisionally qualifies her for the NCAA Indoor Championships.

Also adding to a winning streak was high jumper Gwen Wentland. Wentland captured first with a leap of 6 feet 2 inches.

The men added some names of their own to the NCAA qualifiers list. Dante McGrew finished second in the triple jump with 51'6-1/4".

Itai Margalit again cleared 7'1" in the high jump and found himself in the middle of a five-way tie for second place.

K-State returns home Friday for the KSU Open.

WESS HUDELSON

TENNIS snowed over

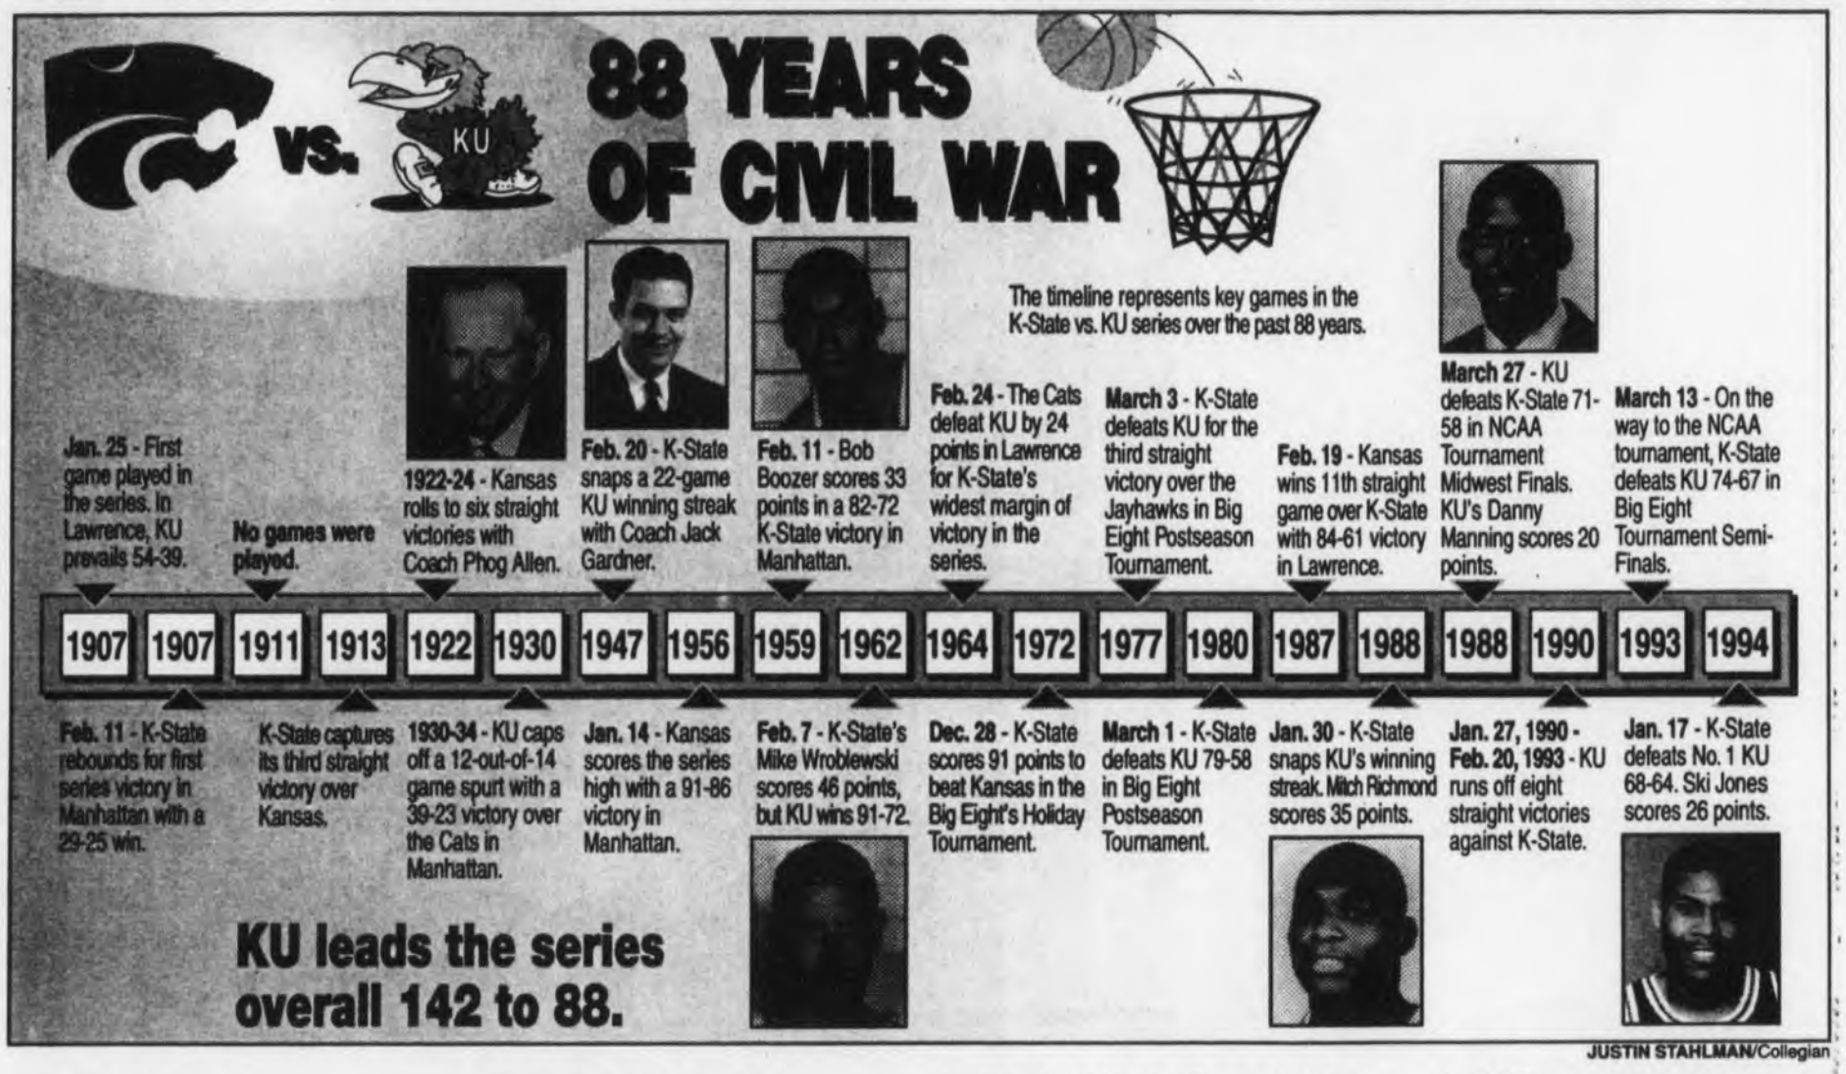
A winter storm that dropped eight to nine inches of snow in Salt Lake City forced an early end Sunday morning of the women's tennis match between K-State and Weber State.

The event was canceled after an accident involving the Weber State team bus was reported. No one was injured in the accident.



For K-State, the trip to the state of Utah produced only one victory for the Wildcats. The lone win came in No. 1 doubles against Utah on Saturday.

Intra-state rivalry one of the country's strongest

SUNFLOWER MEMORIES

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

JEREMY CRABTREE

Phog Allen, Jack Hartman, Danny Manning, Bob Boozer and Mitch Richmond are names that would stand out in the minds of many Big Eight Conference fans.

However, there is one thing that all these names have in common — they're are all part of the legendary rivalry between K-State and Kansas.

For some, the Sunflower Series is the biggest rivalry in the country.

Doubts? Just ask Kansas coach Roy Williams.

"Records don't matter in this game," Williams said earlier this year. "It's one of the most heated rivalries in the country. I'm just excited to be part of it."

The series dates back to Jan. 25, 1907. That's when the first game was played in Lawrence. The K-State coach was the legendary Mike Ahearn, and KU's coach was the even more well-known Allen.

Kansas jumped out to an early lead and never let go for a 54-39 victory.

However, the Wildcats bounced back in the next meeting of the two teams with a 29-25 victory in Manhattan.

For a short period, the series turned into a see-saw battle with both teams taking turns beating up on each other.

Then, during the 1912-13 season, the Cats captured their third straight victory against Kansas.

The Roaring Twenties came along with a domination by the Kansas squads, which were led by players such as George Rody, Paul Endacott and Charles Black.

Endacott was KU's best during the 1920s, Allen said.

In fact, in the period between 1922 and 1924, the Jayhawks captured six straight victories against the Cats. In 1922 KU was also named the Helms National Champion.

The Jayhawks' domination continued into the 1930s and '40s behind the Jayhawks' Allen, who became one of the most winning coaches in college basketball history.

In the 1930s, Kansas won 27 out of the decade's 30 games. Then, in the 1940s, KU ran off a streak of 22 straight victories against K-State.

Kansas was the dominant team not only in the Sunflower Series, but also in what was then the Big Six Conference, in which the Jayhawks finished no lower than third place.

On Feb. 20, 1947, K-State snapped the Kansas winning streak with a 48-45 victory in Manhattan.

That season, the Cats were led by Coach Jack Gardner, and K-State went on to have a 14-10 record.

The Cats used that success to defeat the Jayhawks three straight times during the 1947-48 season, along the way to a 22-6 record. That season, the Cats went all the way to the Final Four in the NCAA tournament.

K-State had finally gotten to the level to compete with the Jayhawks.

In the series' next eight games, the Cats won six.

Both programs continued their consistency as the two squads averaged at least 17 wins each from 1951 through 1961.

During that span, one of the series' greatest games was played in Lawrence.

On Feb. 3, 1958, the Cats traveled to Lawrence to face the Jayhawks in a game that went into two overtimes.

To add even more fuel to the rivalry, K-State came into the game with a 13-1 record, and its only loss had been to the 12-2 Jayhawks earlier in the season.

In the first half, the Cats used a blistering fast-break attack and stubborn defense in the final moments to escape from Lawrence with a 79-75 victory.

K-State's Boozer led all scorers with 32 points, and the Cats jumped out to a 21-10 lead in the first half. The Cats continued to build on that lead until halftime, when they led 41-28.

"During the first half, we played our best ball of the year," former K-State coach Tex Winter said.

However, KU started to rally behind 7-foot all-American Wilt Chamberlain. Chamberlain singlehandedly brought the Jayhawks back into the game.

But it was KU's Ron Loneski who nailed a jump shot to even the score up at 56-56 with 5:22 left in the second half.

The scored remained tied at 60-60 with 2:30 left in regulation, and because there was no shot clock, the Cats stalled for the final shot of the game.

Despite a set play, Jack Parr missed a jumper with five seconds left. That sent the game into overtime.

The scored remained tied after the first overtime was over, so the game was forced into a second overtime.

That's when Boozer took over, as he nailed a hook shot to give the Cats a 71-69 lead — a lead they would never give up.

"This was Boozer's finest game ever," Winter said. "K-State may not have the finesse of a lot of ball clubs, but this is undoubtedly one of the best Wildcat teams in the history of the school."

The 1960s saw K-State become the dominating team, as several of K-State's Sunflower Series records were set.

K-State's Mike Wroblewski scored 46 points in 1964, and the Cats defeated KU by 24 points for its worst defeat in the series.

In the 1970s, competition remained close and hard fought, as the two teams split games over the decade. However, K-State ended up leading the decade as Hartman emerged as one of the country's premier coaches.

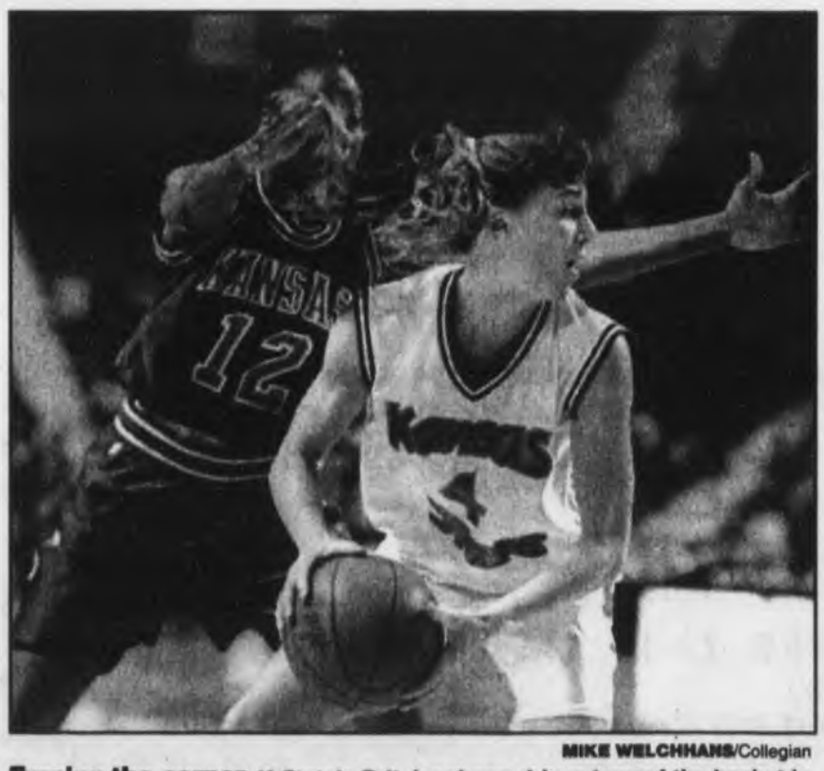
However, the '80s were owned by Kansas as the Jayhawks ripped off 10 straight victories.

That streak ended on Jan. 30, 1988, when the Cats defeated the Jayhawks 77-61 in Lawrence.

This streak not only snapped KU's domination in the 1980s, but it also ruined the Jayhawks' 55-game home-winning streak. At the time, that streak was the NCAA's longest home-court winning streak.

"It's a great feeling, stopping KU's winning streak," K-State's all-America forward Richmond said. "I think this was one of the biggest wins so far."

Richmond led the Cats with 35 points, 23 of which came in the second half, for one of the most memorable performances by a K-State player.



"What a great second half he had," former K-State coach Lon Kruger said.

Kruger said another thing made the Cats' victory against the Jayhawks even more impressive.

"We were down 10 in the first half — and that probably makes the win a little sweeter, but we are proud of the way we pulled together."

K-State, 13-9, claimed its third straight Big Eight victory Sunday with an 80-73 win over 15th-ranked Kansas.

The win snapped a seven-game losing streak to the Jayhawks and evened the Cats' conference record at 5-5.

"This is huge," Wildcat senior Shanele Stires said.

K-State	80
Kansas	73

All-American Angela Aycock scored the first basket for Kansas.

But Stires and freshman Brit Jacobson led the Cats on a 13-4 run, and the lead remained with K-State the rest of the game.

"We got off to a really good start today, then fought them off down the stretch," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

Unlike the previous meeting in Lawrence, the Jayhawks were never able to establish their running game, hampering their offensive set.

"We came out right away and took control of the tempo," Jacobson said.

"Our shooting struggled all game. There's no question about it," Kansas coach Marian Washington said. "It was disappointing for us, but you can't take anything away from how hard they played."

The Cats held Kansas, the Big Eight's leading offense, to just 39.6-percent shooting from the field and only three of 11 from three-point land.

Though Aycock, who leads the conference in scoring, finished with 24 points to lead the Hawks, she shot just six of 18 and missed both her attempts from behind the three-point arc. Agler gave some of the credit to defender Lisa Gaitor.

"Lisa did a good job on Aycock," Agler said. "We kept rotating people on her, and she did get tired at times. We just couldn't keep her off the free-throw line."

K-State's shots had no problem finding the bottom of the net.

The Cats connected on 47.3 percent of their field goals, including 10 of 20 from the arc. The Cats led by as much as 15 in the first half before taking a 12-point lead into the break.

1988 game in Michigan broke Wildcat fans' hearts

KU beats Cats for trip to Final Four in 1988

TODD STEWART
Collegian

Oh, what might have been.

Pontiac, Mich., was the setting. K-State and Kansas were the opponents.

At stake was a trip to the 1988 NCAA Final Four in Kansas City.

In the 95-year rivalry of K-State-Kansas basketball, this was the game that undoubtedly broke Wildcat hearts everywhere.

Kansas 71
K-State 58

Kansas' 71-58 victory in the Pontiac Silverdome put an end to one of the most historic NCAA Tournament runs in K-State history.

"I'm disappointed, but we knew it had to end sometime," Cat center Ron Meyer said after the Kansas loss.

The tournament run started in South Bend, Ind., with victories over LaSalle and DePaul, which earned the Cats a trip to the Sweet 16 and a date with Midwest Regional No. 1 seed Purdue.

In an earlier season meeting, the Boilermakers thrashed the Cats 101-72.

This one would be different.

Despite Purdue's early 10-0 lead, the Cats fought back behind a pair of impressive second-half runs and all-America forward Mitch Richmond's game-high 27 points.

"When K-State went on a 12-1 run I saw doubt in my players' eyes," Purdue coach Gene Keady said. "They didn't know K-State and its coaching staff like I did."

The 73-70 victory pushed the Cats into the regional finals and a fourth-meeting with Kansas.

Next up was Kansas for the fourth time in the season.

The Wildcats, who had defeated the Jayhawks earlier in the season in Lawrence and Kansas City, saw the rivalry take a step to the next level.

Never before had one game meant so much to both teams.

"Every time we go out, we say we need to take care of our responsibilities," Meyer said.

"Because if we don't, there is no tomorrow."

And for the first half, the Cats took care of their responsibilities.

K-State took a 29-27 lead into the locker room at halftime, thanks in part to 55.6-percent first-half shooting.

In the second half, the Cats would make less than half their shots, while the Jayhawks would shoot an unconscious 61.5 percent.

Richmond, whose 768 points on the season would set a school record, was held to a season-tying low of 11 points.

"They were running someone at me just like they did the other games," Richmond said.

"They double-teamed me every time and made me give it up."

Two-time all-American Danny Manning led the Jayhawk scoring attack with 20 points for his second trip to the Final Four.

"Twice in one career. It's a wonderful feeling," Manning said.

"Danny and the Miracles" would go on to the Final Four in Kansas City, Mo., and win the national championship in an 83-79 victory over fellow Big Eight school Oklahoma.

Richmond

In the 81 years before the legendary showdown in Michigan, and in the seven years since the epic battle, no game has come close to matching the level of importance of that March 27, 1988, game.

It was the Cats' best chance at winning a NCAA National Championship.

The Cats were losers on the scoreboards but not losers in the eyes of their fans.

Hundreds of loyal Wildcat followers waited hours outside Ahearn Field House to welcome the team back after the game.

Cries of "We love you" and "You're still our champs" echoed throughout the crowd as the team returned.

But a loss is a loss, and former K-State coach Lon Kruger could not help but think what might have been.

"I'm disappointed for our players, but I'm proud of them," he said.

"They had a great season — one of the best ever at K-State. It was unfortunate that we were a loser."

After that loss, the Cats have only been to the NCAA Tournament once, in which they lost in the first round.

Rivalry games always hard fought

However, the Jayhawks got their revenge with a 71-58 victory at the NCAAMidwest Regional Finals in the Silverdome in Pontiac, Mich.

The '90s started out with KU capturing eight straight victories against K-State.

But at the Big Eight Tournament Semi-Finals in 1993, the Cats upset the Jayhawks on their way to a NCAA Tournament bid.

Then last season, K-State defeated No. 1-ranked Kansas 68-64 at Allen Fieldhouse, which was the last time Kansas has been beaten at home.

"We had dropped two games in the Big Eight Conference, and we needed one," former K-State guard Anthony Beane said.

"The No. 1 team in the nation, KU at Allen Fieldhouse — that should provide the spark we need."

Earlier this season, K-State came into Lawrence under a new coach with a new system and a losing record for the first time in years.

However, as Williams said, earlier records mean nothing in the Sunflower Series, and the 11-7 Cats nearly upset the No. 8-ranked Jayhawks.

On Saturday, the rivalry will get renewed another time. This time, the Jayhawks will make the trip down Interstate 70 to face K-State in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State is sitting in the bottom of the Big Eight cellar, and KU is holding the No. 3 ranking in the nation.

Expect a blowout?

Traditions say not a chance. Expect the unusual in the Sunflower Series.

Upset sparked by Stires hot shooting in the second half that would cut the lead to one, the Cats never folded. Stires answered with one of her four three-pointers to end the slump.

Then Carlene Mitchell put the game away. After being fouled on a layup and converting the conventional three-point play, she stripped the ball under the Kansas basket, forcing the Hawks to foul.

"Carlene is one reason we're improving so much," Agler said.

"She hit a big basket going to the hole late in the game, then came up with the steal. She just has a lot of confidence."

Stires led all scorers with 31 points. Jacobson and Mitchell each contributed 14, and sophomore Missy Decker finished with 13.

"This is a real uplift going into Oklahoma and Oklahoma State," Decker said.

Stires said the Cats are looking for more wins.

"I think we can go down there and hopefully get two wins," Stires said.

"We need that for position in the Big Eight Tournament. We're still planning on postseason play, and this really kept us in the hunt."

The Cats will travel to Norman, Okla., on Friday and then they will make the trip to Stillwater, Okla., on Sunday.

Last season the Cats dropped both of those games.

Ostertag, Pollard, LaFrentz give No. 2 Kansas

PAINT POWER

CHRISTOPH FUHRMANS
University Daily Kansan

When fans and opponents watch the Kansas Jayhawks play, three things stick out — the heads of senior center Greg Ostertag, sophomore forward Scott Pollard and freshman forward Raef LaFrentz, who stand 7 foot 2, 6'11" and 6'10" respectively.

The Jayhawks' collection of big men is one reason why Kansas is ranked No. 3 in the country and has an overall record of 17-3 and 6-2 in the Big Eight Conference.

Ostertag, Pollard and LaFrentz account for 38 percent of Kansas' offense, 46 percent of the Jayhawks' rebounds and 77 percent of their blocked shots. Pollard said he knew how the stats broke down among the three players.

"We all know Greg is going to get the most blocks and Raef the most points," he said. "I just try to pick up somewhere."

Usually, one player has picked his play each game for the Jayhawks, which is why Kansas is so formidable.

"If one guy has a bad game, then the other two will just step it up," LaFrentz said. "Any one of us could step up in a game and carry the load. That's the great thing about having three big men."

Not only do the three big men help each other out, but their menacing presence on the defensive end of the floor also has helped the rest of the Jayhawks.

Kansas coach Roy Williams said having a shot blocker in Ostertag and two other post players 6'10" and higher allowed other players to overplay the passing lanes more for steals.

Ostertag recently became the Big Eight's all-time leading shot blocker after surpassing former Oklahoma star Stacy King.

Another benefit of having three big men has been the friendships that have developed. LaFrentz said despite the competition between the three during practice, they have become good friends.

"Off the court, we have a great time together," he said.

In fact, the three have such a great time that other players have teased the trio about their behavior, Ostertag said.

"Greg Gurley named us 'The Fun Bunch' because we get along so well off court," he said.

As the senior member of 'The Fun Bunch,' Ostertag said he did not need to teach the younger Pollard and LaFrentz anything about college basketball.

"I haven't had to because they are such great players," he said.

But even with the bunch's ability to dominate a game, Ostertag, Pollard and LaFrentz are still friends having a good time together.

"Coach Williams called us 'The Three Goofs,'" LaFrentz said.

DEAR CASSIE,

by Cassandra Duveaux

Roommate announces she's a lesbian

Dear Cassie,

My roommate and I get along really well, that is until recently.

One night we were up having our usual after-midnight-not-really-studying-laughing fits, and she tells me out of the blue that she is a lesbian. I rolled on the floor laughing thinking she was joking. The more she tried to tell me it was true, the more I laughed. The thing is now she doesn't confide in me for anything and we don't spend any time together anymore.

Signed, Whoops

Dear Whoops,

Tell her you care about her as a friend and that you're sorry that you laughed. You mistook the situation for what it was. And then don't treat her any differently. She's probably feeling a little shy and insecure. She'll come around when she realizes you aren't going to run in the opposite direction.

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

Definitely for heavy metal fans, the Original Motion Picture Soundtrack for "Demon Knight" is loaded with hard-core tracks.

The soundtrack contains 10 rare or unreleased tracks from several of the music industry's heavy hitters.

Megadeth, Rollins Band, the Melvins and Biohazard are just a few of the groups that lend their music to the soundtrack for the Universal Pictures release.

Beginning with the first track, a special edit of "Cemetery Gates" by Pantera, the album takes off and doesn't slow down.

Pantera sounds stronger and harder than ever behind this special edit from their "Cowboys From Hell" album.

Megadeth cut a new track, called "Diadems," especially for this release. Dave Mustaine and company sound the same as always. The track has that hard-edged Megadeth sound with Mustaine's voice grinding out the vocals alongside guitar riffs.

My favorite track on the soundtrack is track six, "Fall Guy," by Rollins Band.

Henry Rollins sounds as pissed-off at the world as ever, growling out lyrics through clenched teeth (or so it sounds at times.)

"Tonight We Murder" by Ministry is one of the faster pieces on the soundtrack, exceeding the speed limit of most songs.

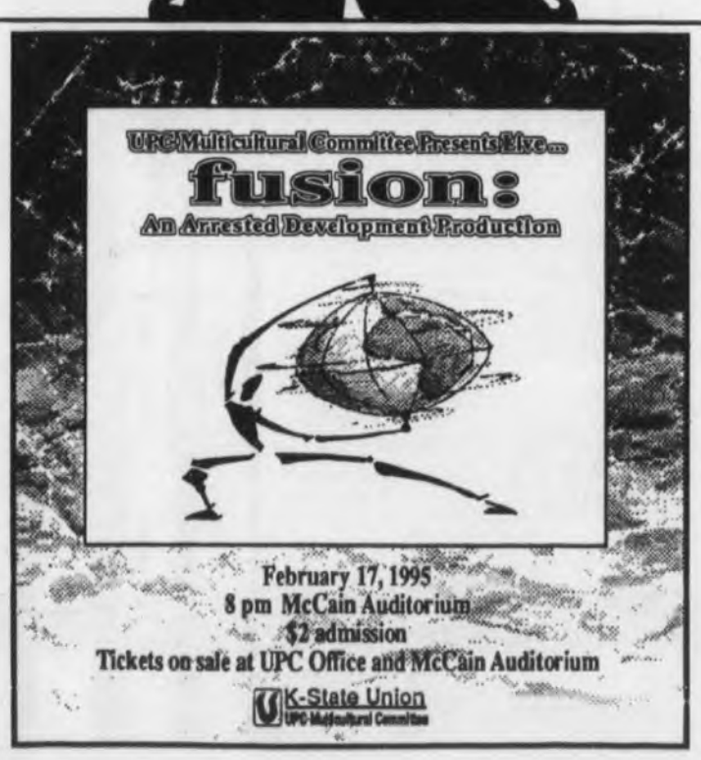
Not one of the best tracks on the album, "Tonight We Murder" still sounds hard-driving and doesn't hurt the overall musical performance recorded on the compact disc.

Gravediggaz bring a different sound to the album in the last track, "1-800-Suicide."

Somewhere in between rap and heavy metal, Gravediggaz bring a hard bass line with rap-style lyrics and ride it to the top.

It is definitely worth your time to hang around till the end of the album to hear it.

Other notable tracks include "Instant Larry" by the Melvins, "My Misery" by Machine Head and "Beaten" by Biohazard. All are definitely worth lending an ear to.



This album is definitely not for everyone. I think only true heavy metal fans could appreciate every track on the CD, but don't let that discourage anyone from trying it.

Strong guitar riffs and a heavy, driving beat keep this album moving right along. If that's your style, you'll love "Demon Knight: Original Motion Picture Soundtrack."

'The Heidi Chronicles'

Comedy examines plight of women from liberation to materialistic '80s

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

Yet another award-winning play will be performed by K-State Theatre.

Wendy Wasserstein's Pulitzer Prize-winning play "The Heidi Chronicles" will open at 8 p.m. Friday at Nichols Theatre.

The play tells the story of Heidi Holland, a woman who has grown up in the midst of the women's movement.

Through different flash-backs, Heidi sees women from the '60s and '70s who have changed their life's purpose from one of empowerment and women's rights to that of materialistic desires in the '80s.

Ayne Steinkuehler, graduate student in theater, plays Heidi.

She describes the play as a comedy but not farsical.

"The play is an intellectual comedy which is full of wit," Steinkuehler said.

The play covers 23 years of Heidi's life and touches on events like the women's-rights movement to the introduction and destruction of AIDS.

"'The Heidi Chronicles' is a very interesting play," Marci Mauller, managing director of the K-State Theatre, said.

"It may sound complicated when trying to describe it, but it's not complicated when you see it."

Three actors play multiple roles, which may cause some confusion, Mauller said.

Mauller said the play shows Heidi's disappointment in the '80s.

Lew Shelton, associate professor of theater and director of the play, said it is a satire of the baby-boomer generation.

"For students, the play is about their parents, and it is nostalgic for older people," Shelton said.

Shelton said each scene centers around a pivotal episode in Heidi's life.

"The scenes are short and very episodic," Shelton said.

"It moves very fast and becomes very consciousness-raising."

Slide images from the '60s, '70s and '80s will be used at scene breaks, Shelton said.

Tim Aumiller, graduate student in speech, plays Peter, Heidi's homosexual pediatrician.

Travis Malone, graduate student in speech, plays Scoop, a womanizing lawyer and editor.

SHOW TIME

"The Heidi Chronicles" will be performed at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday and Feb. 22-25 at Nichols Theatre. A special matinee will be at 2 p.m. Feb. 25.

Tickets are $6 for students and senior citizens and $8 for the general public.

▶ CONTEST

Wanted: all budding Lucases, Spielbergs and Hitchcocks

CARRIE COX
Collegian

Move over, "America's Funniest Home Videos."

Union Program Council is sponsoring "The Catcher in the Wheat" film contest open to students around the nation, Nikka Hellman, Kaleidoscope film committee chairman, said.

"The contest is open to basically anyone in the world who's interested. We'd love to get as many people as possible," Hellman said.

Contest entries can be submitted in 16 millimeter or VHS format with no rules on length or content. The films will be judged on technical proficiency, artistic merit and entertainment value, Hellman said.

Jason Hamilton, film contest chairman, said as an added incentive, the top three winners will receive cash prizes of $300, $150 and $50.

"The first-place winner will also receive a public screening of their film in K-State's Forum Hall. We might be able to show the second- and third-place films too, but we will for sure see the winning entry on the big screen," Hamilton said.

Hellman said fliers promoting the contest have been sent to other colleges. Union Program Council has sent information about the contest to other universities' unions, including those at Nebraska, Oklahoma and Missouri, she said.

"I was trying to think of a way that Kaleidoscope could be more active. If this works out, we would like to make it an annual event," Hamilton said.

Judges for the contest will include four students from the Kaleidoscope Film Committee and two professors, Hamilton said. All entries must include the creator's home address, phone number and a $10 entry fee.

The deadline for submission is March 10, and the winners will be notified by March 24.

Move increases accessibility square feet to 10,000 square feet, and the business has increased its employees to seven.

"It is encouraging that KDOT moved the old building and is using it as a warehouse in Wamego," Burnett said.

The new location has enhanced Burnett's business, Rogers said.

"The layout of the lot is better. The old lot was mainly accessible to pickup trucks and cars. We built the new location specifically for large trucks," Rogers said.

"When your car breaks down, you and your family are the only ones inconvenienced. But when a commercial truck breaks down, there are other people and businesses being inconvenienced and held up," he said.

Rogers said it will take time to build up the expansion because it takes time to earn the trust and respect of those who own commercial trucks.

"They have to believe in you and that you will do the job quickly and effectively," Rogers said. "They need those trucks back."

Burnett's hopes to add not only the commercial tire and mechanical repair business but also to the wholesale business.

"The move was very good," Rogers said. "We positioned it to be the cornerstone of the whole company."

Rogers said the hope for the commercial business is to enhance the store at the Anderson location.

"Being a supplier to the Anderson location, we hope to warehouse a larger variety of tires to choose from," Rogers said.

Burnett said the timing of the bridge expansion really came at an opportune time and allowed Burnett's to get more into mechanical repair.

Overall, the forced move of Burnett's was beneficial. Burnett's commercial tire and mechanical repair business was at the point where it needed to expand.

"We built a business out of the commercial tire business, and we were given the opportunity to expand. This should take the lows out of the business," Rogers said.

Rogers said adding mechanical repair and wholesale allowed Burnett's to take the slow times of the business and make them very efficient.

"I don't know if we would have expanded at the old location," Rogers said. "We owned enough ground to expand."

director of Manhattan's Head Start, said.

"Every child should be loved all through school," Frick said.

Two full-time social workers, counselors, teachers and volunteers make up the staff that takes care of the 150 children who attend the free program, Frick said. And because most of the children are from at-risk or single-parent families, extra attention is needed, she said.

And parents who have children enrolled in the program also receive extra attention, Frick said.

"It's tough to be poor in the '90s," she said.

A permanent parent-involvement coordinator organizes training for parents, including monthly workshops on vital issues and three home visits throughout the course of the school year, Frick said.

However, such programs may be cut in the coming year.

Head Start programs, traditionally strongly federally supported since their origin in 1965, are now at the tail end of a federal revenue trickle-down wish list, Frick said.

And the people at Head Start are mad — really mad.

"When did we become such a heartless nation?" Frick said.

It all began with the Republicans' Contract For America, Frick said.

The plan is to cut the deficit by giving each state an individual block grant to divide the money for various social programs, such as Head Start.

In the past, it has been possible for each individual agency to apply directly to the federal government for a grant on a need basis.

Bill Mcpherrin, a public affairs officer for Health and Human Services in Washington, D.C., said it is too early to tell where Head Start's future lies.

"I haven't seen Head Start in any of the proposals, but anything is up for block grants. We should watch the next few months closely," he said.

Frick said that just last year the Manhattan Head Start was planning more expansion to serve more children in the area, but today she is just trying to hold onto the money she has.

"We had all these dreams," she said. "But now we have to stop dreaming. And we just cling to what we have and be prepared to try to plan for less and less money each year."

Frick is usually busy this time of year compiling a list of needs and applying for a federal grant, but she said she doesn't know where to begin now.

"For a lot of these kids, this is the only meal they eat a day. Where do we cut?" Frick said.

"Does anyone in the community have any idea about what's happening?" Frick said.

Frick said it will be students who won't have jobs at Head Start, students who won't be able to enroll their children in the programs and students who have to deal with the results of today's planning.

"It will be you that is inheriting a nation that has really turned their back on people," she said.

If You Smell Gas, What Do You Reach For To Save Your Life?

Absolutely Wrong. Any kind of spark or flame near a gas leak could be hazardous, not just to your health, but to your neighborhood as well. Clear the area, call KPL, and we'll come investigate.

Wrong again. If gas has leaked into your home, the spark in a light switch could cause a problem. Don't look for the trouble; that's our job. Clear out and call KPL.

Wrong. Even the low voltage of a telephone switch could be dangerous if gas has leaked in your home. Go to a neighbor's home and call KPL to report any gas leak.

RIGHT! If you ever smell the telltale "rotten eggs" odor we add to our natural gas, get everyone out of the house and call us from a neighbor's phone.

We'll come anytime, day or night, to keep your home safe.

Joe Clark, former principal of New Jersey's Eastside High School, speaks to a packed house in McCain Auditorium Wednesday evening.

Clark: Happiness is in helping others

SERA L. TANK
TRACEY STINSON
Collegian

Mental attitude has power and energy. With the proper mental attitude, there is nothing anyone cannot accomplish, Joe Clark said.

Clark, a prominent educator and public speaker, delivered his message of self-motivation and conviction Wednesday night in McCain Auditorium.

"One person with courage, one person with unswerving, pure tenacity and resolve can make a difference in this society," he said.

"If we are going to bring about a change, it's up to you, but you have to be willing. You have to be strong enough to take the consequences of your actions."

Young people often don't do things because they are afraid of the consequences, Clark said.

"You fear things that probably don't exist," he said. "The worst type of cowardice is to know what is right and not do it."

Clark said he has always stood up for his convictions, but those convictions have sometimes made him a lonely man.

"I have been lonelier than the sound of one hand clapping, but I will not give into those rotten bastards," he said.

"Young and old — it doesn't matter. In life, you have to be bold. You have to go out there and take life on."

Clark stressed the importance of pursuing a career that will help other people in society.

"One thing I can state unequivocally is that the ones among you who will be the happiest are the ones who have sought and found ways to serve others," he said. "Our individual destiny is to serve rather than to rule."

Another reason for serving others is to share your talents with the world, Clark said.

"Once you find your raison detre, you will feel fulfilled. It would be fraudulent not to share it with me and the other individuals around you the greatness — and yes, it is greatness — that is in your soul," he said.

Clark also said people need to try to work together.

"Every deed you do is written in the book of life. You must ask yourself, what you do, what you expect to do, and what you have done in this world so we can live in a reasonable facsimile of cooperation," he said.

Self-responsibility and self-reliance are everyone's job, Clark said.

"We go through life with erroneous ideas of how things are, but you have to put something in to get something out," he said. "Get off your rusty dusties and do for yourself."

America needs to get together and stop judging people for the color of their skin, Clark said.

"That's sick. You should judge people ultimately by the content of their character," he said.

Clark said there was a reason for Black History Month in the days before the 1960s civil-rights movement, but it should not have to exist in 1995.

"I don't want to think of myself as significant only one month out of the year," he said.

Clark gained national recognition as a tough, no nonsense, inner-city high-school principal on whom the movie "Lean on Me" was based. He also is well-know for a Time magazine cover in which he was holding a baseball bat.

"I only used the baseball bat when the media was around, because the media doesn't give attention to soft-spoken people," he said. "The bat represented the young peoples' choice to strike out or to hit a home run."

Clark said despite the popular belief,

BMX: off the streets and onto the trails

HEATHER BALLEW
Collegian

BMX enthusiasts may get to race closer to home.

An informational meeting about the possible development of a BMX bicycle racing track will take place at 7 tonight in the Douglass Center Annex, 901 Yuma St..

Terry DeWeese, director of Manhattan Parks and Recreation, said the meeting will help determine if there is sufficient interest in the community to build and maintain a racing track.

"We may have a situation where you have 25 or 30 people show up, or there might not be the interest there," DeWeese said.

DeWeese said the meeting will be led by Waid Davis and Ray Case. DeWeese said both of these men race along with their children. DeWeese said they were the ones who initially wanted to see if there was interest for the track in the community.

Davis, owner of Aggie Bike Station, goes to Topeka almost every weekend so he and his son can race. He said biking is a good way to keep children off the street, and that is the main reason for getting a race track in Manhattan.

Davis and Case will report back to the parks and recreation department after the meeting tonight to decide what the next step is.

Although Manhattan Parks and Recreation is facilitating tonight's meeting, DeWeese said the city would not pay for the track or be in charge of it, but they may help find a place for the track when the time comes. DeWeese said a possible location for the track would be in CiCo park.

"We're just acting as a mechanism to see if there's enough interest out there," DeWeese said.

If there is sufficient interest to build a bike track, DeWeese said a volunteer force made up of parents and children would maintain the track and conduct weekly bike races.

Davis said money for building the track would be solicited from local businesses and individuals. The track would be not-for-profit and would in no way benefit his bike shop, he said.

"We're not trying to be a part of the budget for the city of Manhattan," Davis said.

"This has nothing to do with my bike shop," he said. "I like to race and think it is a good sport."

DeWeese said anyone who is interested in creating a BMX track in Manhattan should attend the meeting.

The track would be made of dirt and could be any length, DeWeese said. Loops and small hills could also be a part of the track's configuration.

LEAVING THE FORT

Military cuts pose threat for local businesses

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

Children will soon be vanishing from the school district, area businesses will lose customers, and the streets of Junction City will be dotted with vacant buildings.

By September 1996, 34 percent of the Fort Riley base will be at different posts, causing economic devastation for some, and the personal loss of a military legend for others.

"No matter what, those 5,600 people support my jobs and my employees," Eric Shuberg, owner of Berlin, an Aggieville bar with an 85 percent military clientele, said. "When the government pumps that much money in and takes it out, we'll have a different economic outlook."

Mark Meseke, post spokesman, said the announcement was made on Dec. 8 to deactivate the First Infantry Division, which would call for the retirement or reassignment of 5,600 of the 14,400 soldiers at Fort Riley.

Fort Riley will officially lose the division in September 1996 but will continue to have two brigades and support troops, Meseke said.

The two Fort Riley brigades, which consist of 2,000 soldiers each, will be realigned with a division in Europe. Meseke said this will be a significant turnaround for the post.

Fort Riley was aligned with a brigade in Europe when it first opened, and now because of the downsizing, the brigade will be located at Fort Riley, and the headquarters will be in Europe, Meseke said.

Meseke said all the soldiers in the First Infantry Division will not be sent to Europe but will instead be transferred to posts where they are needed worldwide, be offered early retirement or leave the service.

With the plan to downsize the post, there is a threat to area businesses.

Shuberg said his bar is taking a cautious approach to business but is not expecting a massive change of customers in the near future.

He said not only his business but the entire Aggieville business district will see the effect of the downsizing.

"I don't think we're going to wake up one day and it will be a slap in the face," Shuberg said. "Instead, I think it will be a slow change in the scene in Aggieville."

Audrey Booth, a Junction City resident, said she thinks Manhattan will survive and prosper because it is a college town, but Junction City will

▶ ENROLLMENT

Spring 1995 enrollment at lowest in 5 years

CHRISTI WRIGHT
Collegian

This semester's enrollment is the lowest K-State has seen in five years.

Spring enrollment numbers are down from last year on both the Manhattan and Salina campuses.

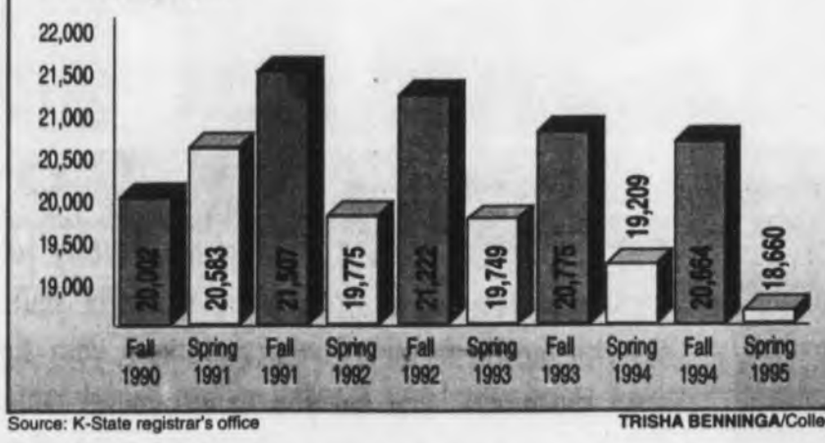
The numbers fluctuate every year, but there has been a slight decreasing trend since fall 1992.

"We expected a small decline based on our fall enrollments. These enrollment numbers are in-line with our projections," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

The decrease was expected because the number of high-school graduates has been fairly low.

"This is the last year in the decline of high-school graduates. Now we will see the numbers increase and swing the other way in the next five years," said Ray Hauke, director of planning and budget from the Kansas Board of Regents.

Final spring enrollment figures after 20 days of classes show that there are 18,660 students at K-State compared with 19,209 last year. The Manhattan campus has 17,935 students enrolled, compared with 18,464 one year ago.



The decrease in enrollment has also affected the Salina campus. The enrollment this semester is down by 20 students from last spring. The Salina campus has an average of about 700 students a semester, but the enrollment fluctuates every semester there as well.

Tuition increases in the past years have been a factor in the declining number of college students, but there is little way to assess the elasticity of tuition and enrollment, Hauke said.

The tuition hikes have a part in the low enrollment numbers in the fall but are not entirely responsible. The fall numbers were down, so it was expected the spring would decrease as well, said Tom Schellhardt, assistant vice president for administration and finance.

▶ PRICE INCREASES CAUSE STOCK MARKET TO REACH ALL-TIME HIGH

WASHINGTON (AP) — Increases for everything from airline fares to postage stamps sent prices rising in January with the underlying inflation rate climbing at the fastest pace in more than two years.

Wall Street reacted by pushing stock prices to an all-time high.

The government also reported Wednesday that America's factories, mines and utilities operated at 85.5 percent of capacity last month — highest in more than 15 years.

While both reports would normally raise inflation concerns, investors viewed the January price spike as an aberration and not the signal of rising inflationary pressures.

Investors also took encouragement from a slowdown in industrial output shown in the factory report.

The Dow Jones industrial average gained 27.92 points to close at an all-time high of 3,986.17, beating the old mark set on Jan. 31, 1994.

Wall Street read the latest figures as evidence that the string of Federal Reserve interest rate increases may be ending.

▶ GINGRICH WORRIED ABOUT PASSING BILL

WASHINGTON (AP) — Of all the items in the Republican "Contract With America," the one House Speaker Newt Gingrich says he worries most about losing is a proposal to limit damages in lawsuits.

His reason is the legendary lobbying clout of America's trial lawyers.

"This is going to be the biggest fight of the next 60 days," Gingrich said in a speech Wednesday seeking to energize executives of the insurance industry, a proponent of limiting lawsuit damage awards.

The Georgia Republican said he thought the lawyers would create a real brawl.

▶ PRESIDENT YELTSIN TO ADDRESS RUSSIA

MOSCOW (AP) — Boris Yeltsin delivers his state of the union address Thursday as a president waging an unpopular war and battling persistent doubts both at home and abroad about his fitness for office.

His popularity is at an all-time low, and his once-heroic image as a democrat has been badly tarnished by the bloodshed in Chechnya.

Even reformers have distanced themselves from the man who launched Russian reforms three years ago.

Yeltsin delayed his address before parliament twice waiting until soldiers gained the upper hand in the Chechen republic.

▶ HOUSE COMMITTEE PONDERS CHANGES IN SMOKING REGULATIONS

TOPEKA (AP) — A House committee could decide where smokers in Kansas would be able to light up.

The House Health and Human Services is considering two smoking bills.

One bill would ban smoking in all enclosed public places and another that would allow business owners to set their own smoking policies.

The bill that would ban smoking is sponsored by Rep. Ted Powers, R-Mulvane.

It would prohibit smoking in such places as restaurants, malls, stores and taverns.

The other measure, which would preempt local ordinances regulating smoking, is sponsored by the committee.

"I have lost many friends, both smokers and nonsmokers, to lung cancer," Powers said on Wednesday. "It's proven that secondhand smoke causes cancer."

He said having restaurants and businesses provide designated areas for nonsmokers is not adequate, because smoke drifts to the nonsmoking area.

"Do you approve of government control?" asked Rep. Brenda Landwehr, R-Wichita.

"In this case, yes," Powers replied.

"You want to be able to pick and choose what government control you want?" Landwehr asked.

"You bet," Powers replied. "Government intervention in this case is justifiable."

Pat McDonald, representing the Wichita Health Department, told the committee that 77 percent of the adults in Kansas are not smokers.

"It is good business to be pure and smoke-free," she said.

She said some restaurants and businesses already have decided to prohibit smoking.

"Banning smoking in public places helps people who are trying to quit smoking," said Kathleen O'Connell, a nurse representing the Kansas Nurses Association. "People who are quitting smoking face one of the toughest obstacles of their lives."

The smoking industry did not oppose the bill, but threw its support behind the proposal that would allow business owners to set their own smoking policy.

Students fly away using simulator

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Virtual reality hit the K-State campus via a 70-foot truck Wednesday.

Twelve students crowded around a flight simulator set up in the back of the Silicon Graphics Computer Systems trailer.

Software for the simulator was made by Paradigm in Dallas, Texas, bus operator Don Smith said.

"This gives you an idea of flight simulation for pilots," he said.

Silicon Graphics produces the hardware for virtual reality, Smith said.

The setup in the trailer has three screens, which provide the player with a more realistic effect, Smith said.

Scott Coatney, junior in chemical engineering, was one of Smith's flying aces Wednesday.

Although he only played once, Coatney was able to land safely, he said.

Coatney has had experience with other flight-simulator programs, but he said he likes the Silicon system much better.

"There's no comparison. This is much, much more advanced," Coatney said.

Coatney said the simulator was more realistic than the ones he has played before.

"I thought it was great," said Jeff Hall, sophomore in electrical engineering. "I really liked the graphics on this."

Hall wasn't as lucky as Coatney. He suffered a fatal crash landing.

Silicon Graphics representatives were also demonstrating the vocational uses of virtual reality.

Andy Ascher, systems engineer, demonstrated uses for virtual reality in medicine and architecture to students from an integrated circuits lab class.

Michelle Munson, senior in electrical engineering and physics, was among the students who participated in the three-dimensional virtual-reality demonstration.

"It's incredibly exciting," Munson said.

Munson said it was too bad students didn't have enough time to play with this kind of equipment during school.

Ascher said the system he demonstrated was being used at the University of St. Louis, Mo., Washington University and the University of Missouri-Columbia.

The system was recently used to make animations for "This Old House," Ascher said.

Silicon Graphics also sells unix-based work stations, Alex Ehrsam, sales representative for Silicon Graphics, said.

"Everything is on the machine when it comes out of the box," he said.

Silicon Graphics sells a multi-tasking unix box featuring speed and better graphics, Ehrsam said.

Silicon Graphics workstations and servers are designed to facilitate visual computing.

"We always try to get people to use our hardware to the maximum," he said.

Ehrsam urged potential buyers to consider what they wanted the machine for, what they wanted to do and then what machine would serve them best.

"Purchases shouldn't be based on the hardware," he said.

One of Silicon Graphics' unix boxes is more powerful than an IBM mainframe, Ehrsam said.

Profit focus of conference

Farm marketing, production issues to follow luncheon

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

Taking the middle out of agriculture is what more than 200 people will be discussing Saturday during a sustainable agriculture conference in the K-State Union.

"We are going to focus on how farmers can lower the cost of production and add value to improve their farm's profitability," said Jerry Jost, project coordinator for the Heartland Network.

The conference will begin at 10 a.m. and last until approximately 4:30 p.m.

John Gardner, agronomist and director of the North Dakota State University's Carrington Research Extension Center, will be one of the keynote speakers.

"He will be talking about how to better connect the research at experiment stations back to the farm," said Mary Fund, communications director for the Kansas Rural Center.

Following an all-Kansas-produced luncheon, Dan and Jo Warnock, founding members of Oregon County Beef, will present the second keynote address.

"Oregon County Beef is a marketing cooperative," Jost said.

"It is 23 different ranch families that last year had sales of $1.7 million of branded beef and another million in byproducts," he said.

The Warnocks will speak on how the cooperative was started and what makes it work.

Various workshops will be presented throughout the day by members of the Heartland Sustainable Agriculture Network clusters.

"The clusters are groups of people, primarily farmers and ranchers, within a certain geographical area that have the same interests and goals for their farms," Fund said.

Workshop topics will include researching sustainable crop systems, cooperative marketing, management intensive grazing, furrowing, the organic grain production, holistic resource management, Sustainable Agriculture Research and Education producer grants and romancing children in agriculture.

"We are excited about the conference," Fund said.

"It is a follow-up to a sustainable agriculture symposium that was in last April. This particular conference brings together farmers to discuss what they are doing on their farms," she said.

Preregistration is necessary to guarantee lunch reservations and child care.

The cost is $5 for adults, and children under 18 are admitted free. To preregister, students, faculty and staff can call (913) 873-3431.

"We do not have many meals left," Fund saiD Wednesday. "Walk-ins are welcome to attend the workshops even if all the meals are sold."

The conference is sponsored by the Heartland Sustainable Agriculture Network.

It is an association of 12 community clusters of more than 100 farm families across Kansas and northeast Missouri.

They work together to find ways to improve profitability on their farms while protecting and conserving resources and improving their quality of life.

The network is sponsored by the Kansas Rural Center and is funded by the W.K. Kellogg Foundation.

The Kansas Value Added Center also contributed to the event.

UPC outdoes itself with dynamic speakers

The committee has seen its lecture attendance grow from a high of 250 last year to an expected 1,700 for Clark and 2,500 for Leary.

Something cool is happening here.

Students are abuzz about listening to the spoken word.

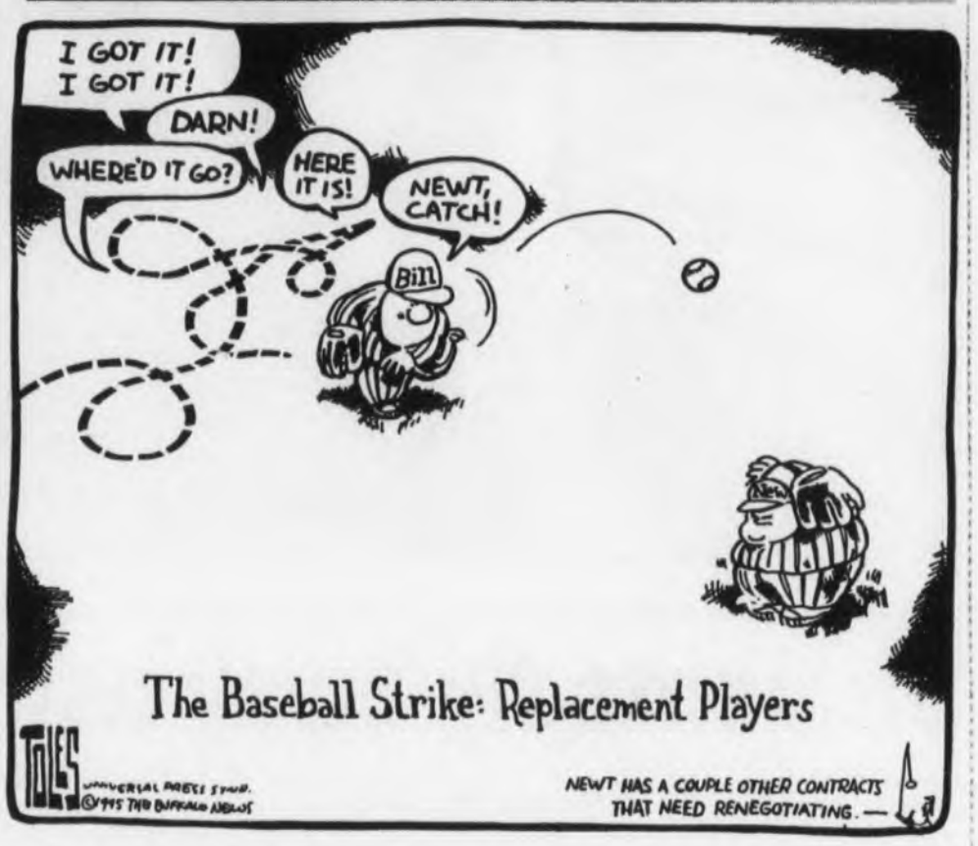
Maybe it's because the Union Program Council is getting cutting-edge speakers to come to K-State.

Part of the credit can go to you, the students, because a fraction of your fees are now going to help fund UPC.

But the UPC Issues and Ideas Committee and its chairman, Pat Carney, senior in political science, also deserve some credit.

In the past year, the committee has brought to campus Michael Levine, speaking on the war on drugs, and Zev Kedem, Holocaust survivor.

Last night the speaker was Joe Clark, the bat-wielding principal who turned an inner-city school around.



And now we have Timothy Leary, the counterculture pioneer of LSD. Far out.

More fireworks are in store when Sarah Weddington, the prosecuting attorney who argued the Roe v. Wade abortion case, comes to K-State in March.

The committee has seen its lecture attendance grow from a high of 250 last year to an expected 1,700 for Clark and 2,500 for Leary.

Now that's speaking to the students. And hopefully, the students will keep coming.

BACK TO BACK

Today's topic: religion in government

"Back to Back" is a pros-and-cons column by John Hart and Dan Lewerenz that is featured bi-weekly on the Collegian opinion page. The feature represents the opinions of the columnists only.

Government wanted religion present

The chaplain of the Kansas House of Representatives, Rev. Cecil Washington, sparked bitter protest last week when he uttered the word "Jesus" in a prayer.

JOHN HART

The remark inflamed some so much as to suggest that the Kansas House should not have a chaplain at all.

In order to justify their case, opponents of public chaplains will have to appeal to something besides the United States Constitution, the supreme law of the land, because, frankly, it lends them no support.

According to the U.S. Constitution and the U.S. Supreme Court, the Kansas House does have the right to hire a chaplain, regardless of how we feel about it. In the 1983 case (Marsh v. Chambers, 463 US 783,) the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it was constitutional for the Nebraska House to hire a chaplain and pay him or her with public funds.

Their argument was the bogus belief that the establishment clause of the First Amendment prohibits all association between religion and government.

The Supreme Court bases its current decisions on former precedents. The Court ruled for chaplains in the past in an almost identical situation to the one in Kansas, so were this question to be raised in court today, it would be declared dead on arrival.

To save their beleaguered case, opponents of chaplains might suggest that the Court's ruling was wrong in the Nebraska case. Their argument would then rest on the bogus belief that the establishment clause of the First Amendment prohibits all association between religion and government.

The establishment clause of the First Amendment reads as follows: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof ..."

A common but erroneous interpretation of the clause is that it mandates "separation of church and state." This is what some opponents of public chaplains maintain, although the words "separation of church and state" never appear in the Constitution. More importantly, this liberal interpretation has more basis in ideology and wishful thinking than law.

The phrase "separation of church and state" was coined by Thomas Jefferson in a letter to the Danbury Baptist Association in 1803. However, as numerous historical examples demonstrate, Jefferson did not believe separation of church and state meant that religion and government should have no association whatsoever. Nor did he protest government support of religion over irreligion, as modern absolute separationists claim.

In 1803, President Jefferson asked the Senate to ratify a treaty with the Kaskaskia Indian tribe that included a stipulation calling for the use of federal money to support a priest and build a church. Part of the treaty reads, "the United States will give annually for seven years one hundred dollars toward the support of a priest ... And the United States will further the sum of three hundred dollars to assist the said tribe in the erection of a church."

The following year, Jefferson approved three extensions of an act allowing a Christian proselytizing organization, the United Brethren, to use federal property to advance their religious goals.

Why would Thomas Jefferson deliberately violate the Constitution several times? Probably because he didn't believe he was violating the Constitution.

So what does the First Amendment say about religion and government? The establishment clause is most likely designed to allow Congress to support religion on a non-preferential basis, but prohibits Congress from establishing a national religion. This theory best explains the behavior of our presidents, Congress and courts up until 1947, when Justice Black codified an absolute separation view by misrepresenting Jefferson.

The original draft of the establishment clause submitted by James Madison supports this view: "The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, (nor shall any national religion be established.)"

We live in a nation that supports religion over irreligion. This fact is rooted deeply in our constitutional law and our traditions. If opponents are serious about their claims, perhaps we should scratch "God" off our coins and deface our great national monuments that refer to a higher spiritual being.

The Kansas House has every right to hire a chaplain because the Constitution and Supreme Court guarantee it that right. To suggest otherwise is an affront to our basic First Amendment freedoms.

Dan's response

The fact that Jefferson and the Founding Fathers required that money be spent to build and staff a mission for the Kaskaskia Indians may be the best argument for severing the remaining ties between church and state.

The Founders were firm believers in the freedom of religion — all Protestant white men were free to abrogate the rights of others.

Appealing to Jefferson's sense of morality — the same sense that told him that blacks were incapable of higher intelligence and maintained his slave-holding plantation — doesn't gain a lot of ground by today's moral standards.

Having not read the Marsh decision, I feel I cannot comment either on its applicability to Kansas or the reasons for the decision.

But I cannot believe that our nation could "support religion over irreligion."

To do so would not only violate the establishment clause but would certainly call into question the concepts of due process and equal protection.

Kansas may have the right to hire a chaplain for the House.

But right (i.e. freedom) does not necessarily mean right (i.e. correct, appropriate.)

And hiring a chaplain is not right.

Dan Lewerenz is a senior in philosophy.

Religious intolerance unallowable by law

I like to think of myself as a good Republican, one who firmly believes in the downsizing of government, so let us start with a position that, by its very nature, cannot even pretend to represent all of the people of our great state.

DAN LEWERENZ

Let's get rid of the House chaplain.

Rev. Cecil Washington, chaplain of the Kansas House of Representatives, has demonstrated the intolerance of the conservative Christian movement in America.

Washington, asked by state Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, to substitute "God" for "Jesus" in his prayers, refused, insisting that they were one in the same.

But it is consistent with the idea that the Constitution is a living document, created so that it could change and overcome the biases of the past.

To say that Washington made a mistake by bringing a particular religion (in this case, Christianity) to the Statehouse does not go far enough.

It is a mistake for the taxpayers of the state — or the nation — to subsidize religion by hiring a chaplain.

An editorial in the Manhattan Mercury asserted that the very fact "that the Rev. Cecil Washington has a part-time job as House chaplain suggests that the church-state issue has been legally resolved and that prayer does not violate the Constitution."

Upon hearing that suggestion, I'd like to offer a second opinion.

The fact that Washington has a part-time job as House chaplain suggests that our society is so conditioned to the presence of Christianity (and I single out Christianity because it is by far the most common religion in America) that we fail to recognize so blatant a violation of the First Amendment.

Furthermore, such an overt support of religion erodes the very concepts of fairness and equality that maintain our nation today.

Constitutionally, there are two reasons that we should not have a chaplain.

First, our predominantly Christian nation (and even more Christian state) will almost inevitably choose Christian chaplains.

While I have nothing against Christians, chaplains or Christian chaplains, I am afraid of the precedent we set by recognizing an individual religious practitioner as the official prayer guru for our government.

A Christian prayer will not represent the spiritual leanings of Jewish, Buddhist, Muslim and other non-Christian Kansans.

It would be no more appropriate to hire a Jewish or Muslim chaplain, but that's beside the point.

Our society will probably never get to that point where any belief other than Christianity is represented by an official state office.

Though this could be mitigated by some guarantee of non-denominational prayer, the agnostic, the atheist and the polytheist are still left without official spiritual representation.

Which brings me to the second reason.

Employing a chaplain suggests that religion has some official role in the governing of our state.

It doesn't (at least it shouldn't).

In a diverse nation founded on the idea of religious tolerance, the state must avoid any bias where religion is concerned.

No, this isn't what the Founding Fathers intended when they wrote the First Amendment.

They were as obsessed with their sense of religious superiority as the Christian Coalition is today.

But it is consistent with the idea that the Constitution is a living document, created so that it could change and overcome the biases of the past.

America was founded in an idealistic attempt to make a place for everybody.

Throughout our history, we have struggled with that goal (at the time, "everybody" meant while, male, Christian property owners), and we continue to do so today.

By recognizing that religion, especially any particular religion, has a place in government, we undermine that ideal.

The chaplain does nothing for the taxpayer of Kansas.

He can't even claim to serve the needs of all of the legislators (and don't they have ministers back home?).

And before we kill education or health services or some other worthwhile enterprise, why don't we start with a position we shouldn't have filled in the first place?

All he does is further entrench the dominant religion at the exclusion of the rest of the population.

So let's start downsizing.

And before we kill education or health services or some other worthwhile enterprise, why don't we start with a position we shouldn't have filled in the first place?

John's response

So the Kansas House chaplain is a blatant violation of the First Amendment.

Where is the support for this claim, the evidence, the argument?

There is none.

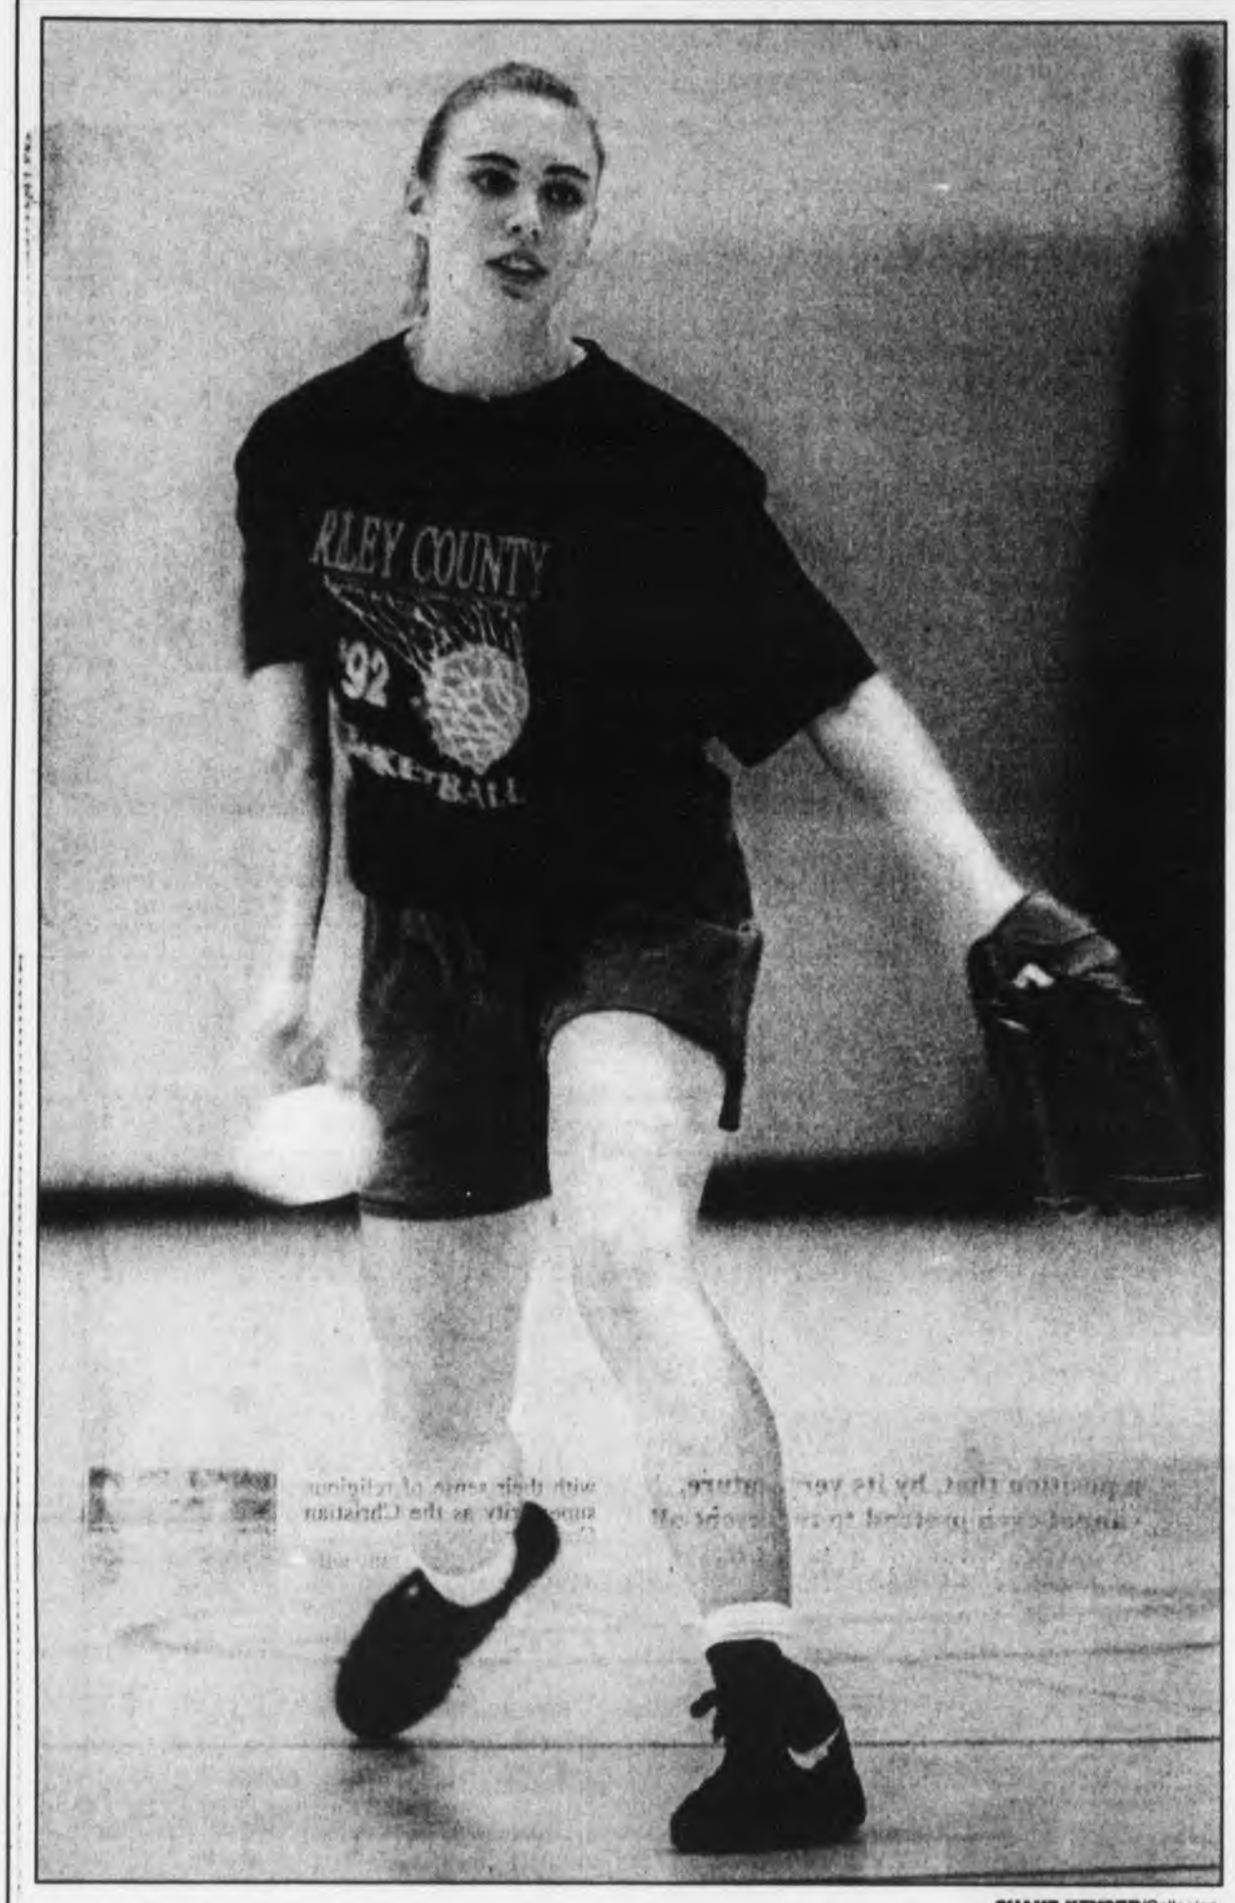
If the Founding Fathers did not intend religion to have an official role in government, then why did Congress authorize the appointment of paid chaplains three days before they agreed on the language of the establishment clause?

Also, why are the Ten Commandments etched on the wall of the room in which the Supreme Court meets?

Our Founding Fathers were not stupid.

They knew a contradiction when they saw it, and they obviously didn't see one.

Opponents of the symbolic position of House chaplain have nothing to offer in defense of their view except intolerance toward Christianity, historical revisionist propaganda and a self-serving ideological agenda.



I'm glad I live in a country where the displeasure of the few can't trample the constitutionally guaranteed rights of all.

Student brings softball to K-State

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

Eight years ago, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics announced the dismissal of the varsity softball and men's tennis programs at K-State.

Now with revitalized help from some students, the department is trying to bring softball back to the intercollegiate level in the near future.

Alba Velez, junior in human development and family studies, said she is the reason for the resurgence of softball.

Velez

"Actually, I wanted to get a softball program started at Topeka West High School. But it started after I left, and I have always talked about starting one at Kansas State."

Velez said she went into the student government offices at the Union and asked what she needed to do to start up a club. To start the process, Velez had to build an executive board of five people and state the purpose of why she was doing this.

After the governing board approved, Velez went to the athletic department to ask for help and information to contact other schools.

On Nov. 16, Velez and the athletic department put together an informational meeting for women interested in the club. The showing proved to be positive, with 20 women and one man interested.

"It just so happened this guy showed up at the informational meeting, and I thought, 'How am I going to tell this guy he couldn't play?'" Velez said. "But it turned out he was not there to play, but was there to offer as a coach," Velez said.

The newly appointed coach of the women's softball club is Pat Mardens, senior in construction science.

"I saw the advertisement in the Collegian," Mardens said.

"I wanted to see if I could help in some way — I wanted to coach."

Also helping out the coaching duties is Pat Bosco, dean of student life, who coaches in the summer for the reigning state champion McDonald Bullets in the 16-and-under division.

"These are very enthusiastic girls. They came to K-State for academic reasons and are going to be given a chance to play for a sport they love," Bosco said.

Right now the team is working out every day of the week. Three days out of the week, the women lift weights at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex in the morning.

Two days a week, the team does aerobic conditioning early in the morning at the Rec Complex.

On the weekend they have batting and fielding practice at the Rec Complex or Cico Park.

The team can practice on a field by the Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

Ex-coach Ralph Currie built the field for the last two seasons of his seven-year coaching stint at K-State.

Currie said it used to be a dumping ground before he remodeled the field for the women's softball team.

"This was not a very big program. The athletic department budgeted us $27,000 for everything. This included expenses, uniforms, coaches' salary, the whole shooting match," Currie said.

During his coaching days he was allowed to give out two scholarships.

"OSU, KU and Nebraska were all strong programs in the Big Eight. But we had a fraction of the money they had. Those schools were able to give out 15 scholarships," Currie said.

Currie said he laughs at the fact that they used to sell hats for eating money when they traveled on the road. Then in 1986 it wasn't a laughing matter anymore.

"The athletic department voted to drop a sport in January — the men's tennis team had to tell the players and me about it. It really broke some hearts," Currie said.

Velez has made up an upcoming schedule for the women this spring. It consists of playing 10 different schools and competing in a Johnson County tournament on April 1.

All of the games will be played on the road, and the only home date is a doubleheader against Johnson County on April 16.

"Word is kind of getting around by the other schools and already has reached Colorado," Velez said.

Another problem the softball club is dealing with is program funding.

"The athletic department is going to provide us vans. The team will pay for mileage, and then the athletic department is going to buy some of our equipment. The athletic department is having a meeting to see how much they will cover," Velez said.

This first year of a women's softball club could turn big in the near future. "This is kind of a trial run. We need to get support from the school, get support from the girls. We are not expected to win, but we need to show potential. Maybe in a few years it could possibly become a varsity sport," Velez said.

Velez is willing to talk to anybody, so give her a call at work, 532-6846, or at home, 537-8728, after 5 p.m.

DUs take a close one from the ATOs

SCOTT REYNOLDS
Collegian

Time ran out on the Alpha Tau Omega basketball team as it lost to fifth-ranked Delta Upsilon 47-44 Tuesday night.

ATO point guard Jason Perine, freshman in pre-pharmacy, launched a desperation three-pointer at the buzzer that missed by inches.

This game was a battle of unbeatens as both teams were 3-0 before Tuesday.

DU's Jason Gugelman, senior in management information systems, hit six crucial free throws down the stretch to help seal the win.

Four of his free throws came within the last 40 seconds.

"Jason is a great free-throw shooter," said DU coach Brent Brown, senior in public relations.

"He's a clutch player," Brown said.

"His free throws won the game for us."

Gugelman finished with nine points, but it was Shane Kaberline, junior in kinesiology, who led the DUs with 11 points before fouling out.

The DUs controlled the game from the outset and led 24-19 at the half.

The ATOs looked out of sync early and quickly fell behind.

They cut the DU lead to 17-15 behind the hot shooting of Dan Stack, sophomore in chemistry, who scored six of his 10 points in the first half.

The steady play of ATO forwards Ray Sims, junior in construction science, and Gary Cottrell, sophomore in mechanical engineering, kept the ATOs in a position to make a second-half run.

Sims scored a game-high 18 points, while Cottrell contributed 12 rebounds.

But when the ATO run came, it was too little, too late.

"We'd pull within three or four, and then we'd just die," Cottrell said.

DU coach Brown echoed that sentiment.

"We're a hard team to make a run on," Brown said. "We've got four senior starters who really keep their composure."

Every time the ATOs would make a run, the DUs would come up with a key play to keep them at bay.

Midway through the second half, the DUs mounted a 36-27 lead.

The DUs' nine-point lead would be the largest of the game and was sparked by two three-pointers from Jim Turner, sophomore in architecture.

With 1:40 left in the game, the DUs, leading 41-33, seemed to have the game in hand.

But the ATOs closed the gap to 43-40 with two three-pointers from Perine within 20 seconds. He finished with seven points.

Cowboys slip by Cyclones

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMES, Iowa — Bryant Reeves kept his composure against No. 21 Iowa State's collapsing defense and scored 22 of his 25 points in the second half, leading No. 22 Oklahoma State to a 71-69 victory Wednesday night.

Held to one shot in the first half, Reeves dominated down the stretch as the Cowboys (17-7, 7-2 Big Eight) held off a late Iowa State flurry and pulled within one-half game of league-leading Kansas.

Iowa State (18-7, 4-6) rallied from a 10-point deficit in the final two minutes and trailed 70-69 when Hurl Beechum hit a three-pointer under pressure with 10 seconds left.

Scott Pierce hit one of two free throws a second later to make it a two-point game, and Iowa State got a good shot at the buzzer.

But Julius Michalik's three-point attempt from the left corner bounced off the front of the rim, and the Cyclones went to their fifth loss in six games.

Fred Hoiberg led Iowa State with 20 points, 17 in the second half, and Michalik scored 18.

Oklahoma State won despite getting only seven points from Randy Rutherford, who was averaging 20.4.

Iowa State used a combination of collapsing zone and sagging man-to-man defenses to contain the 7-foot Reeves, whose only shot of the first half was a dunk with 1:36 left.

But he was able to work himself free for easy baskets inside in the second half and ended up making 11 of 12 shots.

He scored 12 of 16 Oklahoma State points during one stretch and had 20 of the Cowboys' final 32.

Neither team led by more than five points until Andre Owens hit a three-pointer for a 60-54 Oklahoma State lead with 5:14 left. Reeves followed with two straight baskets inside to make it 64-54, but Iowa State responded with a 10-2 run to pull to 68-66 when Hoiberg wrenched the ball from Reeves and dunked with 34 seconds remaining.

Owens then missed a free throw, but Rutherford got the rebound and sank two free throws for a 70-66 lead. Beechum then hit his three-pointer for Iowa State's final basket.

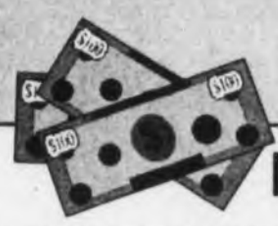
FORT RILEY



- Fort Riley was established in 1853 as a base of operation against raiding Indians.
- The daytime population of Fort Riley is 26,041.
- The residential population is 17,318.
- The reservation covers100,676 acres. Of those, 70,926 are used for maneuver training.
- Fort Riley is the second-largest employer in Kansas, following the state.
- It is the 13th-largest city in Kansas.
- Its operating budget for fiscal year 1994 was $680,847,683.
- Employees of Fort Riley live in 26 Kansas communities.
- Fort Riley-related people make up 23 percent of the combined population of Riley and Geary counties.
- Fort Riley has the largest payroll in Kansas.

FORT RILEY & THE COMMUNITY

The effects of Fort Riley stretch well beyond the post's boundaries. As Fort Riley faces downsizing, the surrounding communities will be affected in several ways. Among the things being examined are how the post affects local populations, employment, school districts, retail sales and the overall economy.

ECONOMY

Through spending both by Fort Riley and its personnel, the economic effects of Fort Riley are felt throughout the state.

Local

- Percentage of retail sales from Fort Riley in 1993:
  - Riley County — 17
  - Geary County — 25
- Money generated through sales tax from Fort Riley citizens in 1993:
  - Riley County — $3 million
  - Geary County — $2 million

State

- Purchases and payments made in Kansas for fiscal year 1994:
  - Total Fort Riley payroll — $591,910,309
  - Supplies, services and contracts purchased — $58,306,685
  - Construction payments — $19,685,911
  - Health care — $9,446,487
  - Combined Federal Campaign — $27,568
  - Education — $6,248,244
  - Total spent in Kansas —$685,625,204
- Fort Riley is the largest customer of KPL in the tri-state area.
- Fort Riley comprises 4,000 of United Telephone's customers.

EDUCATION

Students enrolled in local school districts, as well as K-State, have direct ties to Fort Riley.

Elementary, middle and secondary schools:

- Payments from Federal Impact Aid:
  - Manhattan (USD 383) — $235,560
  - Junction City (USD 475) — $3,895,112
  - Total — $4,130,672
- Percent of students with ties to Fort Riley:
  - Manhattan — 20
  - Junction City — 66

K-State

- Generated college tuition payments:
  - Tuition assistance — $638,776
  - Veterans Administration (GI Bill) — $377,030
  - Other — $1,101,766
- Total education — $6,248,244
- Of the 20,664 students enrolled at K-State in the fall 1994 semester, 1,325 had direct ties to Fort Riley.

REALIGNMENT

- An announcement was made on Dec. 8 to inactivate the 1st Infantry Division, which would call for the retirement or reassignment of 5,600 of the 14,400 soldiers at Fort Riley.
- Fort Riley will officially lose the division in September 1996 but will continue to have two brigades and support troops.
- The two Fort Riley brigades will be realigned with a division in Europe. Each brigage consists of 2,000 soldiers.
- Fort Riley was aligned with a brigade in Europe when it first opened. Because of the downsizing, the brigade currently in Europe will be moved to Fort Riley, and the 1st Infantry Division headquarters will be relocated to Europe.
- Not all the soldiers in the 1st Infantry Division will be sent to Europe. Many will be transferred to posts where they are needed worldwide, be offered early retirement or will be leaving the service.

1ST INFANTRY DIVISION

- The 1st Infantry Division, commonly known as the Big Red One, was established in 1917.
- The division has been associated with Fort Riley since 1955.
- It is assigned more than 11,000 soldiers who are equipped with the Army's most modern weapons.
- It is prepared for short-notice deployments to worldwide areas of conflict.
- It provides training assistance to 33,000 Army National Guard and U.S. Army Reserve personnel in 400 units in a 20-state area annually.
- During World War I, the division was the first to enter combat with the Germans in France.
- During World War II, it was the first to go ashore on D-Day at Omaha Beach.
- It was the first division-sized unit deployed during the Vietnam era.
- The division attacked through 160 miles of enemy-held territory in less than 100 hours during the Persian Gulf War.
- It defeated elements of 11 Iraqi divisions during the Persian Gulf War.

Store, realty owners expect business drop be more likely to experience a downfall because of the downsizing.

"If you drive down Washington and look at the empty stores, you can see that Junction City is struggling now," Booth said. "I think because of the downsizing, the businesses here will die."

Jerry Mills, owner of Regency Realty, said Junction City will definitely be more severely affected than Manhattan but will not disappear entirely. He said he also expects the realty values to drop by 6 percent.

"It will depress the housing market considerably," Mills said. "It's all been proposed, but if it does happen, of course it will have a big effect on the apartments and housing."

Fred Hepler, the executive director of the Governor's Task Force, said the downsizing of Fort Riley will not only jeopardize businesses in Junction City but will also affect Manhattan businesses.

"Taking 5,000 soldiers out of here will certainly have an impact on the entertainment businesses in both communities, on the retail businesses and on the housing markets," Hepler said. "But it's not the end of the world. It could be a lot worse — the fort could have closed down."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said if Fort Riley were completely shut down, the businesses that cater to a military crowd could be in serious danger. But because the fort is only downsizing, the businesses will not experience as dramatic of a change in revenue.

"It may not drastically affect all the businesses at one time, but it will affect different merchants in different ways," Sieben said.

Sieben said during Desert Storm, none of the businesses in Aggieville closed down, but the amount of money that the merchants brought in was reduced.

"No one knew how long it was going to go on or when the soldiers were going to come back," Sieben said. "Everyone was cautious, and because they weren't spending, the people who owned the businesses weren't spending as much either. It was a trickle-down effect."

Tony Gieber, who has been the manager of Stickles Dry Cleaners in Aggieville for 45 years, said the downsizing of Fort Riley will still affect his business.

"Losing that many people is definitely going to hurt us," Gieber said. "In Desert Storm, it did not affect us that much because the families were still here, but with Fort Riley's downsizing and the families leaving, that number could double."

Not only the businesses in Aggieville but also the companies on the fringes of Manhattan could also feel a drop in clientele.

"It remains to be seen if we'll feel the effect," said Jim Gaidos, general manager of Briggs Jeep Eagle. "It will be minimal, but there's no doubt we'll have a small decrease in our military business."

Shannon Maddux, marketing director for Briggs Jeep Eagle, said she thinks more soldiers will come to Fort Riley to train at the post to compensate the loss of the First Infantry Division.

"I think there will be a more pronounced effect in Junction City, but with a little bit of luck, some units will come in," Maddux said.

Jim Lumb, manager of Manhattan Carpet and Interiors, said 30 to 40 percent of his business is indirectly or directly tied to the post.

"I think it will have an effect sooner or later," Lumb said.

Along with having a gradual effect on area businesses, the downsizing at Fort Riley could also put a dent into the school system.

K-State had 1,325 students in fall 1994 who had direct ties to the fort.

John Allard of Academic Outreach said K-State courses are also taught on the Fort Riley base to give soldiers the opportunity to earn a degree from the evening classes.

Allard said 700 to 800 students are enrolled in the classes per semester. He said a drop in enrollment will likely be possible.

"We could lose 37 percent of our potential students," Allard said. "I don't anticipate a significant decline for a while."

Captain Kenneth Wedge, associate professor of military science, said the Green and Gold program, a program to recruit Fort Riley soldiers to K-State, has grown considerably over the years.

Wedge said he thinks the program will continue to grow, despite the downsizing.

"We're doing a better job of marketing the soldiers who are here," Wedge said.

Wedge said although K-State's enrollment may not be dramatically affected, he'll miss the Big Red One.

"I've grown up here," Wedge said. "My father was in the First Infantry Division, and I hate to see the colors leave Kansas."

K-State is not the only school with a connection to the post. Area elementary schools will feel the effect of the loss of the soldiers.

David Mickey, associate superintendent for central support, said 1,000 students are Fort Riley dependents in the Manhattan school district.

"I anticipate a decline of one-third in the enrollment, assuming all families leave Manhattan and no new families move in," Mickey said.

Mickey said the district is not planning on closing any schools.

Because of an overcrowding problem that has existed for the past five years in the Riley County area, a new school named Frank V. Bergman Elementary will open its doors in August.

"We're grossly overcrowded," Mickey said. "After the new school is built, we'll still have 90-percent capacity."

Randy Martin, president of the Chamber of Commerce, said a head count is taken once a year in the fall to determine the school's budget.

Martin said this could cause a shortage of funding if the schools experience a drop in the enrollment because of the downsizing.

Martin said 4,200 soldiers may already be gone by September 1996.

"If it takes place over the summer, where will that leave us for September of 1995?" Martin said.

The schools are not only concerned about the funding, but also about the demand for teachers, Martin said.

"If the student count is low, there may not be enough teachers for 1996, which is worrisome for the school district," Martin said.

Charles Voland, communications coordinator for the Junction City school district, said 60 percent of the district's students have ties to Fort Riley.

"Of all the districts, ours is the most impacted by the military students," Voland said.

Voland said he hopes for an exception to the Sept. 20 head-count policy.

"We're hoping that we're able to base the count on this year's enrollment so it will give us a cushion for the decline," he said.

Martin said although the downsizing will affect the school districts and local businesses, he thinks the economy may be at an advantage in the long run.

"We increased the sales tax to diversify the economy," Martin said. "We thought Fort Riley was going to be closing for a long time."

Martin said he feels increasing the tax was a beneficial plan.

"I think the responsible thing to do was to take steps to diversify the economy," Martin said. "Because it happened, we're further ahead than we would be otherwise."

Martin said the downsizing will affect the economy and the business and school district, but it will also hurt the community.

"The loss of the First Infantry Division is more than just economics. A lot of soldiers live around me in Manhattan, and the First Infantry Division has been around for a long time."

Martin said Manhattan won't forget the Big Red One.

"The soldiers will always have friends and supporters in this part of Kansas, whether they're in Germany or in Iceland."

Having a family

while moving from post to post

TAWNYA ERNST

Moving vans and armored tanks are almost equally familiar sights on military bases like Fort Riley.

The transferal of the First Infantry Division's headquarters to Germany means that more than 4,000 personnel will be packing their suitcases and Aunt Wilma's knitted tablecloth during the next year and a half.

While some will be learning how to specken zie deutchs (speak German), other personnel will be re-assigned stateside.

For military personnel and their families, impermanence and change are the constants in a lifestyle that can be both exciting and difficult.

"When your life is tied in with the Army, you don't make any permanent plans," said Ramona Emery, senior in social work and a military spouse.

"There's an old saying that says something to the effect that the place you're headed to is the worst place in the world and the one you just left is the best place."

Departure for a new post has become an immediate reality for some students' families. Dennis Booth's parents and three younger siblings left for Germany Tuesday. The Booths lived at Fort Riley for about a year and a half; two years is the average length of time they have spent in one place, Booth, freshman undecided, said.

Their move has Booth questioning his future at K-State. It is likely he will remain here to finish the semester, he said, and then join them.

"My family and I are really close," Booth said. "It's going to be difficult to be so far away."

Difficult because when a person moves at least seven times and attends seven different schools in eight years, family members are about the only people that a person can form solid ties with, he said.

"You rarely keep the same friends for very long," Booth said.

Meeting new people and adjusting to new situations is routine when growing up in the military, José Rivera, freshman undecided, said. In some ways, he said he'd prefer the stability of civilian life, but the constant change has helped him learn how to adapt quickly.

"When I did the majority of the moving, I was very young. And being a kid, I was pretty resilient and more apt to change," Rivera said. "I've learned to make friends easily and the friends I do make, I make as close as I can because you don't know how long you'll be there."

Just over three weeks ago, the Rivera family was told that their seven-year stay at Fort Riley might be ending. When the reduction was first announced, the Riveras thought that Fort Hood was a probable destination. Now Aida Rivera, José's mother, isn't sure.

"Things are changing so much. Now they're saying that some people may be left behind (at Fort Riley)," she said. "The question now is, am I leaving or am I staying behind? There's so much uncertainty."

> "You've got to try to prepare mentally, and I'm telling you it's rough because there isn't really anything that can prepare you. There have been so many times when I've just winged it on short notice, getting passports and doing a lot of the packing myself. It's hectic."
> ROVENER ADAMS
> Sophomore in social work and human development

The questions, the waiting and the uncertainty are almost expected. Marrying a soldier means marrying the military.

"It can be difficult. You follow your spouse sometimes to an extent you're having to put your own plans on hold," Aida said. "It took me 13 years to complete my college degree."

When Aida married Edwin Sr., 16 years ago, she said she came in with unrealistic expectations. A single parent to José, she said she had hoped to have a family with a mom and a dad for her son. But her husband's career often took him away from home.

The Riveras had been married 10 months when Edwin was sent on a tour to Korea. Their first child was born during that time.

"One of the hardest things is having to be separated from him," she said.

For José, this often meant stepping in and helping take care of his younger brothers, Edwin Jr. and Asaiah.

"Being the oldest, I was almost like a father figure. Growing up trying to find time with my friends, it was kind of a conflict," José said. "My father being in the unit he's in, he was gone quite a bit. I really never got really close to him until recently, since he's gotten a different job and been able to stay at home more."

The military has both good and bad points, but it's generally what a person makes of it, he said.

Rovener Adams, sophomore in social work and human development, is no stranger to the military lifestyle. In fact, it's all she's known. Trading her life for a civilian one isn't something she has ever really considered, she said. She grew up in a military family and married John, her husband of 14 years, who is a sergeant at Fort Riley.

Changing addresses on a regular basis doesn't make raising a family a simple task, she said. As their two children, Natasha, 11, and John, 5, get older it is becoming tougher for them to leave the friends that they make.

"The kids really haven't minded moving, but it's getting harder for my daughter. She's missing her friends that she's had to leave behind," she said.

As of now, it appears that her husband will be transferred to Fort Hood in September, Adams said. She plans to leave at semester and stay with friends in Texas while looking for a home and a school to finish up her college degree before her husband joins her.

"You've got to try to prepare mentally, and I'm telling you it's rough because there isn't really anything that can prepare you," Adams said.

"There have been so many times when I've just winged it on short notice, getting passports and doing a lot of the packing myself. It's hectic."

The reduction will affect not only those who could be leaving but those staying.

"There's going to be a lot of shuffling. New motor pools to work in. New barracks to sleep in and new commanders to report to, but it will still be the same Fort Riley," Emery said.

Emery's husband, Bill, will be reassigned the first of 1996 but not because of the downsizing. The couple and their two children, Allie, 6, and David, 3, have been at Fort Riley for about four years.

Allie and David have slipped into the military niche readily. Emery said she thinks a lot of it has to do with the parents' attitudes and an interactive military-family community. Remaining positive and making the most of opportunities the Army provides is important, she said.

"You can make a life and a very comfortable one here if you try. For kids, your neighbors can become your second and third moms and grandmas. The sense of community is very, very important," Emery said.

"Allie is truly becoming the ultimate military child. She thinks it's exciting to watch the soldiers firing the cannons, see them in uniform. She's very proud of her daddy."

Graffiti wave comes back

Vandalism can be punished by fines, dismissal

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

Graffiti in Manhattan is on the increase.

"Graffiti goes in waves," said Kurt Moldrup, Riley County Police Department detective. "We are in a wave right now, and we are seeing an increase."

There are various types and kinds of graffiti.

"The graffiti we are seeing is tagging, a form of graffiti that is not gang-related," Moldrup said. "It's a rebellion, an anarchist way to get attention within the community."

Nineteen cases of graffiti were reported to K-State Police in 1994.

"A lot of the graffiti is juvenile orientated," Richard Herrman, campus police investigator, said. "We have never felt it was out of the ordinary. For our population, it is not bad."

Graffiti found on campus and in Manhattan has not been centralized in one certain area. There have been reports on garages, campus buildings, on sidewalks and in Farrell Library.

Moldrup said it is imperative to take the graffiti down right away.

"We need to send a message to the graffiti artists that we're not going to put up with it," Moldrup said. "Civic organizations should consider providing a service for cleaning up the graffiti for those who can not afford it or who have limitations."

Organizations could supply manpower, paint or both, to help clean people's property that was vandalized, he said. K-State facilities spent 80 hours cleaning up graffiti in 1994.

Graffiti is a criminal damage, which is a misdemeanor if it causes less than $500 worth of damage. But if the damage is greater than $500, it is considered a felony, Herrman said.

The person caught doing the misdemeanor will be cited with a note to appear in city court. They could receive a fine, possible probation and restitution to property, he said.

If charged with a felony, the person would be arrested, would have to post bond and would have to appear in court. Fines and jail sentences depend on the person's criminal history.

The University can take action against students, faculty and staff found guilty of painting specific types of graffiti.

"If the graffiti is racist or sexist in behavior," Herrman said, "the University can take action for violation of equal rights and sexual harassment policies."

If found guilty, the vandal could be placed on probation or dismissed from the University.

Students can help reduce the incidence of graffiti by reporting anything they see.

"It is the community's problem, not just the victim's," Moldrup said. "They are not targeting the owner — it's the visibility they want. It's an attack on the community."

Jeff Barrett – unplugged

COLLEGIAN STAFF
Collegian

"It's a pretty good crowd for a Saturday, and the manager gives me a smile, 'cause he knows that it's me they've been coming to see to forget about life for a while."

This quote from Billy Joel's song "The Entertainer" could be used to describe Jeff Barrett and his musical abilities.

Barrett, a former K-State student, is a regular performer at Champions Pub and Grill, Rowdy Trouty's and other various bars in Manhattan and Kansas City.

Upon graduation, Barrett moved to Kansas City.

Brent Varzaly, junior in business and Barrett's former roommate, said Barrett not only has fans in Manhattan, but he is starting to get a pretty good following in the Kansas City area.

Barrett said he hasn't been able to perform as much lately because he is about to debut his first compact disc.

"I haven't been performing as much because I have been working on a CD. Everything has sort of been on hold because I have been working so much on it," Barrett said.

"I was supposed to have it already done. But, I'll be putting the finishing touches on it March 4 or 5, so I think it will be out around April 10," he said.

Barrett said the reason for the delay is because he wants everything on his CD to be perfect.

"Some people are annoyed at how long it's taking," he said, "but I want to make sure the songs are good and the recordings are right, because everything on the CD is original.

"The CD won't mean very much unless people like it once they get it home," he said.

Brooke Chilen, sophomore in advertising, said she is glad the music on Barrett's CD will be all original.

"I like it better when he plays his own stuff, rather than everybody else's," she said. "You can hear another artist anytime, but it's something new when you can hear an artist play their own stuff."

Sarah White, sophomore in advertising, said she, too, plans on buying his CD.

"I like the style of music he plays," White said. "They are cool songs that college-aged people recognize."

Barrett said he plans on trying to sell his CD at various record stores in Manhattan, and they will be available whenever he plays.

Brian Brooks, an employee of Streetside Records, said Barrett has not yet contacted the store about selling his CD, but people have already been coming in to see if it has been released yet.

Jeff Rome, an owner of Champion's, said Barrett is popular when he performs at the bar.

"People like the guy. It's the kind of music people like to sit down and party to. It's good drinking music," he said.

Rome said that when Barrett plays at Champions, he usually has a good following with a groupie crowd.

"They definitely party, drink a lot and have a good time. They let everything go. Nothing's kept in — that's for sure," he said.

As of right now, Barrett said he does not want a label under him.

"I don't want that right now. I want to be able to 'play' for a while. I want to be able to play for colleges," Barrett said.

"And if I go up, I'm going to let the people who support me push me up," he said.

Barrett said the reason he got involved with public performances was because he loved the way music made people feel.

He said he is hoping for that same response with his CD.

"I don't know how it will do. But it's been a hell of a lot of work," he said.

▶SENATE COMMITTEES DISCUSS PARTICIPATION IN STATE CONFERENCE

TOPEKA (AP) — Members of the Senate and House Federal and State Affairs committees met jointly on Wednesday to learn about a proposed conference of the states to develop a more balanced partnership between the states and the federal government.

A resolution introduced by the Senate committee calls for Kansas' participation in a conference of the states to develop an action plan to restore checks and balances between states and the national government.

It says over the years the federal government has greatly expanded the scope of its powers and preempted state governments' authority and increasingly not treated states as equal partners.

The conference would be convened under auspices of the Council of State Governments in cooperation with the National Governors Association and the National Conference of State Legislatures if 26 or more states adopted similar resolutions.

Under the resolution, the governor and two legislators from each house would make up Kansas' five-person delegation.

Student to promote agriculture in Japan

Neufeld

STACEY HAGER
Collegian

Jennafer Neufeld is representing Kansas agriculture to the world.

Neufeld, a sophomore in agricultural economics, is in Japan on a foreign agriculture relations trip serving as an ambassador to the National FFA Organization.

Neufeld has been invited to Japan as a result of her recent election as the 1995 central region vice president for the organization. She is traveling with her fellow national officers.

Neufeld said that while in Japan, they will meet with a Japanese agricultural company, Mitsui.

"They believe we are the future leaders of the United States, and they are hopeful we'll remember our good relations with Japan," Neufeld said.

Neufeld was elected to her current position on Nov. 12 at the 67th National FFA Convention in Kansas City, Mo., in front of more than 34,000 FFA members, teachers and guests.

Mary Kane, executive secretary for the Kansas FFA Association, said the FFA, formerly known as Future Farmers of America, changed its name to the National FFA Organization at the National Convention in 1988. She said the organization wanted to promote itself as an agriculture organization and not be stereotyped as just a farming organization.

The organization has 428,109 members in 7,257 high-school chapters located throughout the United States, Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands, Kane said. Neufeld is one of the six officers who will lead this organization for the next year.

"I was the only Jennafer running, so I knew if I heard 'Jen' I had it, but I didn't think I would get an office," Neufeld said.

She said she is excited and ready for the upcoming year.

"I'm looking forward to doing my best and making this the most successful year possible," Neufeld said.

As a national officer, Neufeld said she will take a leave of absence from school for a year, travel more than 100,000 miles, visit about 80 different businesses and industries, travel on 100 different flights, travel to about 40 different states and do about 250 presentations, all on behalf of the FFA.

"We are only home 34 days of the year. That includes 15-minute stops. We literally live out of suitcases for the next year of our lives," she said.

In addition to her travels, Neufeld can look forward to returning from Japan to meet with President Clinton.

"She is a spokesperson for the University. What better exposure is there than public relations for the University nationwide?" Kane said.

Neufeld has been preparing for this for a long time, Kane said. She was selected by a committee in June to represent the state as the national officer candidate from Kansas. Each state is allowed one candidate. Neufeld competed against 32 other individuals for the six officer positions, she said.

Neufeld said the process for selecting the national officers included a series of interviews, including a one-on-one interview with each of the nine nomination committee members, an agricultural education interview and an interview titled "Ag in Our World."

Neufeld said she concentrated her preparation on general FFA information, agricultural issues and her interviewing skills. To practice her interviewing skills, she said, she participated in a mock interview at least once a week until October.

Then she was doing two a week. She said she also met with or called past national officers or candidates to ask for advice and critiques.

"It takes a combination of things to become a national officer" said Emily Harsch, sophomore in agriculture education and interview coordinator for Neufeld. "It takes the qualities that often accompany a good officer. Those qualities are being dedicated to the organization, having a good outside appearance, being reliable, possessing good speaking skills and working well with other people."

Kane said Neufeld's experience as a national officer will give her exposure to Fortune 500 companies and the opportunity to meet with business leaders.

In addition to the contacts and experience, she will also receive a $8,000 scholarship for her year of service, Neufeld said.

After her year of service, Neufeld plans to return to K-State to finish her degree and eventually work in agricultural law.

Playwright's daydreams win national award

JANET GILLILAND
Collegian

Not many K-State students ever have a chance to be famous nationally, but one English student got the opportunity to be in the spotlight for an award-winning play.

Ryan Ritter, graduate student in English, recently won the 1995 American College Theatre Festival Playwriting Award.

Ritter received this award for writing the play "Daydreams, Fantasies and Commitments."

"My script was called for last fall, and I found out that I won the award right before Christmas break," Ritter said.

Norman Fedder, distinguished professor of theater and director of graduate studies in theater, said that "Daydreams, Fantasies and Commitments" was a very effective play when it ran for three nights last summer.

To be considered for this award, the piece must be an unproduced play, which means it has never been published or produced.

Ritter's play is a one-year-old romantic comedy, which involves a couple who are on the verge of a serious commitment, but each of them has fears.

Ritter said he chooses his characters based loosely on personal experiences. They are not based on any specific person, but on general situations.

The play went through the playwright stage at K-State. Ritter's friends put the play on during the summer.

For winning the national award, Ritter received free registration for the National American College Festival Association Convention, a $100 prize and had his play read at the convention.

"I am in the process of revising it and might be able to get it published and make money off of it," Ritter said.

Ritter first became interested in playwriting as an undergraduate in Pennsylvania.

To begin writing a play, you need to start with an idea. Ritter said he looks at the characters in a certain situation and how they would respond.

"He is a first-rate playwriting student of mine, and he will be awarded the Jerome Johanning Playwriting Award this spring by the English department," Fedder said.

He is also involved with the playwriting stage organization at K-State. It is a series of readings at 2 p.m. every Sunday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

"This gives you the chance of seeing your own play being acted out, and this is where my play started. It gives the writer a sense of what scenes are working and to make sure the characters have their own individuality," Ritter said.

Ritter said, even though writing a play takes a lot of hard work and effort, anyone can do it. He said all you have to do is have an idea for dialogue, be able to write down the words as if they were a conversation and make the

"Pangols"

Thursday, February 23 at 8 p.m.
McCain Auditorium
Kansas State University
General Public $15
Senior Citizen $13
Student/Child $7.50

Twenty sold-out tours to North America should tell you what crowd-pleasers this company of 40 dancers, singers and musicians is. "Pangols," their program for the current tour, is a West African word referring to the spiritual nature of all beings and things. Each dance in the program, whether telling a story or celebrating a movement or music form, explores the spiritual relationship between people and their environment.

"Senegalese dancing goes beyond excitement, way past zeal, far above frenzy, into some kind of kinetic nirvana. It erases that awful distance that so often creeps up between performers and audience." (Pamela Sommers, The Washington Post)

For tickets call 532-6428 or come to the McCain box office. Box office hours: noon to 5 p.m. weekdays; from 1 p.m. before weekend matinees; and from 5 p.m. before weekend evenings. Tickets are also available at Manhattan Town Center customer service desk, K-State Union Bookstore, and ITR (Fort Riley).
Persons with disabilities call 532-6428.

KSU Kansas State University
Principal-Counselor-Student CONFERENCE

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1995 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU Academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty.

You are welcome to drop by between 10:30 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 16. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

▶ ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

New president also involved in charities

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

The KSU Alumni Association chose a third-generation K-Stater as its new president.

Amy Renz was chosen Feb. 4 as the new executive officer. The announcement of her presidency not only set a precedent for the Big Eight Conference, but also for the newly formed Big Twelve Conference.

Renz is the only female executive officer in the Big Eight, as well as the Big Twelve, but she said she is not treated any differently than her male counterparts.

"There is no difference. I have known all of these individuals for years," she said.

The decision from the KSU Alumni Association board of directors was announced at 5:30 p.m. on Feb. 4. Renz said she had met with the board in the morning and was told she would be the next president but that she was not to tell anyone.

"I just had to be patient and wait," she said.

Renz was hired by the Alumni Association in 1977 as a part-time worker.

"I was going back to school to get my master's in public administration, and Dean Hess asked me to stop by," she said. "I left that day with a job."

One of Renz's first projects was the development of a student organization to help support the Alumni Association. The Student Alumni Board and the Student Ambassadors Program were two programs that were designed by Renz.

"I really enjoyed working with students on campus," she said.

Renz said the growth in the student organizations that support the Alumni Association is tremendous.

"They have been able to take what I have done and make it grow. I just built the foundation," she said.

In 1985, Renz was put in charge of membership. Under her direction, the KSU Alumni Association became No. 1 in the Big Eight for the percentage of active membership.

"They have been able to take what I have done and make it grow. I just built the foundation."

AMY RENZ
KSU Alumni Association president

"The membership position really allowed me to look at many possibilities and the different associations across the country," she said.

Renz was promoted to vice president under past president Fred Thibodeau.

Renz said that she appreciates the opportunity to work in every facet of the association and the tremendous staff that she has worked with.

"She deserves to be here. It is hers," said Larry Wisdom, a 1937 graduate of K-State and staff emeritus of the Alumni Association.

Renz was the obvious choice for the job, Wisdom said.

"They wasted money doing the search because they had the most qualified person right here," he said.

Beth Tolentino, long-time co-worker, said Renz has proven herself through hard work and innovative ideas.

"She is very open-minded, and she is always open to new ideas," Tolentino said.

Tolentino said Renz is in touch with people and comfortable with internal supervision and relating with external publics.

"I think the world of her personally and professionally," Tolentino said.

The dedication to K-State runs true for Renz.

"It is the best institution out there. I cannot think of any more rewarding position to have than to work for your alma mater," Renz said.

Renz also donates her time to local charities. She has been a frequent conference speaker and award recipient of the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education.

She is a Riley County United Way board member and was the 1993 general campaign chair, a member of the SkillSearch and Neat Trust national board of directors, and a member of the Manhattan Social Services Advisory Board and Pi Beta Phi sorority alumni advisory committee.

Renz said some of her goals for the association in the coming years were to continue expanding membership, meet the needs of the current membership and strengthen the alumni clubs.

"People are associating more with what they were involved in while they were at K-State. We are changing to meet those needs," Renz said.

Renz said the two areas that she sees as being very important to the association in the next few years are the areas of publications and records.

"We use the publications to reach all of our alumni with information, and without the records of where the alumni are, we can't get that information to them," Renz said.

Renz said the Alumni Association board of directors has provided the direction for the association through their dedication.

Lee Borck, national president of the Alumni Association board of directors, said he is sure that Renz will continue to build on the relationship built between the administration, the athletic department and KSU Foundation.

characters act differently, assuming each one has his or her own identity.

Ritter has also done some acting at K-State since he came here in fall 1993. Ritter said he acted in the play "Way of the World" at K-State and in the play "Witness for the Prosecution" at the community theater.

He has been working on a lot of other activities on campus but is concentrating most on graduating in May.

"I don't have as much time to write as I would like to have," Ritter said.

Ritter is in the creative writing track of the English degree. He is planning on getting his doctorate and would like to be a professor at a college, either in theater, where he would be involved with putting on plays, or in English, where he would be teaching drama courses.

"He has a real commitment to theater, and he is a great, sweet and compassionate person," Fedder said.

Live jazz band kicking it up in Manhattan

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

Manhattan's best-kept secret is not Chinese fast food at 2 a.m.

It's not Pillsbury Crossing or even Bob's Diner.

Hidden in the musical nooks and crannies of Manhattan lurks a thriving phenomenon called live jazz.

The band is called Wasted Potential, and you can catch its mood-altering jam sessions and howling outbursts from 8 to 10:30 p.m. every Thursday at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

On trumpet is Bill McFarlin, former executive director of the International Association of Jazz Education for 10 years.

"We never rehearse," he said. "The communication on stage is high, and it gives us a strong rapport. Sometimes guest artists just drop by, so it's all very spontaneous."

This was confirmed last Thursday night when a group from the Smithsonian band of New York showed up.

On piano, Joe Brumbeloe said he is more of a classical pianist and academic musician than a performer. Brumbeloe has been teaching music theory at K-State full time for about four years.

He said he hopes to keep a presence for live jazz in Manhattan.

"It is a very sophisticated music that seems to have become the no-man's-land for music," he said.

"The music makes you think," he said. "But it's hard to popularize that and expose more people to it because you can't really advertise it. You have to rely on word of mouth."

Drummer Tommy Bolton has managed to balance his music with his career as an electrician for the last 30 years. In addition to Wasted Potential, he plays for Steve Strong and the Strength and for a country group called Jenni Raynor and Hard to Handle.

Bolton said his focus is to bring jazz back to Manhattan.

"We were instrumental in developing a scene at Little Apple Brewing Company, and my hope is that we find another venue to bring in regular jazz," he said.

Jazz isn't giving up on Manhattan, and the members of Wasted Potential said they hope Manhattan won't give up on jazz.

"Auntie Mae's is a chance for us to exercise our muscles weekly," McFarlin said. "It's small and intimate, so the energy is high-intensity, and it's right in your face."

Naked man found in two beds at once?

Dear Cassie,

Help! My friend and I (we'll call ourselves Dara and Sarla) came upon quite a predicament. Recently, Dara met a young man and began seeing him. One night, she discovered him in her bed naked. Sarla turned around to find the same naked man in her bed.

What makes this situation so unique is he doesn't seem to know how he morphed into this state.

We're not sure how to remedy this problem. Is it humanly possible to unconsciously disrobe?

Signed, Wishing He Hadn't Gone There

Dear Wishing,

I do not think it is unconsciously possible to break into someone's residence hall room and disrobe. If so, he is one hell of an accomplished sleepwalker. My best advice is to have your locks changed and tell him to bug off.

Learning to conquer Bulimia

■ Story by Nikola Zytkow ■ Art By Mike Marlett

Joan and others like her live in a world shadowed by painful self-evaluation and life-threatening rituals of dieting.

Editor's note: Names have been changed to preserve identities.

Joan recalls sitting at the kitchen table at three in the morning rapidly eating a quart of Breyer's strawberry ice cream straight from the container.

With tears streaming down her face, she ate faster and faster.

"That was the lowest point in my life. I was no longer in control of myself. My life was dominated by food. On these binges, I ate past feeling full. I ate till I felt I couldn't breathe. I felt bloated and often suicidal," she said in an over-the-phone interview.

Joan, a 21-year-old college student, suffered from bulimia nervosa for two years.

Bulimia nervosa is characterized by "recurrent episodes of binge eating (eating in a discrete period of time, an amount of food that is definitely larger than most people would eat during a similar period of time and under similar circumstances)," according to the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual IV-Revised.

The episodes are accompanied by a feeling of lack of control over eating behavior and then self-induced vomiting, use of laxatives or diuretics, according to the DSM-IV-R.

The DSM-IV-R also states that bulimics employ strict dieting or fasting and vigorous exercise in order to prevent weight gain.

"After I got done eating, I would rush to the bathroom, hoping no one would hear me," Joan said. "I learned that by sticking my fingers deep enough in my throat, I would throw up almost all that I had eaten.

My throat started feeling real sore after a couple of days of doing this to myself. But at the time, I think I didn't care. I just wanted so badly to be thin."

Joan was not alone in suffering from this eating disorder. According to "Clinical Psychiatry" by Dr. Harold Kaplan and Dr. Benjamin Sadock, 4 to 15 percent of college students suffer from bulimia.

The incidence of anorexia nervosa, a disorder closely tied to bulimia, is one in every 100 females. Both eating disorders occur predominantly in females, and both typically begin in adolescence or early adulthood.

Anorexia is characterized by actual starvation. Whereas a person with bulimia is usually of regular body weight, slightly overweight or slightly underweight, an anorexic is grossly underweight but still feels fat.

"There are quite a few theories in eating disorders and why they develop," said Martha Olson, registered dietitian with Lafene Health Center. "The need for complete control over one's life, misdirected body image and biochemical imbalance are some of the factors associated with eating disorders. If biochemical imbalance is a major factor, then it could possibly be linked to genetics."

Karen Buffelman, registered dietitian at Memorial Hospital, said many reasons may exist for an eating disorder.

"A boyfriend can make a comment that can push some girls to overexercising and undereating," Buffelman said.

"The cases are so individual," she said. "For some people, it is a controlling parent that doesn't allow the child to make their own decisions. But it's definitely more of a psychological problem than a dieting problem. Eating patterns are really just symptoms of psychological need."

"American culture encourages people to base self worth on body weight and shape — if you aren't as thin as a fashion model or as muscular as a fitness fanatic, you may see yourself as a less valuable person," according to an American College Health Association pamphlet.

Many girls look at models and think they have the body of the standard woman, Buffelman said.

"But they have to realize that this is their job. It's not realistic for the average teen."

Buffelman also said that this disorder not only develops in heavy women. Many thin women also develop eating disorders.

"I guess what triggered it for me was the time when my boyfriend and I were in Pizza Hut," Joan said. "I felt especially hungry that day. He was making little jokes and said something like 'once on the lips, forever on the hips.'

"I really took it seriously and thought he was trying to tell me I was fat. It was a sensitive subject already, and that comment just made me decide to really do something about it."

Joan said her fear of gaining weight began early on. Her mother spoke a lot about weight control.

"She would tell me that young women shouldn't eat a lot or else they would never find a husband or even a boyfriend. Looks were important to her. She was always watching her weight, sometimes barely eating during the day. But she would cook these elaborate dishes for the whole family."

Joan said she had a predisposition to be heavy and ate during times of stress but didn't worry about her weight much until she got to college.

"I was just getting into the dating scene. I didn't date so much during high school. I saw all these thin sorority girls who had a lot of guys liking them. I wanted to be noticed like they were, so I started a strict diet."

After dieting, Joan said she met her boyfriend, Russ, and felt OK about herself for a while. A little way into their relationship, Russ started making comments.

An eating disorder often starts with a reasonable attempt to lose some weight, followed by a preoccupation with losing weight and viewing one's body as fat even though others do not, according to the American Psychiatric Press.

Buffelman said these woman usually have a history of family dysfunction and low self-esteem. A lot of patients look at other people of the same weight and don't see a weight problem, Buffelman said. It is only themselves that they are so critical of.

"If I felt I'd gained even two pounds, I didn't want to go out. Actually, I really started to isolate myself from people. I didn't think my boyfriend could like me so fat (she was 5'6" and 130 pounds), so I stopped calling him back and seeing him," Joan said.

"I became obsessed about planning my eating pattern. I wrote up diet plans along with reasons why life would be better if I was thin. I'd hide these pieces of paper because I didn't want anyone to know what I was doing," she said.

> "I was no longer in control of myself. My life was dominated by food."

> Recovering bulimic

"I would tell myself I'm not going to eat breakfast till nine, no matter what time I got up. I planned to only eat breakfast and dinner that consisted of like some celery, a little dressing and a piece of bread. I could pull it off for a day or two. I even started tossing out a lot of the food that tempted me."

But pretty soon, Joan started getting hungry and irritable and broke away from her diet.

"I could eat a loaf of bread worth of sandwiches, basically anything that was in sight and that I could make quick. Preparing the food took too long, and I didn't want to have any time to think about what I was doing."

By this time, the bulimia had started to affect Joan's health.

"My hair started falling out. It still hasn't fully grown back. At first, it was just a few strands, and then when I combed my hair, I would find tons of it on the brush. My teeth turned yellow and looked really bad, and I was constantly brushing my teeth to get rid of the bad taste of vomit.

"I developed a serious problem with constipation. Since I had abused laxatives, my body was heavily dependent on them. I also felt really tired from exercising all the time."

Joan said she would try to go to the gym every day after work.

"At a time when all the girls at work would go over to each other's houses to study or go to parties, I would be at the gym. Sometimes, I didn't even mind it," she said. "If I got off work real late, I'd go home and do two hours worth of 'Buns of Steel' or another tape like that.

"One of my friends once wanted to work out with me, but I blew it off. I felt like being alone much of the time and didn't want anyone interfering with my plans."

The irregular eating habits of bulimics, as well as their self-induced vomiting, can lead to a series of medical problems, according to the American College Health Association.

Medical problems include dehydration, constipation and digestive disorders, severe dental problems and muscle weakness. As bulimia progresses, ulcers and life-threatening heart irregularities may develop.

Buffelman said she doesn't see too many of the severe cases.

"For as prevalent as the problem is, I see very little of it."

Olson said she saw approximately five to eight serious cases in 1994.

"We could probably see more, but they don't show up," she said.

People with bulimia deny or downplay their illness and often resist therapy, according to the American Psychiatric Press.

"An eating disorder is so private. I was ashamed to go to anyone for help," Joan said. "I knew I needed help, but I was scared that they would put me on a program with food that would make me gain weight. I didn't realize that food could be handled properly. It was like some kind of enemy to me."

Olson said there are several options for treatment

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Clark in favor of voucher system for public schools

he never used the bat on any of his students at the New Jersey's Eastside High School.

"Those kids carried Uzis. They would blow my bat to pieces," he said.

Patrick Carney, chairman of Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee, said Clark gave an air of hope and an air of the future to the students he taught so they could go and use their self-determination and power of choice.

Colette McLemore, sophomore in architectural engineering, said Clark's speech was motivational.

"I could personally identify when he said we should use our degrees to help people. It is not what we have, but what we do," McLemore said.

In an interview before his speech, Clark commented on his views of politics and educational reform.

Clark said he is very much for voucher systems in public schools.

"I am an advocate of choice, especially in inner cities. I believe very sincerely that there would be a vast array of new schools that would open up," he said.

Magnet schools are also a positive step toward choice, Clark said.

"When you don't have choice, you don't have competition. When you don't have competition, you don't have accountability," he said.

Despite his strong views, Clark said he has no desire to run for public office in any capacity.

"I am not a political person. I believe in candor and honesty," he said.

Clark said he does not believe that poverty breeds crime, but the other way around.

"Crime breeds poverty," he said.

When a neighborhood becomes violent, businesses leave, and people lose their jobs.

Clark said he grew up in a family that was poor, but he learned strong values and morals from his family and his church.

"We did not knock people in the head. We did not steal," he said.

Clark also encouraged less government and privatization of the welfare system.

"I believe that welfare in the inner city has become a liability. It degrades and keeps you subjugant to a bureaucracy," he said. "I would tend to think that we have become a nation of dependents. We do not take advantage of the massive opportunities that exist in this country."

Clark also stressed getting back to the basics.

"I think we have to get away from this on-going greed of the luxuries of a capitalist society. We need to get back to God, church and family values," he said.

of bulimia.

"Treatment involves a medical and psychological evaluation and nutritional intervention," Olson said. "We work closely with the University Counseling Services in the recovery process. There is also a support group sponsored by the counseling services."

Olson said the treatment process can often be hard.

"If you get an anorexic or even a bulimic person to eat anything, all of a sudden they think they are fat."

Joan said she decided to enter treatment the day she was supposed to meet a date at a movie.

"I remember getting dressed and constantly looking in the mirror. I was sure I had gained a couple of pounds and that my face looked swollen. So I didn't go. Instead, I stayed home and got more and more depressed.

Joan said she thought about a lot of things that night.

"Right then I could have been on this terrific date, and instead I was sitting at home. I felt weak, and I didn't want to pity myself anymore. Even though my roommate was in the next room studying, I felt really alone. Different thoughts were going through my mind, even thoughts of killing myself."

It was then that Joan realized she needed to tell someone. She confided in her roommate that night.

"It was a great feeling, as well as a little scary, to let someone know what was going on with me."

The next day Joan, accompanied by her roommate, went to seek treatment.

"It's been about a year since I started treatment, and I still don't feel fully well," Joan said. "I think there will always be that thought of reverting back to food in the back of my mind.

"In treatment, they told me it's a lot like alcoholism and you have to be on guard all the time. I learned a lot about myself and my family during treatment and that my real enemy was not really food."

Dr. Lisa Tillman Lacey, staff psychiatrist at Lafene Counseling Services, said with a proper treatment approach, recovery can occur.

"The most successful treatment approach to eating disorders has been achieved through a multidisciplinary approach, including therapy along with pharmacologic management," Lacey said.

Joan has since changed her major to nutrition science and said she wants to be a counselor specializing in eating disorders.

"I don't want anyone else to feel so dehumanized and out of control, and since I know exactly what that feels like, I'll be able to relate to them."

Don't have tickets? Turn on the television

Saturday's game sold out; K-State looking for big win

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

What's the hottest ticket in town?

No, it's not Sawyer Brown. It's a ticket to Saturday's 231st meeting of the Sunflower Series between K-State and Kansas, which has been sold out since August.

"I wish that I had bought season tickets now," Jemelle Holopirek, senior in speech, said. "I would do almost anything for a ticket now. I'd even buy someone a case of good beer for a ticket."

Tricia McKale, junior in elementary education and salesperson at the K-State Union ticket outlet, said many people have come in and tried to purchase tickets in the past couple of weeks.

"Most people are really dumbfounded," McKale said. "They think that it's a regular game and they can just buy tickets. It's been sold out since August.

"Most of the people trying to get tickets now are mostly older or non-traditional students. They are mostly disappointed but not angry."

There have been some great games in the Sunflower Series' 88-year-old existence, and Saturday's game could prove to be just the same.

This is despite the fact that the Wildcats come into the game as underdogs and in last place in the Big Eight Conference.

"The last time that I was coaching a team that was this big of an underdog was last season when we played Michigan," K-State coach Tom Asbury said in reference to his former Pepperdine squad. "I think we were something like 86-point underdogs."

The underdog role is something that the Cats should be used to, because the Jayhawks lead the overall series 142-88.

In fact, the Jayhawks have won 11 of the last 13 meetings. This includes six straight victories in Bramlage Coliseum — a place where KU has never lost.

This statistic is a scary thing to not only Asbury, but to K-State students.

■ The K-State vs. KU basketball game is at 2:50 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. The game is sold out, but WIBW, cable channel 3, will broadcast the game.

"I think that the players can use the home losing streak to their advantage," Jaime Ibarra, sophomore in sociology said. "They can use it for motivation and pull the upset.

"I'm not a traitor, but I think that KU will win."

Jim Myers, junior in accounting, said it's time for the streak to end.

"We have to break that streak," Myers said. "It's going to take a good game from Hatcher, and we're going to have to out-rebound them.

"We can beat them. I think it will be 65-61 with K-State winning in a low-scoring game."

This week, talk of the game has been about the home losing streak and the fact that the Cats are underdogs.

Sound like the Cats don't have a chance?

Some of K-State's biggest wins in the series have come when they were underdogs, and each of the last four meetings in Manhattan have been decided by nine points or less.

For example, take last season, when the Cats were playing the No. 1 Jayhawks in Allen Fieldhouse.

Most didn't think the Cats had a shot, but the Cats snuck out of Lawrence with a 68-64 victory.

No matter what the final score is, there's another thing that is unique to the K-State-KU games in Manhattan — the fans.

Tales of students throwing dead chickens on the court and coins at KU's players have given K-State students a bad reputation in some eyes.

However, Ibarra said it's just the students having fun.

"It's crazy in the student section," Ibarra said. "The crowd just gets into the game a lot."

Asbury said its going to take more than dead chickens for the Cats to win.

"When you've got a chance to play against a team of this quality," Asbury said, "you don't need chickens when it all boils down.

"We're going to play hard. This team hasn't folded it's tents yet."

ROTC program denied

Regents refuse free room, board to ROTC students

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents refused to endorse a program Thursday that would give free room and board to ROTC students.

The program, which originated in the Kansas Legislature, would offer housing to ROTC students at K-State and the University of Kansas.

The board did not recommend the program because there was no additional state money to fund it. The universities would have to use money from their general budgets or raise housing costs for other students to fund the program.

This would cost K-State roughly $303,300 and cost KU $478,440 using fiscal year 1996 figures, Ted Ayres, regents general counsel, said.

The current bill would limit 45 students per ROTC program to be eligible for the free room and board. K-State has two programs, Army and Air Force, so 90 students would be eligible if the bill passes.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, will testify today to the Senate Ways and Means Committee about the bill.

Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said K-State will not accept any of these exchange students for the 1995-96 school year but might consider taking them in the future if the program is funded.

In other discussion, the Council of Presidents and the board agreed to begin working with students and alumni to ask that they contact their representatives in the Legislature to indicate concern about any reduction of the budget and to express support for higher education.

"Today it was certainly important that the board reinforced their legislative priorities and set strategies to involve students and alumni," Jon Wefald, K-State president, said.

"The most important priority this session is to have all students call or write their legislators," he said.

The board also voted unanimously to extend the current transfer and articulation agreement between Kansas Community Colleges and the regent schools for one year.

They passed the agreement with the understanding that the problems pertaining to the credit hours in general education, the labs in the natural science courses and how the transcripts are stamped would be worked out in that time period.

"The Board of Ed sets the general education minimal standards for the community colleges," said Edward Hammond, chairman of the Council of Presidents and president of Fort Hays State. "They set it at 30, and our agreement is 45."

"It creates about a one-semester gap, so when those students transfer, they have in addition to taking the 60 hours of upper-division classes they have to take that additional work," he said. "That creates an extended semester."

Other action taken at the meeting was as follows:

■ Board members consented to allow the establishment of a Food Animal Health and Management center at K-State.

■ The board approved the final plans for the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art at K-State.

■ A request for supplemental appropriation for K-State's Agricultural Experiment Station was approved.

■ The board approved the recommendation to advance a proposal in which both tuition revenue and credit hours from students participating in the Midwest Higher Education Compact be outside the state budget process. The program allows Midwest universities to send students to other Midwest universities.

Non-traditional learning

UFM fees may increase if SGA slashes funding

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

UFM has long been an inexpensive way for the Manhattan and K-State communities to learn things you can't learn at a traditional university.

Classes at UFM average $20 per course. Some classes, like scuba diving, are more expensive because of the cost of the materials involved.

In the future, students and faculty may have to pay more for classes at UFM if Student Senate votes to cut funding for salaries for the program.

"We can only take cuts for so long before we will have to increase our class fees," Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said. "But this is not an issue we are focusing on because we intend to keep UFM going."

Irina Khramtsova, graduate student in educational psychology and UFM instructor, said students should realize the consequence Student Governing Association funding cuts could have.

"UFM provides a wonderful opportunity for many people to experience things they might not be able to do otherwise," she said. "With funding cuts, there may be students who will not be able to afford to experience new things."

Morten Lundsgaard, graduate student in physics and UFM instructor, said he agrees.

"There are many students on campus who can benefit from classes at UFM," he said.

Lynn said she believes cuts in SGA funding to UFM would prevent many students from taking advantage of valuable learning opportunities.

"When you're in school, money is really tight," she said. "Most students don't have a lot of extra cash to spend on classes, no matter how valuable the subject could be to there personal or professional lives."

UFM operates by the philosophy that anyone can learn, Teener said. It is a non-profit community-based education program which serves the K-State and Manhattan communities.

"UFM was organized to provide an atmosphere for discovery with no grades or credits," Teener said. "Each year we bring together hundreds of volunteer teachers with thousands of learners."

Students and faculty opening the spring 1995 catalog will find courses ranging from scuba diving to bridge to Ukrainian Easter eggs.

"The course offering varies from semester to semester, but there is something for everyone," she said.

Chuck Thompson, professor of sociology, is taking a conversational Danish class this spring.

"I'm going to be spending some time in Denmark, so this is an opportunity for me to get a feel for the language," he said.

Teener said a class that is very popular with students is ballroom dancing.

Jody Lynn, a former student, said she enrolled in the class as a student to develop some practical social skills.

"You never know when you will be in a situation where you need to know these things," she said. "I feel more confident going to formal functions in my career knowing I know the ballroom basics."

Teener said UFM's aquatic classes are the program's most popular courses.

"A good portion of the participants in our aquatics programs are K-State families because there are classes for

Pull out an extra 50 cents for metered parking

AMY SIMON
Collegian

Students wanting to park at the K-State Union will soon have to dig out a few extra quarters.

Michele Meier, business senator, reported on new fees set by the Parking Services Council at the Student Senate meeting Thursday.

The committee voted to triple the price of metered parking to 75 cents an hour starting in July.

The committee raised fees because it is fairly inexpensive to park in metered lots and because students tend to park in these lots for extended periods of time, Meier said.

The parking council has also decided to add metered lots at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. The council is also considering adding parking permits and zoning of campus lots, Meier said.

Students will have a chance to learn more about these issues and express their opinions at an open forum to be scheduled in two weeks.

The next meeting of the Parking Services Council is 3 p.m. March 16 in Union 205. Meier invited students to express their opinions there also.

Senate allocated money to two of three groups being considered Thursday evening.

Senate approved allocations for Students Advocating Valid Education and Students for the Right to Life. An allocation to National Organization for Women was sent back to committee.

Students Advocating a Valid Education is a newly formed campus group advocating a quality education without political correctness.

Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, proposed an amendment to strike funding for a speaker on campus. She opposed funding of the group because of the group's implied opposition to requiring a multicultural curriculum.

"We have a very diverse campus, and this group

▶ LOCAL COALITION SPONSORS FORUM FOR SCHOOL BOARD CANDIDATES

Candidates for seats on the Unified School District 383 school board have a busy week in front of them.

With three forms slated in six days, the candidates will have a chance to sell themselves, and the community will have a chance to learn about the issues.

The newly formed Flint Hills Mainstream Coalition will be sponsoring its forum at 1:30 p.m. Sunday at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building at 1021 Denison Ave.

Jami Ramsey, spokeswoman for the group, said the purpose of the forum is for the coalition to see what the candidates believe about lifestyle and child-raising issues, such as sexual education, non-traditional families and school prayer, and how they feel about discussing these issues.

"The coalition is not endorsing candidates. Our purpose is to educate," Ramsey said.

The local coalition was formed to preserve the traditional values of separation of church and state, First Amendment freedoms, individual rights, the importance of family, public education and tolerance for everyone.

It has also been assembled to expose candidates who may have hidden agendas, such as those associated with the religious right, Ramsey said.

In response to candidate worries that the forum is a type of witch-hunt or litmus test, Ramsey said she hopes people are not seeing it in a discriminatory light.

▶ CITY COMMISSION CANDIDATES DEBATE TAXES, DISCUSS BUDGET

City commission candidates discussed government involvement in business and the city budget Thursday night at a candidate forum.

Six of the candidates for city commission were present.

Lex Pearson said the Economic Development Tax was a bad idea. He said raising taxes to get new businesses is a bad idea because the city makes the new businesses pay the new taxes.

Steve Hall said the city should use a method of breaking down businesses into brackets. These brackets would show how many new jobs each business would produce, and the money would be distributed to those that would produce more jobs.

Edward Horne said the money should be devoted toward new jobs, whether toward new businesses or old businesses.

Bruce Snead said Manhattan needs to attract diverse businesses.

Mike Manning said the money should be used to attract businesses to Manhattan that the community wants.

The city's budget was another issue discussed by the candidates.

Manning said the city's wants and needs are different, and they must be differentiated when planning the budget.

Hall said the city must be careful of what programs it funds.

"We keep spending more money, and the quality of our services are going down," Hall said. "We need to quit spending so much."

Snead said the budget needs to be balanced properly.

"We elect officials to balance things, to balance budgets and balance needs," Snead said.

▶ U.S. MOVIES, TV PROGRAMMING DISTORT RUSSIAN VIEW OF DEMOCRACY

People in Russia are confused about what democracy means and represents, Anatoly Lutykh said.

Lutykh, professor of political science and history in Voronezh, Russia, spoke to about 45 people Thursday at K-State about the current political, economic and social status of his country.

"Unfortunately, many Russians observe American television and believe this is an accurate picture of all of America," said Lutykh.

Lutykh presented his lecture in Russian, allowing his daughter Elena to interpret his speech.

He said American programming is expensive, and Russia can only afford to bring in programs that are cheap in price and quality.

The more popular shows are "Rescue 911" and "Santa Barbara," but people in Russia still believe the violence they see on television represents democracy, Lutykh said.

"American movies involving violence, drugs and murders are popular. The Russian view of freedom is misinterpreted by what we see in Stallone and Schwarzenegger," he said.

Extremists in Russian politics use these examples of American violence to persuade Russians away from the idea of democracy, Lutykh said. If the people believe America is violent, then they will view democracy as a negative.

Lutykh said Russian President Boris Yeltsin suffers most of the criticism for not advancing the nation.

Yeltsin has more power than the president of the United States and is trying to please too many different kinds of political groups, he said.

"Through his many disappointments and achievements, Yeltsin soon found himself with limited choices. He is having a difficult time trying to find loyalty in his own cabinet members," Lutykh said.

Holden Triplett, freshman in history and Russian, said he enjoyed Lutykh's speech.

"I agree with what he has to say. The government needs to support Russia, but I think the best way is when the public gets involved. It's good to see this open communication between Kansas and Russia," Triplett said.

Remember your first day on campus? The time in your life before you memorized your student ID number, when you didn't know a soul as you walked past the big clock? You just knew that for as long as you would be going to K-State, you'd have to spend each day walking with your head buried in a notebook. That way, you wouldn't have to look into the blurry faces of people that you didn't know, and who didn't have a clue as to who you were.
But much to your surprise, those faces gradually came into focus, and you found yourself calling greetings to people as they passed you in front of the fork statue.

for the Royal Purple yearbook

SHOOT YOURSELF 1995 is the last opportunity you'll have to get a picture of you and a group of up to six of your friends, your favorite faculty members, your coworkers, your significant others, or even the paddle that led you to intramural table tennis victory taken for the yearbook. Face it, you've spent a lot of time and money at this university. Why not have something to show for it?
SHOOT YOURSELF 1995 will be from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. Feb. 15-17 in the alcove on the first floor of the K-State Union.

The SHOOT YOURSELF photos will appear on a first-come, first-served basis. You will not pay for this service, but you may order color prints of these photos from Blaker Studio Royal on Feb. 28. Research helps avoid a lemon

Buying a new car might seem like an overwhelming task.

But going into the car-buying arena armed with a few purchasing tips might lessen your anxiety and help you get a better deal on a new car.

Looking through magazines and going to the library will help you determine the size and model of car you are looking for.

"They need to know what they want," said Jan VerBrugge, a 20-year salesman for Goetsch-Irvine Chrysler-Plymouth-Subaru for more than 20 years. "If there is a man and a wife and four kids, you don't want a sports car."

VerBrugge said people should first decide what their needs are and then what their desires are.

He said matching needs and desires can be a challenge.

Brian Weber, shop foreman for Alan Clark Body Shop, said you should test drive cars after you have narrowed your focus to a few cars.

This will help narrow the field even more, VerBrugge said.

"Test driving helps people to see if that's what they're really interested in," VerBrugge said. "There really aren't many lemons anymore, but test driving will help you see what different features and options the car has."

Weber said a prospective buyer can usually determine if a car is well-built and if it runs well by test driving it. He also said each car feels different, and test driving can help you determine what you like.

"Do a lot of homework as far as picking up a lot of brochures from dealers to see what the particular vehicle has to offer," VerBrugge said.

Then find out the dealer's cost for the vehicle.

Scott McEwen, insurance agent for Farm Bureau, said it is necessary to find out how much the dealer paid for the car. Knowing the price the dealer paid and the price the dealer is asking will give you leverage when negotiating the purchase.

Scott Munsen, a salesperson for Briggs Jeep-Eagle-Isuzu in Manhattan, suggested going to the library and studying up on the cars you are interested in purchasing. The dealer's invoice price may be found in magazines like Consumer Report.

The Consumer Report 1995 New Car Yearbook recommended adding up the price on each make and model and the trim lines you're interested in. Include the option packages you're interested in by name and manufacturer's code number.

In a separate column, total the list price and invoice price of the car and the options for which you are interested. Add the destination charges to each column.

The difference between the totals of the two columns is your negotiation room with the dealer.

The next step is to find a dealer and start negotiating.

Munsen said it is important to find out about a dealership before you go in to start negotiating. He recommended that prospective buyers check with the Better Business Bureau to determine whether the dealer is reputable. He also suggested talking to recent car buyers about the dealers they worked with.

"Ask your friends if they treated you well," VerBrugge said.

"You should shop with your hometown dealer because he has more interest in you and your car," VerBrugge said.

McEwen said it is important to stay cool when negotiating. He said prospective buyers should not act totally interested and in love with the car because the dealer knows he won't have to bring the price down as far in order to get you to purchase the vehicle.

Politely give your price figures to the dealer and ask for the lowest markup over the invoice price that the dealer will accept. A price of $300 to $500 more than invoice is usually considered a good deal. But on some popular models, $1,000 more than invoice may be considered a good price.

McEwen also said to bargain from the invoice price up and not the

CAR-BUYING VOCABULARY

Scott Munsen, a salesperson for Briggs Jeep-Eagle-Isuzu in Manhattan, offered some definitions of words a prospective car buyer needs to know before walking onto the lot.

■ Dealer Invoice Price — The dealer's cost on the vehicle. Consumer Reports magazine recommends negotiating up from this price rather than down from the sticker price.

■ Destination Charge — How much it costs to ship the vehicle to the dealer from the assembly plant. This charge is not negotiable.

■ Factory-to-Dealer Rebate — A rebate occasionally offered to the dealer from the factory. It is paid to the dealer once the car is sold.

■ Factory-to-Customer Rebate — A rebate offered to a customer from the factory. Munsen said these are usually only offered during the end of a model year before the line of cars for the new year is released.

■ Trim Lines — Different styles and models the vehicle is offered in.

■ Option Packages — Packages of usually four or five options sold as a group. The cost of option packages is added on top of the cost for standard equipment. It may be cheaper to purchase a car equipped with a trim line than to purchase the accessories individually.

■ No-Haggle Pricing — The sticker price is what you pay at a no-haggle dealer. There is no negotiating involved so all haggling is eliminated.

Black History Month still necessary today

Would Joe Clark or any of the other speakers have been invited to speak here if there wasn't a Black History Month?

Joe Clark said Wednesday he didn't think there should be a need for Black History Month in 1995 because he didn't think of himself as significant only one month out of the year.

Clark is right. Black History Month shouldn't have to exist today. But it does.

What would happen if this month of awareness were simply done away with? Nobody really knows. To assume that African Americans would immediately get the awareness they deserve year-round, however, seems a bit too hopeful at this point.

Would Joe Clark or any of the other speakers have been invited to speak here if there weren't a Black History Month? Would people question whether public-school curricula cover the contributions of African Americans?

Clark and people of all races are significant every day of the year, but there are still people who can't see that. It's for this reason that awareness months such as Black History Month are still necessary.

If just one speech can change just one person's mind about the worth of human beings, no matter what color they are, then Black History Month is a success. And with the number of people out there who could and should have their mind changed, Black History Month has the potential to be very successful.

TOLES

Women beginning to limit themselves

"Sensible and intelligent women would not want to vote."

About a decade later, 12,952,500 women, a quarter of the population of eligible women, voted. Today, more college-educated women than college-educated men vote.

You may have already known that, but did you know that the deciding vote was cast by a 24-year-old legislator that voted in favor of the 19th Amendment because his mother told him to be good and help Mrs. Catt, who was the president of the National Women's Suffrage Association?

PAGE GETZ

Since then, the movement toward equality between the sexes has been a two-steps-forward, one-step-back process that continues to unfold.

There is a new kind of oppression going on today that is subtle enough to be minimized and discounted even by women.

In 1948, the Kinsey reports said,"85 percent of the younger male population could be convicted as sex offenders if the law-enforcement officials were as efficient as most people would expect them to be."

In the 1980s, federally sponsored studies of sexuality, which should have updated the Kinsey findings, were blocked on "political grounds."

How convenient.

Meanwhile, the already baffling number of reported rapes isn't half the number of rapes that remain unreported.

Sure, we've come a long way, but that's only when you compare us to where we've been.

It's like taking a battered wife out of the abuser's house, patting her on the back and giving her food stamps and some new clothes. She looks better, and probably feels better, but stand her next to an accomplished woman like Hillary Clinton and she's not that impressive. Looking at how far womankind has come is impressive, but put her next to a man and something's missing.

In the history of the world, the only female-dominated occupation was prostitution. This was an isolated situation where women could become autonomous and make as much money — and in some cases more money — than a man.

If men thought that prostitution was the only service a woman was capable of that might enable her to be independent of the patriarchy, it makes sense that it would be illegal.

Modern oppression today is glamorous. It's on the cover of Cosmopolitan. It's turning letters for Pat Sajak. It's plastered on every beer, soda and cosmetic ad that make up the millions of ads we are exposed to before we turn 21.

The following is a list of ways that we enable and support this new form of oppression to sign the rights to our lives away to this patriarchal mass market we have been conditioned to accept as "American."

They may seem idiosyncratic and laughable, but like Carl Jung once said, "Neurosis is always the substitute for legitimate suffering."

1. Blame yourself.
2. Blame your metabolism.
3. Be offended by chauvinism and by feminism.
4. Complain about all proportions and functions of your body.
5. Hate Cindy Crawford.
6. Attempt to look like Cindy Crawford.
7. Have enough credit cards to color-coordinate them.
8. Memorize the calorie and fat content of everything.
9. Establish a quota for how many times you ask a man what he's thinking just to let him know how significant his life is to your existence.
10. Ask all living beings if they think you're fat.
11. ALWAYS wait for at least the second ring.
12. Start a diet every Monday morning.
13. Invest in massive quantities of chocolate by Monday night.
14. If they don't want to talk about it, spend thousands of dollars on therapy to learn how to rephrase the question.
15. Base your self-worth on everything but your worth.
16. Assume you're wrong.
17. Label your needs as problems.
18. Never let them see you eat.
19. Blame the women's movement on those damned lesbians.

This is the new brand of female oppression. It's called tradition. It's called self-improvement. It's called capitalism. It's called profit. It's called silence.

We are conditioned to do to ourselves what men once did to us, and we're doing a better job than they did.

Country's direction found in integrity

JEREMY STEPHENS

During the relatively small number of years that God has given me on this planet, I have learned the importance of trying to learn as much as possible from preceding generations to avoid recommitting their errors.

In the words of wise men of generations gone by, this makes it possible to "stand on the shoulders of giants."

However, one problem becomes evident when it comes to the selection of such mentors. History is full of famous people who would best be left historic. Therefore, I place the highest priority on finding men and women of integrity. Integrity, as defined by Webster's, is firm adherence to a code or standard of values.

But integrity is much more than this. It is not learned, but gained by action, for integrity is granted to a person by his peers and not by himself.

It is the drive for excellence and the ability to stand by one's convictions in the face of intense opposition and fiery rhetoric.

However, it is a waste of time to find persons of integrity and not make changes in your own actions, because what you do will be looked to by following generations. Not only is integrity among the most important parts of character, it is necessary in order to set a standard for those who seek role models to emulate.

It is not flashy cars, multi-million-dollar incomes or flagrant disregard of the values that made this country great which are indicative of a good role model.

It comes down to one of the hardest questions in life: do you want to be remembered for your fame, fortune or character? In a world where the utmost value is placed on how many heads you can turn and how many doors are on your garage, don't take this question lightly.

This is not to say that men and women of integrity are hard to find. Parents and teachers are often among the first candidates for good examples. While not everyone might have enjoyed a good home life, I am thankful that my parents guided me the way I should go. History is full of other examples.

These are people who are not only willing to put their money where their mouth is but are willing to lay down their lives to accomplish their goals.

In an age when promises from politicians are not even worth the time it takes to hear them — much less work toward — I long for leaders such as "Give me liberty or give me death" Patrick Henry and "I have a dream" Martin Luther King Jr.

It is only a matter of time before the disintegration of integrity at the personal level moves toward the national level. The absence of integrity in the public arena has become increasingly obvious. In the 1992 elections, it was proclaimed with fervor that character, of which integrity is a key part, didn't matter and that only the issues should be examined.

If this argument was able to sway enough voters to turn the election then we deserve the president we got.

If a person's beliefs aren't determined by his or her character, where are they determined? Public-opinion polls? And how much do these mean when they rise through the ceiling after speeches proclaiming future action that contradicts everything that has been done in the past?

It is not possible to lead from behind except when one is intending to drive a herd of witless animals over a cliff.

Some of the most ruthless dictators in history were quick to realize that they could do nothing while their country still chose to exercise its ability to think. Adolf Hitler would find it much easier to accomplish his goals today while Rikki Lake continues to improve her ratings.

It is not my intent to relegate America and her leaders to a position that places no hope in our future.

I will be the first to say that there is always hope, but that the source of this hope is not found in words spoken freely, or even in actions, no matter how appropriate or helpful, because these things will pass. It can not be examined empirically because a hope with limits is not worth the time it takes to study it.

The Founding Fathers clearly recognized that man, left to his own devices, could not maintain integrity in leadership. Benjamin Franklin noted a shifting of priorities at the Constitutional Convention of 1787.

"In the beginning of the contest with Great Britain ... we had daily prayers in this room for Divine protection."

His analysis of the nation then surely applies now: "All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a superintending Providence in our favor ... and have we now forgotten this powerful friend? Or do we no longer need his assistance?"

Thomas Jefferson's analysis of that situation was even more grim: "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just: that His justice cannot sleep forever."

It is time for us to reevaluate the direction of this country as reflected in its integrity.

No one can argue that we are better off as a nation since we have revised the Founding Father's intentions. Crime, drug abuse and illegitimate pregnancy are not on the rise by coincidence.

While labels may be assigned to me, I am only concerned with the truth, for no one in history has been remembered for his or her progressiveness.

It is a matter of integrity.

▶ PARKING PROPOSAL

Garage would only serve the lazy

Dear editor,

Unless there is other information that the University Parking Task Force has not released, the only conclusions one can draw from the report is that it lacks any credibility and is completely flawed.

The report recommends building a parking garage now and study alternatives to reducing parking needs later. One of the recommendations listed was "Study issues related to placing additional restrictions on the sale of campus parking permits."

Without having the results of this study, how can one justify the need? If these studies were to show that additional restrictions would only provide only short-term solutions to the problem, then I might buy into the idea of a parking garage. To say we need a parking garage now and study the alternatives later is ludicrous.

Since the report was made public Feb. 2, I have taken the time to walk to parking lots immediately adjacent to campus during peak load times. At 11:30 a.m. Feb. 2, the day the report was published in the Collegian, Lot B-3 was half empty; west stadium lot, the west end, was about 75 percent occupied. At 1 p.m. Feb. 6, the same. Both lots had an extremely large number of parking spaces available.

I know my study is not scientific, but I rather doubt the task force did much better. The only conclusion that I can draw is that we do not have personal parking spaces for every faculty member and student within 15 feet of the building in which they wish to enter.

At some point in time, someone needs to bring some measure of sanity to this issue. We need to explore realistic alternatives and provide the facts. One of these study alternatives could include eliminating the sale of permits for those living within specific distance from campus with exceptions for those with health or physical limitations.

"I have lived seven blocks from campus for years and never had a permit."

JAMES E. DUBOIS
associate professor
interior architecture

An example might be eliminating permits to those who live within a five- or six-block radius or one-half mile from campus. I have lived seven blocks from campus for years and never had a permit. I have seen students and faculty who live on the same block that I do get into their car and leave for campus at the same time I have. I have later observed these same individuals in the lot below the Union, searching for a place to park while I walk to my office.

Is this who we're building a parking garage for? Why? I did not realize driving to campus and parking within a few feet of the building was a God-given right. I just assumed driving a vehicle and parking it on public property was a privilege. Incidentally, the alternative just described could be implemented immediately by the president of the University if he chose to do so.

If the task force had spent more time studying the alternatives and collecting the facts than locating sites for a parking garage, the task force and the report might have a little more credibility. As it stands, the University Parking Task Force Report is of no value and should be discarded immediately.

▶ K-STATE VS. KU

Band needs to plan out music

Dear editor,

We are writing in regards to our K-State Pep Band and instructor, who play at the basketball games.

Last Sunday at the girls' K-State vs. KU game, the band probably played the Hey Cheer four or five times when they were at the worst times.

The Hey Cheer is KU's favorite song to get the crowd into the game and pumped up.

You don't see KU playing the "Wabash Cannonball" for us when we play at Allen Field House.

So I am suggesting that the band does not play the Hey Cheer at all this Saturday when we play KU in the men's game.

We are going to have enough problems trying to get louder than the KU fans. Therefore, we don't need the band helping the KU fans out.

▶ PARKING PROPOSAL

Garage is too expensive

Dear editor,

In response to the recent articles and editorials about the proposed parking garage that is scheduled to desecrate our Memorial Stadium, I would like to encourage the student body of K-State to stand up and let the administration hear their disapproval.

I was present at the recent Student Senate meeting at which the parking garage structure was discussed by Mr. Rawson. During his presentation, along with all the accolades that he believed were associated with such a structure, several questions were asked, and even though Mr. Rawson responded, he failed to adequately answer them.

The first question was what is the total cost of the parking garage? His response was that it would run between 10 and 12 million dollars in total cost. Furthermore, he said that this price tag, which would be raised by doubling the parking permit for students and faculty, would cover the building costs of the structure and complete the south wall of Memorial Stadium. What he did not include was that, according to the parking study done for student government a few years ago, the paving of a new parking lot runs approximately $2,105 per space. This garage, if it costs on the low end of just $10 million for 1,250 spaces, will cost $8,000 per space. Does that sound like a deal?

While we are all jumping through financial loops to figure out the cost of this thing in the middle of our memorial, let us also consider the cost involved with maintenance. Mr. Rawson said that the bonds that were expiring on other parking lots around the campus would pay for the maintenance of the parking garage. This would be wonderful except for the fact that the revenue that is being brought in for current bonds could be used to lower parking fees because their intended items of payment would be paid off. If such a plan were used, then the students would never see a reduction because the maintenance of a parking garage will never end.

In addition to this point, it is essential to look at the average maintenance cost involved with the parking garage. According to the same study provided to Student Senate by an unbiased source reviewing several options, their report stated that the maintenance costs of a parking garage would run another $250 per space per year.

Thus, in just the first year with construction and maintenance, the parking garage will cost at least $8,250, or another $312,500 on top of the low-cost $10 million. Furthermore, instead of being able to reduce the parking permit fees, more than $300,000 will be going to maintain our wonderful parking garage. My hope is that students are able to look at these figures and the intent of the administration and see them for what they are. The administration decided long ago that they wanted a parking garage, just like KU, and by God, they're going to have it.

So it is my hope that those students who are concerned or hate this project will come forward to the Student Senate and let their opinions be heard. Otherwise, the hotel idea that was discussed just last year when the Union renovation debate was going on may become a reality if we let this garage be built. It is time to stand up, because if not us, then who? And if not now, then when?

▶ MINIMUM WAGE

Column has errors

Dear editor,

In a column on Feb. 10 by Jeremy Stephens titled "Minimum Wage Brings Troubles, Not Relief," several errors were present in his economic reasoning and facts. To set the record straight, President Clinton did not propose an exact increase in the minimum wage during his State of the Union Address but only alluded to a possible proposal by the administration. The exact proposal came a couple of weeks later, and it included a 45-cent raise for each of the next two years, bringing the minimum wage up to $5.15.

The next implication of the article was that rising minimum-wage rates was responsible for the rising inflation rate, using the example of the 1975-1981 era "stagflation." Stephens worries that increases in the minimum wage rate will cause the price of Snapple (using his example) to rise. However, when the minimum wage increased from $3.35 to $4.25 between 1990 and 1992, do you remember the price of Snapple (or anything else) rising dramatically? I sure don't. The implication is, of course, that increasing wage rates are not the reason that prices go up. For example, between 1971 and 1981, the United States experienced two oil supply shocks by OPEC (1973 and 1979), a severe shortfall of corn, wheat and soybeans (causing their price to double) in 1974, and the devaluation of the dollar (causing foreign imports to be more expensive) in 1971 and 1973. These among others (but not the increasing minimum wage) were the reasons for the inflation.

To say, as Stephens did, that the rising minimum wage (from $1.60 in 1972 to $3.35 in 1981) was the sole reason for a double-digit inflation rate in the '70s is obviously ludicrous. In my research, I have yet to come across any study that indicates that an increase in the minimum wage causes inflation to increase. In fact, I suspect the exact opposite is true: rising prices influence Congress to increase the minimum wage.

The next piece of evidence toward my argument is that the purchasing power of the middle wage worker's paycheck has diminished by 50 cents per hour (caused by inflation) since 1990, meaning I am now working for $3.75 an hour in 1990 dollars. Yet no increase in the minimum wage has occurred. Thus, how can one argue that inflation is caused by increasing the minimum wage if one has not occurred? Stephens proposes a very illogical explanation for inflation.

Stephens' next incorrect implication was that the proposed increase, if enacted, would decrease the job market for college students and college graduates. In fact, those most directly hit by a loss of employment caused by an increase in the minimum wage would be individuals of high school age. Numerous studies have indicated that, for every 10-percent increase in the minimum wage, there is a one- to two-point decrease in teenage employment and even smaller, if any, decrease in employment for those aged 20 to 24 (Brown, Gilroy and Kohn, 1982). And since college graduates are not, hopefully, competing for minimum-wage jobs, their job market will not be affected at all.

This makes sense. Manhattan and University employers are not going to lazy off and stop hiring students because they have to pay an extra 90 cents an hour. Who else what employer would rather have a high-schooler working for $5.15 instead of a college student?

While it is true that an increasing minimum wage decreases the number of teen-agers employed, several studies show that more youths enroll in school when the minimum wage increases "probably because the attractiveness of schooling is enhanced when employment activities are restricted by the higher minimum." (Mincer and Leighton, 1981). Based on this, I will argue that many teen-agers are able to gain more in the long run by staying in school, acquiring more education skills and improving their human capital. So now that we have discovered the truth, that wage increases do not cause inflation, that college students won't be left jobless and high-schoolers will be better off in the long run, I will argue that the minimum-wage law must be kept and not abolished as Stephens would like to see occur. How many of you work or have worked for minimum wage, have gotten a pay raise (with the exceptions of promotions and increase in minimum wage or the 15-percent raise per semester as per the University pay scale) when the company did well? I haven't. And I am sure most of you haven't, either.

If the minimum-wage law is abolished, a likely scenario is this: the price of goods as measured by the CPI goes up. I, a minimum-wage worker, receive no raise to keep up with the increasing price of goods and services. The economy expands, and the company does exceedingly well. Yet I, who cleans the offices at night for $4.25 an hour, receive no increases in my wage. The buying power of my paycheck is diminished, and the Congress cannot raise the minimum wage. I trust my members of the Congress and senators to increase the minimum wage when necessary, not some business executive or owner who can choose where the increased profits will go: his pocket or mine.

My conclusion is, you and I, as college students frying hamburgers on the weekend to pay rent, would be hurt much more by abolishing the minimum wage, as opposed to the current and more sensible idea to increase the minimum wage.

KU not worried about competing with the Cats

Ho-hum.

Kansas and K-State, two teams at opposite ends of the college basketball spectrum, will collide for the 231st time at 2:50 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

DEREK SIMMONS

At one end, we have the Jayhawks: Winners in eight of their last nine games, perched atop the Big Eight Conference and ranked third nationally.

Kansas has beaten the No. 1 and No. 2 teams in the country, is looking for its sixth-straight season with at least 20 wins and has been gobbling up opponents left and right.

The Jayhawks are 19-3 overall, 8-2 in the conference.

"When we go to opposing teams' gyms, it's their biggest game," KU forward Scot Pollard said.

Competence breeds confidence at Kansas.

And in the other corner, we have the Wildcats: Losers in eight of their last nine contests, unranked and caged in at No. 8 in the conference.

K-State has upset only one ranked opponent this season, will be playing without the leadership and rebounding ability of Demond Davis because of injury, and is shooting a horrid 38 percent in Big Eight games.

The Wildcats are 11-11 overall, 2-8 in the league.

Yawn, yawn, yawn.

Can't wait for game time, huh?

"They definitely need some wins," Pollard said of K-State. "A win against us would make their season. Like it did last year."

True, last year's 68-64 win in Lawrence was the highlight of a 20-14 season. And true, it would be a highlight again.

But double-check the white jerseys before tipoff to make sure "K-State" is still stitched up top. Kansas is undefeated in Bramlage and has walked away with 11 straight in Manhattan.

K-State, it seems, has been sleepwalking.

"I can't think of anything like that," Coach Roy Williams said of the Jayhawks' streak. "It's mind-boggling. I keep telling our team to put it off another year."

None of the statistics suggest KU won't.

The Jayhawks score more, shoot better, grab more rebounds, commit fewer turnovers and win more.

Oh, I'm supposed to insert the little word rivalry here, right?

Yeah, like that's supposed to give K-State some supernatural ability capable of keeping up with Kansas.

But it does work sometimes.

K-State was the last team to beat Kansas in Lawrence, and the Jayhawks were No. 1 at the time. This season, the Wildcats lost 78-74 in Allen Fieldhouse — the closest any competitor has come to ending the streak.

The Cats shot 45 percent from the field in their latest loss to the Jayhawks, including 50 percent from three-point range.

"They shot really well in that game," Kansas reserve C.B. McGrath said. "That really surprised us."

It probably surprised everybody.

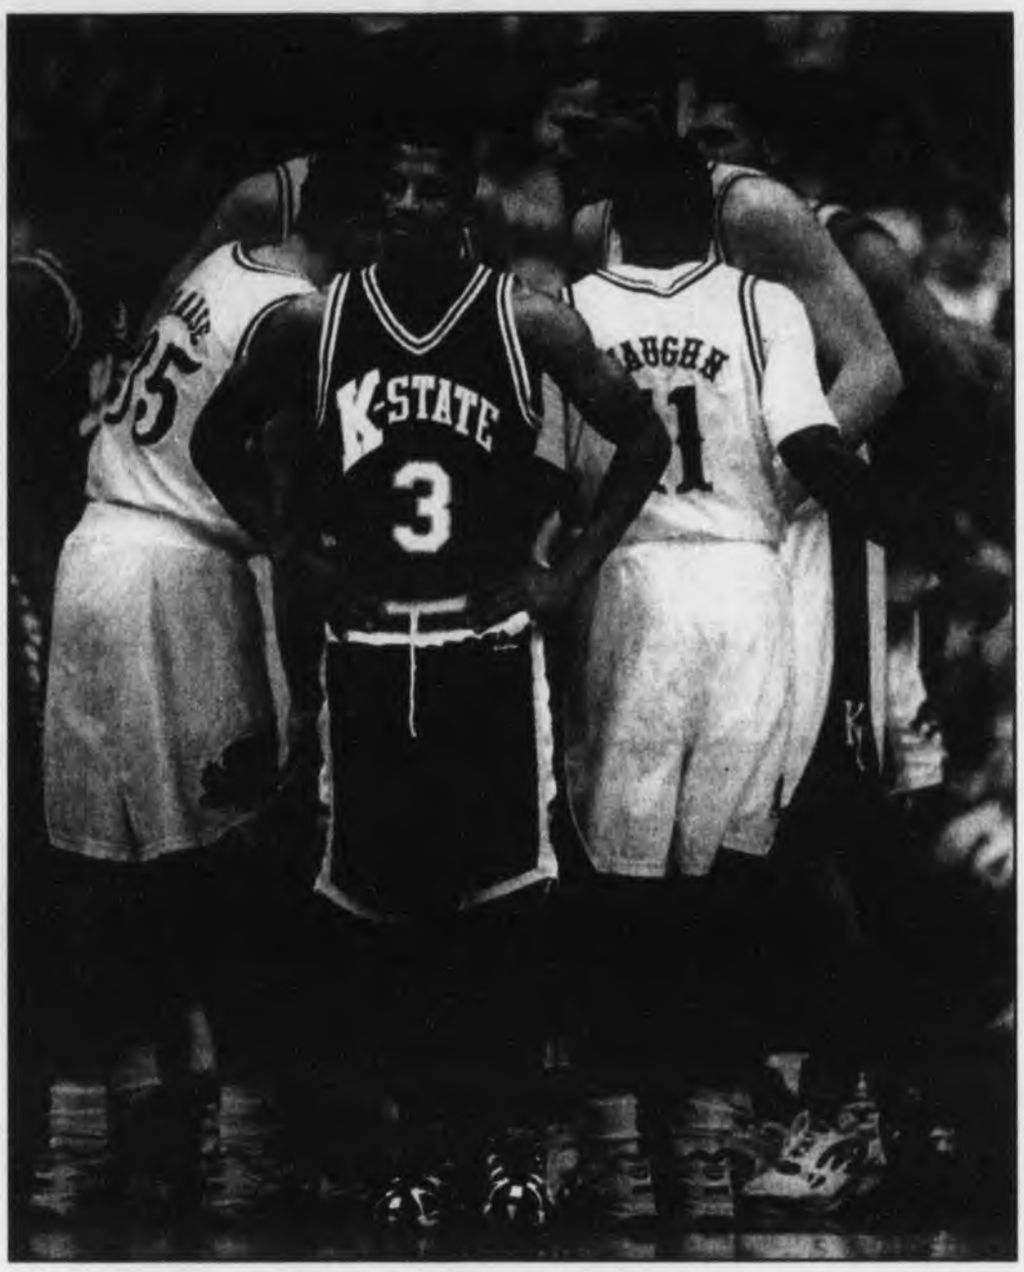
K-State's inability to yield consistent scoring numbers has been its downfall for most of the season.But the nature of the rivalry kept the Cats in contention.

"I thought they outplayed us," Williams said of the first meeting. "We got lucky and made a couple of plays at the end of the game that won it for us. They played our tails off here."

With the Cats' losing debacle at full tilt, what's to say they will snap out of it now?

"You know the story of when a lion gets backed against a wall," Pollard said. "Well, you know the story. They may come out and be more fired up."

Yeah, and sometimes the lion ends up as lunchmeat, too.



But Williams knows K-State, no matter the talent level, is up to playing Kansas.

"They are struggling a little bit," he said nicely. "They'll be very enthused. I think we'll get their best shot."

After beating Nebraska 91-68 at Lincoln on Tuesday, Williams said he would start looking at K-State on Thursday. It doesn't sound like he's overly concerned.

And upon learning that Davis would miss the game after an ankle injury in the Colorado game, Pollard said, "He's a starter, right?

"Yeah, I guess it could hurt them."

Junior guard Elliot Hatcher stands in disbelief as University of Kansas players huddle during K-State's 78-74 loss to the Jayhawks on Jan. 18 in Lawrence. K-State and KU will meet for the 231st time Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. Tip-off is set for 2:50 p.m.

K-State looks to stop streak

TODD STEWART
Collegian

Allen Fieldhouse may be the official home of the Kansas Jayhawk men's basketball team, but Bramlage Coliseum would be a suitable replacement should anything ever happen to the historic Hawk arena.

K-State coach Tom Asbury will lead his team into action tomorrow against the Jayhawks, trying to break Kansas' 11-game winning streak in Manhattan.

Asbury said the streak, which includes a perfect record in Bramlage, baffles him.

"It looks like KSU's had a better run at them in Lawrence," he said. "I don't know what to attribute that to."

What won't help the Cats' cause is an injury to senior forward Demond Davis, which should keep him out of tomorrow's game.

The injury will cause Asbury to juggle his starting lineup, taking into account Kansas' interior size advantage.

"Obviously, with KU's terrific size, we need to at least assess the possibility of going with a different lineup," Asbury said. "We're so small. We basically have one forward and four Big Eight-size guards. Some high-schools' teams are as big as us."

Asbury said he liked the Cats' effort during an earlier 78-74 loss to Kansas this season in Allen Fieldhouse.

"We competed real hard and probably defended as well as we can," he said.

For a win this time around, the Cats will have to stop their four-game streak of sub-40-percent shooting.

"We've enabled ourselves to get better shots and to get more open shots due to offensive execution," Asbury said. "We're just having trouble knocking them down.

"If you can't shoot, you've got to do everything else perfectly."

The combination of the Jayhawks' No. 3 ranking and the Cats' poor shooting has led them to be tabbed as big underdogs for Saturday's game.

"I don't think that I've been this big of an underdog since we played Michigan," Asbury said in reference to Pepperdine, his former school. "That game I think we were something like 86-point underdogs.

"Their five gotta beat our five. Just because they're a big favorite doesn't mean they get to play seven guys."

With a team that plays three guys over 6-10, the Jayhawks have a decided height advantage — the Cats don't start a player over 6-8.

The struggling Cats, who have lost eight of their last nine games, will take an 11-11 record into tomorrow's game, but Asbury said it doesn't get him down.

"It's not fun — you don't sit here and dwell on it during the course of the week," Asbury said. "I cuss at them a little more when we're losing."

With only four games remaining before the Big Eight Tournament in Kansas City, Asbury said tomorrow's game is important.

"It's a huge game, but right now they're all huge," he said. "I'm sure it's a huge game for them, too."

Clark wants to forget about last season's poor showing

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

Baseball is back.

Well, at least it's back at K-State.

K-State's own boys of summer hit the field for the first time this season as they travel to Tulsa, Okla., in weekend action against the Golden Eagles of Oral Roberts. Saturday's game time is set for 2:30 p.m., while Sunday's contest begins at 1 p.m.

K-State head coach Mike Clark said he's hopeful his Cats can regroup after last year's 13-43 season.

"We're cautiously optimistic," Clark said at Thursday's press conference. "We like what we've seen so far. The players came back a lot better after working on their weaknesses this summer."

"But we don't talk about last year. The first day of practice, we said that last year was last year, and I didn't want it mentioned. It's something that happened — something we had to go through.

"Last year, we got into a rebuilding mode to get things built back up, and that's what we've done. We're very confident in the players we've got. But the experience we had last year I think will help us this year and next year and the year after."

It's this year that Clark is focusing on now, with much of that focus on his pitching staff, an area that he admits hurt the Cats throughout most of last season.

"We weren't very successful in the pitching area last year, and one of our goals is not to go through the kind of situation we had last season," Clark said. "By the end of the season, we really didn't know where we were bullpen-wise when we'd go in there, and that's one area we stressed in the fall."

So what did Clark do to cure his ailing bullpen?

"We've brought in a lot of pitchers, and at semester, we had a lot of pitchers transfer in — pitchers we didn't recruit, they just came in. And now we've got 13 guys that all bring it up to 80 to 85 mph with pretty good stuff. We've got a pretty good mix of left-handed and right-handed pitchers, so now it's just a matter of them executing in the game."

Among those 13 pitchers Clark is counting on to perform on the mound are newcomers Jack Witt, Marc Lowery, Matt Koeman, Steve Pearce, Dan Albrecht and Chris Traylor. Clark said he expects Koeman and Witt to be starters, along with returning sophomores Jon Oiseth and Eric Yanz.

Rounding out the five starters will probably be Adam Novak, with Lowery, Traylor, Pearce and Albrecht working in long reliever roles. Closers for the Cats include Jon Albrecht and David Johnson, with Kevin Wicker and Jake Voos in middle relief.

Although Clark may have his pitching staff in order, he said he doesn't know what to expect from his Cats at the plate.

"Offensively, they're making a big adjustment because new assistant coach Rocky Ward is on board," Clark said. "He's been teaching them a new hitting style and new hitting philosophy, which is an adjustment for them. So I don't know how they'll be coming out of the gate swinging. They've made great strides so far."

Among the heavy hitters who will be returning for the Cats is designated hitter Matt Miller, who led K-State in hitting last year with a .318 average while doing double-duty with the Cats' football team. Joining Miller in the .300 club is Todd Fereday, who hit .306 as a freshman last year and was named a first-team all-American on the freshman squad.

Junior Dave Hendrix, a second-team all-Big Eight selection, and catcher Chris Bouchard, who earned honorable mention all-Big Eight honors, also look to give the Cats a boost at the plate.

OU, OSU next for Cats

DAN LEWERENZ
Collegian

Coming off three Big Eight Conference home wins, the Wildcats take to the road this weekend to try and avenge earlier home losses to Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

The Cats' first opponent of the weekend is Oklahoma, which has four starters scoring in double figures.

"Oklahoma is a team capable of putting a lot of points on the board in a hurry," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

"Our defense in transition was a lot better against Kansas last weekend, so they didn't get many easy buckets. We've got to do the same thing against Oklahoma."

Agler said the key to defeating the Cowgirls in Stillwater will be how the K-State offense adjusts to OSU's changing defenses.

"Oklahoma State likes to switch up defenses," Agler said.

"They play a combination of defenses on you, some man and some zone.

"Then they'll play man on some people and zone the others like they did up here."

Both OU and OSU used first-half runs to establish a lead and then hit their free throws down the stretch to defeat the Cats in Bramlage.

To win on the road, Agler said K-State needs to keep their opponents off the line.

"We can't prevent them from making their free throws," Agler said.

"We just have to try and control how many opportunities they get. That's something we didn't do a very good job of against Kansas.

"We just need to eliminate as many fouls as possible," Agler said.

Additionally, both teams have a considerable size advantage over the Cats.

"We always have to do as good a job on the boards as possible because we're not very big," Agler said.

"Spreading out and getting second opportunities is really important to us."

Gaskins returns this weekend

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

One week and counting.

The Wildcats will compete in the KSU Open at 3 p.m. Friday at Ahearn Field House.

The meet serves as K-State's final tune-up before the Big Eight Indoor Championships Feb. 24-25.

"We have about two-thirds of our people doing something, and the other third will sit out," Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Athletes from Kansas, Wichita State, UMKC and K-State will compete.

Rovelto said although the meet is called an open meet, not all events will be open to all athletes. It primarily will be just the athletes from those four schools.

The meet also marks the return of high jumper and linebacker Percell Gaskins.

The former NCAA indoor champion will be competing for the first time since the 1994 Big Eight Outdoor Championships in Lawrence.

"He's going to jump this weekend," Rovelto said. "Hopefully he'll jump at the Big Eight Championships next week."

Gaskins has been nursing a sore knee since the conclusion of the football season.

Mainly, this is all pretty much true. Except for the bit about Joey Lawrence, as he is our favorite heart throb.

Michael Jackson, Madonna named as official 'Spawn of Satan'

The latest people to have prices put on their heads by religious fundamentalists are not authors, politicians or Democrats — they're none other than Michael Jackson and Madonna.

The superstars are terrorists just as much as people who set off bombs and should be brought to Pakistan for trial, a Pakistani religious party demanded Sunday.

The demand appeared to be a response to last week's extradition to the United States of Ramzi Yousef, a suspect in the World Trade Center bombing.

"They are ruining the lives of thousands of Muslims and leading them to destruction, away from their religion, ethics and morality," said Nematullah Khan, a divisional chief of the anti-American Party of Islam.

Now if we could only get them to call for the extradition of Joey Lawrence of TV's "Blossom."

"Whoa!"

Sign we will never see: 'This highway has been adopted by the KKK'

If you are a Ku Klux Klan member and want to pick up trash in Ohio, it's best to stick to the back roads.

State officials in Ohio have trashed a Ku Klux Klan group's bid to pick up highway litter.

The Klan won't be allowed to join the Adopt-a-Highway program because its participation could become a safety hazard, Transportation Department spokesman Pieter Wykoff said Wednesday.

I know I could save on my garbage pick-up bills if I lived anywhere near that stretch of highway.

He also said the sign marking the Klan's involvement could distract drivers, and protesters could follow the Klan when it makes its quarterly clean up trips.

Whoops! Did you hear something? What's that white and red spot on the road back there?

Just another Klansman, dear ...

Bush treats golf fans like he treated economy

Some folks might have called it golf, but for two former U.S. presidents it was more like a scene from "Caddyshack."

Gerald Ford hooked his first drive into the crowd, but apparently it didn't hit anyone. Seven holes later, his ball glanced off a woman's finger. George Bush ricocheted his second shot off a tree into the face of a woman who required stitches — and bounced a later shot off another spectator.

When it was all over, with Ford sinking a 40-foot putt to loud cheers from the crowd, Bush's unofficial final score was 92, President Bill Clinton's 93 and Ford's 100. Bush spent a lot of time apologizing to people he hit. He had to say he was sorry to 71-year-old Norma Early of Vista, Calif. Bleeding but unbowed, she told Bush, "I'm sorry I got in the way of your shot."

Later, Bush hit John C. Rynd of Chula Vista on the back of the leg and went up to ask him, "How's the wound?"

"No blood, no problem," Rynd said, and he got an autographed ball for his trouble.

"Sorry, sir, I wasn't looking," Rynd said.

Tossing cookies, passing out expected in birthday ritual

Not having the best sense of balance anymore, Kent Hamilton, sophomore in mechanical engineering, is led out of Champions Pub & Grill on the way to another bar Monday night.

Editor's note: This article is not meant to promote alcoholism, but merely to show how one person celebrated his 21st birthday.

For some K-State students, turning 21 has become a rite of passage.

A sign of adulthood.

The beginning of freedom.

For Kent Hamilton, sophomore in mechanical engineering, the event was Monday night, and his friends were there to help him celebrate it every step of the way.

"Start with the good stuff so you can remember it," said Hamilton's roommate Brian Peters, junior in pre-health professions, before Hamilton did his first shot as a 21-year-old: Crown Royal.

Following his roommate's advice, Hamilton did the shot in his room at the Phi Delta Theta fraternity at 8:50 p.m. and chased it down with his fourth beer of the evening.

Hamilton said he was not sure how much he would be drinking in the course of the night.

"I don't know," he said. "Whatever people give me."

Hamilton said his parents had been up to see him the day before to celebrate his birthday but had no idea what his plans were for his actual birthday.

"They'd be severely disappointed," he said.

At 9:05 p.m., Hamilton drank a Molson Ice and talked with the small group of people congregating in his room.

The conversation tended to be about whether Hamilton would throw up at the end of the evening and about whether he would make it until 2 a.m., when the bars in Aggieville close.

"I wore this nasty shirt tonight just because I'm ready for him to puke," Brandy Payne, Hamilton's girlfriend, said.

Throughout the night, Payne, a junior in elementary education, said she planned to write down the name of each shot Hamilton did and then have him sign his name next to it.

Hamilton prepares to down his 16th shot of the evening, an oil slick, Monday night at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

At 9:20 p.m., Hamilton met more of his friends in the Outback at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. Immediately, a beer and a shot were bought for him.

"I think tomorrow morning is not going to be good," Hamilton said before taking the shot of Blue Whiskey and chasing it with a St. Polly's Girl beer.

Quarters were put in the juke box, and a game of darts was started.

"I got here early because we've got to knock him out before anyone else gets here," Mark Oberkrom, junior in exercise science, said.

After finishing a shot, Hamilton signs his name on a sheet of paper to document all the drinks he has consumed.

At 9:30 p.m., Hamilton had a penalty shot, followed by a Jagermeister shot at 9:32 p.m. and a shot of buffalo piss at 9:40 p.m.

Each of the shots was bought by one of his friends.

"It wasn't that bad," Hamilton said after the shot of buffalo piss.

"Then why'd you have to chase it?" one of his friends said.

At 9:45 p.m., Hamilton ordered a glass of water.

"I deserve it," he said.

At 9:50 p.m., Oberkrom handed Hamilton a shot consisting of Jagermeister, vodka and Bacardi 151.

Hamilton asked what was in the shot.

"Do it," Oberkrom said. "Then I'll tell you what's in it."

At 10:10 p.m., the party moved to Champions Pub & Grill.

Hamilton said so far he felt great.

Immediately upon arrival at Champions, a group of Hamilton's friends went directly to the bar and ordered more shots for him.

At 10:15 p.m., a girl scout cookie, bloody brain, mind eraser and prairie fire were each placed in front of him.

"As soon as I get a water, I'll take them," he said.

After encouragement from his friends, Hamilton did each of the shots.

"All I could taste was the tabasco. Was that straight tabasco? Are you guys trying to trick me?" Hamilton said, slurring his speech after the prairie fire shot.

Ashley Fallin, senior in apparel and textile marketing, and Kelli Meads, junior in special education, were also celebrating their birthday at Champions.

"It's just my 22nd. Compared to my 21st, it's all downhill," Fall said.

Because Meads was also celebrating her 21st birthday, Hamilton walked over to her table and had his picture taken with her.

Meads said although it was her 21st birthday, she could not drink too heavily because she had a test the next day.

"I guess I would be if my friends were forcing it down my throat," she said.

At 10:25 p.m., Hamilton was brought a shot of Jagermeister and Jack Daniels and a glass of Moosehead beer.

"How are you feeling, Kent?" several of his friends asked at different times.

CHRISTY CALLOWAY

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Be true to your friends this week. They are more important than you realize. This is a good time to begin planning events for the summer. Let your creative juices flow. Exciting news is on the way. For the weekend: Stay out late.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Make good use of your time this weekend. Financial problems you thought were over are coming back to haunt you. Vent your emotions and you'll have a better sense of clarity. For the weekend: Let others treat you.

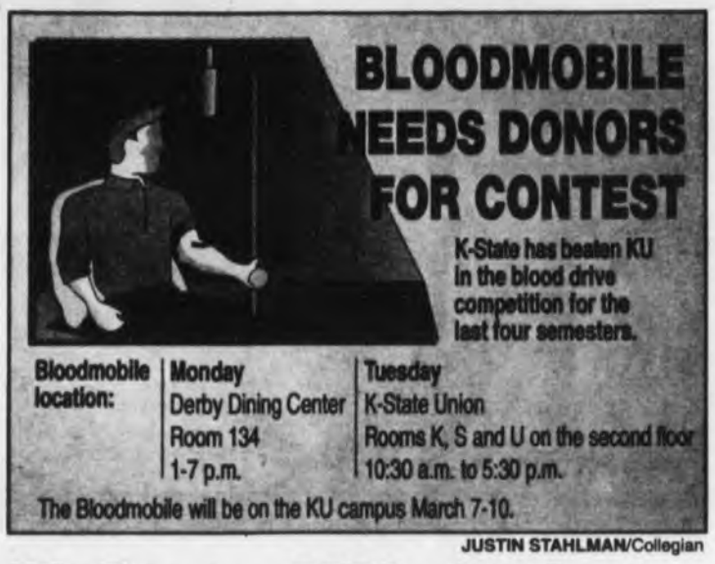
ARIES (March 21-April 19) Keeping everyone's attention has been easy for the ram this week. Take time out for yourself this weekend and visit a favorite place. Keep yourself focused on career aspects. For the weekend: Go with the flow.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You may be feeling down this week, but a good friend shows you how much they care, lifting your spirits. Trust a loved one or family member who gives some advice. Put romance on the back burner — you have more important things do. For the weekend: Complete unfinished business.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Communications both far and near are excellent. Use your keen wit to get yourself out of a bad situation. Take time to make yourself a useful budget and follow through with it. As for the weekend, try something exciting and new.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Be around for your friends — they really need your support. Organize your life, and you'll feel more content. Someone who has been interested in you will finally get the nerve up to tell you. For the weekend: Be spontaneous.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Express yourself. Tell that controlling friend to back off. Rearrange your room and give yourself more space. It is necessary that you give yourself some time to air out. For the weekend: Be yourself.



VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) You'll meet someone this week that will share the exact same ideas about life that you do. Be bold — if you want something, just ask. It's a very social time for Virgo so go out and have fun. Hiding in your room just causes you to collect dust like an old painting. For the weekend: Follow the excitement.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Everything seems good, and finances are in order. You are busy as usual, but don't neglect your friends. Stop analyzing romance so much and just go with it. For the weekend: Give your friends a little TLC.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Use your charm to get your foot through the door and remember that no one is more sly than Scorpio. Dump a friend who always puts you down. It's not going to get any better. For the weekend: Work is on overload, so give it your attention.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) You're feeling very peaceful and organized for once. Take advantage, because it won't last for long. Flirt and have fun next week, but don't feel obligated to anyone. For the weekend: Take a scenic trip with friends.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Don't let a selfish friend clutter your life with their problems. Remind them that you have a life too. Join a new social group or club. It will keep you busy. For the weekend: Don't plan ahead, just go with the flow.

K-State, KU rivalry runs deep in the veins

JASON TYLER
Collegian

The American Red Cross blood-drive competition between K-State and the University of Kansas is heating up again.

The American Red Cross Bloodmobile will be at K-State Monday through Friday next week. Monday the drive will be 1 to 7 p.m. in Room 134 of Derby Food Center.

Beginning Tuesday, the Bloodmobile will move to rooms K, S and U on the second floor of the K-State Union.

The hours for donating blood at the Union locations are 10:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. The Bloodmobile will be at KU March 7-10.

The blood-drive competition between the two universities was initiated in spring 1993.

The university that donates the most units of blood receives the traveling trophy.

K-State has beaten KU and retained the trophy for four consecutive semesters.

Each semester, a goal is set for each university, Jeff Sneed, Regional Director for American Red Cross, said.

"We set goals for each university so we can give students and faculty something to shoot for," he said.

Sneed said the Bloodmobile would like to receive 740 units of blood from K-State and 725 units of blood from KU this semester.

"We also set goals for each university so we can provide the proper staff to accommodate each university," he said.

The American Red Cross supplies blood to 120 hospitals in Kansas and northern Oklahoma, Sneed said.

"The American Red Cross supplies half of the nation's blood supply," he said.

Sneed said giving blood is a community responsibility, and everyone who is eligible should participate whenever they get a chance.

"We encourage people to give blood when they have it so they can get blood when they need it," he said.

Last semester, K-State did not reach its estimated goal for units of blood, said Reita Currie, registered nurse and health educator at Lafene Health Center.

"Even though K-State has never lost to KU in the blood-drive contest, last semester K-State was a little under their estimated goal, and as a result, the region we supply for was a little low," she said.

Currie said K-State students are very committed to the blood drive, and they keep coming back time after time.

Sponsors for the blood drive are Delta Tau Delta, Alpha Phi Omega, Golden Key National Honor Society, Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, Manhattan Christian College and Lafene.

Groovy! Bunch is back

Break out bell bottoms; Brady movie hits town

CORI CORNELISON
Collegian

A lovely lady, three girls, four men and a housekeeper all living together might sound like an X-rated movie, but fans know them as "The Brady Bunch."

This bell-bottomed, polyester-wearing TV bunch is frozen in the early 1970s, overindulging in words such as "groovy" and "far out."

Reruns of the TV show can still be seen today, but "Brady Bunch" fans have more to look forward to.

"The Brady Bunch Movie" opens today in theaters, and thoughts of the movie have re-established memories of the show for some K-State students.

"They're the all-American, do-good family," Brian Phillips, junior in marketing, said.

He said his favorite episode was when Bobby put too much soap in the washing machine and suds were everywhere.

Phillips said he doubts he will go see the movie because it looks cheesy, but he said he'll continue to watch the TV show.

Amy Douglass, senior in psychology, said she is going to watch the movie with friends today.

She said her fondest memories of the TV show were when Jan got braces and when Greg learned to drive.

Amanda Jones, junior in general ecology, said she likes "The Brady Bunch" because there is an obvious moral in every show.

She said her favorite cast member was Cindy because she was so cute and had a lisp.

"Sometimes your faults can be part of the reasons why people like you," Jones said.

THE BRADY BUNCH MOVIE

The Brady Bunch opens today at Westloop 6 Theatres. The times are 7:30 and 9:45 p.m. Friday; 1:30, 4:30, 7:30 and 9:45 p.m. Saturday ; 1:30, 4:30, 7:30 and 9:45 p.m. Sunday.

She said one of her favorite episodes of the show was when everyone was blaming each other for stealing toys, but actually Tiger, the family dog, was hiding them in the dog house.

Jones said she thinks the movie is going to make fun of the Bradys.

"By bringing them into the '90s, it will ridicule them," she said.

The episode in which Alice, the housekeeper, was out of town and her army-type sister substituted for her was the funniest, Erin Underwood, sophomore undecided, said.

"She made the whole family do exercises," she said.

Jeff Bandel, senior in finance and accounting, said his favorite episode was when the Bradys went on vacation to the Grand Canyon and Bobby and Cindy got lost.

"I like Bobby," he said. "He's the underdog. He's always picked on."

Bandel said he has heard some interesting rumors about certain cast members in "The Brady Bunch."

"I heard that Greg was sleeping with Carol, and he used to get stoned before the production," he said.

Title: "Towering Inferno II"

Spiel: A take-off on 1970's disaster movies. This one plots the destruction of the newly built Memorial Stadium parking garage by way of tornado. Charleton Heston stars as Rex Morgan, the K-State president who secretly walled up mafia corpses in the concrete structure and is revealed to a bitter public. Joey Lawrence stars as Timmy O'Toole, the student determined to literally expose Morgan.

DEAR CASSIE,

by Cassandra Duveaux

Balloon bandits need new hobby

Dear Cassie,

It all started out by launching water balloons every two or three weeks into the Hardee's parking lot from our apartment window. We hoped to hit people in the head, and we've succeeded many times. We now do it three or four times a week.

What began as entertainment has now grown into an obsessive-compulsive disorder. The cops have tried to stop us, but we always seem to outsmart them.

The Wet Bandits

Dear Wet Bandits,

If you don't want to hurt anyone else and not get harassed by the police, I suggest you take up a new obsessive compulsive disorder. You can run around your apartment naked and whip each other with wet dishtowels. You'll get the same effect, and you won't harm anyone else in the process.

McCain needs to gear events toward students

On Monday, students at another Kansas university had the pleasure and privilege of seeing Wynton Marsalis, perhaps the giant of current American jazz, in concert.

We here at K-State would have had to drive for two hours to see him perform (a serious drawback for cash-strapped students).

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

On the other hand, if you're seriously into clowns and baritones, McCain Auditorium's season could have suited you just fine.

For the most part, McCain's season has been excellent, but that mostly applies to last semester.

So far this semester, we have been over-programmed with mildly pleasing possibilities. One weekend of events gave us the Smithsonian Jazz Masterworks Orchestra on Friday, Avner the Eccentric on Sunday and Reno on Tuesday.

Avner arguably wasn't great for students. I did not go — for a good reason. The event didn't interest me. A clown is, for the most part, geared toward children. End of story.

Now, if McCain wants to program events for the families of Manhattan, such as December's repulsive "Aladdin," that is fine. Just don't do it with my student money and under the umbrella of K-State's only performance series.

Smithsonian Jazz and Reno were splendid shows in some respects, but had I not been reviewing them for my job, there is no way I would have gone to both (which, it turns out, was the case for a whopping majority of students).

Last Sunday, baritone Andre Solomon-Glover performed to crickets.

What is wrong with this picture?

Richard Martin, director of McCain, solidly planned for a multitude of programming options. McCain's season has been diverse, but at a price.

There's a problem of becoming so diverse that your audience dwindles into small, select groups. I really don't think that is McCain's purpose.

I would have much rather seen the Smithsonian Jazz, Avner, Reno and Solomon-Glover all canceled for just one concert of Wynton Marsalis — which would have definitely sold out.

It's not the quantity that counts, but the quality. An event should be artistically relevant while not sacrificing public interest. Students would have turned out for a Marsalis concert (that is, if all the tickets weren't snatched up by Manhattan patrons).

By all means, I don't think McCain should only cater to "safe" productions of widely-accepted works. The Lied Center, at that other school, successfully booked a dance performance by Bill T. Jones' company — perhaps the most controversial ballet of the year, if not the decade.

Don't think that I don't appreciate some of these events. I just think McCain's programming this semester has sorely missed the boat for the majority of students at this University.

Performers fuse dancing, history

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

A tribal drum and traditional dancers will bring the history of the African Americans to life at 8 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

"It's an African concept which tells the story of the drum and ties it into dancing," Art Johnson, Fusion business manager, said. "It covers the '30s, '40s and '60s and the popular dancing at that time. It has drama and crowd participation. It's something totally different."

Fusion, a production hosted by members of Arrested Development, was created by Speech, the vocalist, songwriter and producer to give the newest member of the group, Ajile Axam, the opportunity to showcase her choreography talent.

Axam joined Arrested Development a year ago, and after performing with the group as a backup vocalist and choreographer, Speech asked her to take over the Fusion project because she had done extensive research on African American culture.

"Speech created Fusion as a vehicle for her to melt together her knowledge of African American history and dance into one show," said Bob Fitzgerald, manager of Vagabond Records Productions program division.

Axam, a graduate of Princeton University, owner of the Total Dance Company and creator of the signature African dance style moja, said at first she did shows with Arrested Development and went on tour with Fusion at the same time.

"Fusion started to go at a rapid pace and took off like a jet," Axam said. "It got to the point where I couldn't get back for the shows."

Axam now works full-time for the Fusion project and tours the country with the show, which demonstrates the impact of the drum on the history of African American music.

"Arrested Development has a certain purpose and uses music as a tool for enlightenment," Axam said. "Fusion works for the same cause. Right now, I am still a family member of Arrested Development, but I'm working with Fusion."

Axam said while she's working on the Fusion project, Arrested Development has made a guest appearance on "Sesame Street," performed in Europe and made a second trip to Japan.

She said she would have liked to go on tour with Arrested Development but feels good about what she has done with the Fusion project.

"All of my work is very meaningful," Axam said. "All of the work is for everybody, for all people, to live in a better way."

Axam said she had doubts about working on Fusion at first, but said it was worth it.

"Fusion now has a life of its own," Axam said. "I feel good for what the project of Arrested Development is doing to promote good music and the idea that entertainment can be positive."

Johnson said Axam fought the idea of taking over the project at first but has turned Fusion into a solid success.

"No matter where we go, we play to rave reviews," Johnson said. "Fusion is something that people can relate to, entertains and educates and at the same time, hits the issues. What better way of making a difference than through the arts?"

Axam said Fusion has booked a 40-city theater tour for next year and she doesn't want anyone in the K-State community to miss Fusion.

"It's very powerful, and it comes from the soul," Axam said. "It's very impressive, and you'll know when you see it that it's something real. It's not a copy of anything that has ever been done before."

Sawyer Brown back for Sunday concert

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

Some girls don't like boys like them. Aw, but "Some Girls Do."

Yes, Sawyer Brown is going to once again grace Manhattan's Bramlage Coliseum, from 8 to 11 Sunday night.

Last spring, the band played to an 8,500-ticket, sellout crowd.

With 12 albums under their belts and 11 years in the business, the five-man show is still as popular as ever. Their latest album, "Greatest Hits 1990-1995" is a mix of haunting ballads and rock-like tunes.

Eric Melin, an employee of Streetside Records, said the album is on their top 40 bestselling list.

Sawyer Brown, who got its start at the University of Central Florida, definitely has its own style. The band doesn't sing the typical sad "my woman done left me cause I mistreated her and now I'm all alone" type of country.

Instead, songs like "Cafe On The Corner" address society's indifference to the hardships of the working man. "The Walk" is a sentimental look at the evolving relationship between a father and a son.

Sawyer Brown known is for its original style and charismatic stage presence. Lyrics such as "I have lived life in the fast lane" certainly reflect their lifestyle of more than 220 shows a year.

Word of the Sunday performance is spreading fast.

"We're over half-house now," Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said.

Melinda Rogge, sophomore in applied music, said she's heard a lot of people are going.

"I've heard they were the most entertaining act in country. They have such wide appeal," she said.

Bill would make repeal of lottery more difficult

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A Senate panel heard testimony Thursday on a bill designed to make repealing the Kansas Lottery more difficult.

The measure would delete a provision in state law that requires the Kansas Legislature to take positive action every two years to continue the lottery.

If either the House or the Senate fails to do so, the lottery is automatically discontinued.

Gary Sherrer, secretary of commerce and housing, urged the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee to endorse the bill for floor debate.

He said Kansans want to keep the lottery, and the state needs the revenue for economic development.

Under the statute, 90 percent of the money raised from the lottery goes to economic development projects.

Sixty-four percent of Kansas voters approved the lottery in 1986.

▶ REVIEW

Baby-boomer play fails to connect with audience, lacks comedy

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER
Collegian

You, too, can witness the life story of yet another baby boomer in "The Heidi Chronicles."

The award-winning play's namesake character is portrayed by Ayne Steinkuehler, a graduate student in speech. Heidi is a child of the 1960s who tries to remain true to that decade's ideals, even when that puts her against the tide of change of the '70s and '80s.

There are some aspects to this play that are troubling, if not confusing. First of all, this play is supposed to be a comedy. A few chuckles and the occasional yuck-yuck hardly qualify a play as a comedy, especially when it tackles the heavy subject matter that it does. While most comedies take a serious issue and make it funny, this play takes a serious issue and makes it serious.

Secondly, it's not clear, other than the possibility that the audience paid admission, why anyone in the seats should give a hoot about this person named Heidi Holland. Sure, an audience member can suspend disbelief for a while, but at some point during the play, the characters must gain some importance to that member of the audience.

SHOW TIME

"The Heidi Chronicles" will also be playing at 8 p.m. today and Saturday; 8 p.m. Feb. 23-24; and 2 p.m. on Feb. 25 in Nichols Theatre. Tickets are $6 for students and senior citizens, and $8 for the general public.

This probably had less to do with the script and more to with Steinkuehler's interpretation. Steinkuehler makes Heidi believable to a fault. She's so realistic (with the exception of some over-acted monologues) she seems no different than an audience member. This is a back-handed credit to her acting abilities, although she may have invested a little too much in credibility and less in what makes Heidi so unique to warrant her own play.

This play's most serious downfalls are not the faults of the cast and crew. No, this play is disturbing on a deep level because it represents the best that Broadway has to offer. Broadway culture has become so parochial that it can only produce revivals and self-aggrandizing baby-boomer products like "The Heidi Chronicles."

What could be more nauseating for the 20-something crowd than the baby-boomer consciousness checking its look in the mirror for more than two hours?

This, unfortunately, is cutting-edge, to say nothing of commercially lucrative, playwriting these days.

Director Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech, makes the nostalgia even more unbearable. Between scenes, the audience is treated to black-and-white slides and music that correlate to the year of the next scene.

You'll know it's 1980 when John Lennon sings "Imagine" and Ronald Reagan shows up on the screens. You'll know it's 1982 when you hear Carly Simon sing "You're So Vain" and you see Ronald Reagan again. If you listen closely, you may hear the middle-aged person sitting next to you humming along.

Keep an eye out for love beads, platform shoes, bell bottoms and Miami Vice tropical shirts, too. Bring Dramamine and No-Doz.

To be fair, Shelton has the responsibility of trying to attract an audience. Nostalgia works in Hollywood. Why shouldn't it work in Nichols Theatre?

It doesn't work because this small theater isn't larger than life like the silver screen is. In such an intimate setting, there has to be a personal connection between the cast and audience. The parade of icons (the hippie-turned-entrepreneur, the radical-feminist-turned-television-executive, etc.) does little to make an impression on the audience beyond reinforcing some stereotypes.

One true bright spot in this play is Tim Aumiller, graduate student in speech, who plays Heidi's friend and renowned pediatrician Peter Patrone.

Even though his plight as a gay male is meant to parallel Heidi's life as a principled single woman, Aumiller's investment into this character makes him believable as well as more sublime than Steinhuehler's character.

One must wonder by play's end, with Patrone facing the AIDS epidemic in both his personal and professional lives, why he doesn't deserve his own play. It's always a joy to see what Aumiller brings to the stage.

This play is about the ordinary life of an ordinary woman portrayed in an ordinary way with lots of nostalgia.

This should keep the boomers happy until the Broadway mill cranks out another tribute to God's chosen generation.

"The Heidi Chronicles" is playing at Nichols Theatre this weekend and Feb. 23-25.

discriminates against many people," Halinski said. "I don't think it hurts anybody to learn about different cultures, and this group is against it."

Some senators objected to this amendment because it discriminated against a group because of the group's views, which is against Senate policy.

"How dare we single out this group to cut their funding simply because of what they believe," Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said.

Halinski's amendment failed.

Students Advocating Valid Education was allocated $489 for a speaker and $14 for new member recruitment.

Students for the Right to Life was allocated $719 for a speaker and $14 for a membership drive.

The National Organization for Women applied for funding for a speaker in fall 1995, but the speaker was not scheduled until February 1996.

The bill was sent back to committee because the speaker would be in the next allocations period and should be considered with next fall's allocations.

everyone," she said.

Swimmers of all ages can enroll in courses that teach swimming lessons, lifeguard training and water aerobics.

"Quite often, parents swim laps or do aerobics while their children take swimming lessons. This gives them some time for themselves," she said.

In addition to enrolling in classes, students and faculty can also teach courses at UFM.

"Anyone can also teach," Teener said.

More than half of the program's instructors are K-State students and faculty.

Robert Wilson, graduate student in regional and community planning, taught a course called "Shopping for a Greener World" twice as an undergraduate.

"The class dealt with how consumers can make environmentally friendly choices at the supermarket," he said. "It was an opportunity for me to share with others what I have learned in my marketing classes and my involvement with campus environmental groups."

Teener said she has been teaching classes at UFM since 1971.

"I teach for my own recreation," she said. "I enjoy it because it is a way for me to find other people in the community with my interest in music."

The connections that have developed in classes between people with similar interests have led UFM to become involved in other concerns and projects in the community.

"UFM has become a facilitator for creating discussion groups of community issues," Teener said. "As a result, we have been responsible for creating over 19 different programs in the Manhattan community."

Examples of the program's efforts include the FONE Crisis Center, a hotline for rape victims; the Crisis Shelter, a shelter for victims of domestic violence; and the Share Center, a center that distributes clothing and household items to needy families in the community.

"The catalog is what keeps our doors open, but our impact goes far beyond what we publish each semester," Teener said.

"Through basic grass-roots development, we help make connections, which bring University and community resources together."

21-year-old has 16 shots, 7 beers

Peters said he did not think his roommate was holding out too well.

"I think he's going down from here on," Peters said.

Each time Hamilton put his glass down, beer began to splash on the table.

At 10:30 p.m., Hamilton was bought another shot of buffalo piss.

"Is that that damned tabasco again?" Hamilton said.

Hamilton refused to take the shot and said he was going to the bathroom.

"Did you puke?" someone said when he returned.

"I didn't," Hamilton said. "I'm sorry."

At 10:40 p.m., Hamilton returned to the table and did the buffalo piss shot.

After doing the shot, Hamilton signed his name on the piece of paper and put his social security number down next to it.

"Why'd you do that?" Payne said.

At first, Hamilton did not directly answer the question.

"Tomorrow, I will make it to my 2:05 class," he said. "That's the only class I have where I have to make it."

Payne questioned Hamilton again about writing down his social security number.

"Because in that class you have to give your social security number," he said.

At 10:45 p.m., the group left for Rowdy Trouty's.

Hamilton had problems walking and had to be led by Payne.

"This is sad," one of his friends said.

At Rowdy Trouty's, Mike Troute, co-owner, made Hamilton a shot called a birthday cake. The shot was made of citron, 151 and amaretto.

A plastic basket with limes in the middle was set on fire with 151 and sugar.

Hamilton did the shot, then after encouragement from his friends and Troute, he blew out the flame.

"This was my favorite shot so far this evening," Hamilton said. "It was a happy birthday birthday cake from Trouty's. It tasted like lemons, melons and a little pineapple from Trouty's. It was a great shot. It tasted like fruit."

At 10:55 p.m., the group went to Auntie Mae's Parlor.

"Happy birthday, young man," one of the customers at Auntie Mae's said.

"Oh, is it your birthday?" Hamilton said.

At 11:05 p.m., Hamilton did a pit bull on crack.

After this, several more of Hamilton's friends arrived to help him celebrate his birthday.

At 11:08 p.m., Hamilton was given a Jagermeister shot by one of the new arrivals.

While doing the shot, Hamilton spilled half the liquid on the table.

At 11:11 p.m., Hamilton did an oil slick shot after much encouragement from his friends.

At 11:15 p.m., the group decided to go to Scoreboard.

By this time in the evening, Hamilton's speech was slurred.

"I don't feel like I'm going to puke," Hamilton said. "No, not in the least."

By the time the group reached Scoreboard, Hamilton was having problems standing and sitting up straight.

"I don't want him sitting next to me," Jennifer Frey, junior in graphic design, said. "He's going to yak."

By this time, when Hamilton was asked how he was feeling, he didn't even respond.

He just moved his head from left to right.

"Hey Kent, we can do this intravenously, too," Art Williams, senior in psychology and economics, said.

Everyone laughed.

A few people smoked cigarettes.

Hamilton was the main attraction and the only intoxicated person in the group.

Hamilton began slowly crawling on the ground, and the consensus of the group was that it was time to take him home.

At 11:30 p.m., the group arrived back at the Phi Delt house — two hours and 40 minutes after Hamilton's first shot.

Hamilton was carried by three of his friends into the women's restroom because it was the closest to the door.

A sleeping bag was placed on the couch for Hamilton to sleep on with newspaper on the floor around it. Payne was handed a trash can to place by the couch.

"Is this one big enough?" Payne said.

Hamilton was placed on the couch. A small group of people stood around watching him.

A few people ate hamburgers.

Hamilton began to snore.

During the course of the evening, he'd had 16 shots and seven beers.

"After this," Jay Szymanski, senior in psychology, said, "he can never run for president. Tonight pretty much ruins every chance for him to have a political career."

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

By 11:30 p.m., Hamilton had passed out and found a bed on the couch of the Phi Delta Theta house. His girlfriend, Brandy Payne, junior in elementary education, volunteered to watch over Hamilton to make sure he made it through the night.

Negotiate car's price before talking trade-in manufacturer's suggested retail price down when negotiating the price of the vehicle.

It is also important to keep any discussion about trade-ins or financing separate from the discussion of how much the car is going to cost. These discussions should be done only after a firm quote is in place.

Dealers often tack on fees to the end of a sale that they may or may not have told you about when you first started negotiating. An advertising fee for local and national advertising usually is not negotiable, but Consumer Report srecommends asking for proof of the advertising fee.

A conveyance or documentation fee may also be required for processing paperwork. This usually isn't negotiable either. A dealer may recommend extended service and dealer-applied rust-proofing, fabric protection and paint sealant. Weber said these are not worth the money.

Finally, after you have received a firm quote on the car you're buying, start talking about trade-ins and financing.

Weber said it is usually more profitable to sell a used car on your own rather than trading it in. But he said selling your own car can be a hassle, and trading it in may be more convenient.

▶ STUDENT SENATE

Phone line may shift its mission

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Student Senate moved to consider a resolution changing the mission statement for the K-State Information Center Friday morning.

Student Activities and Social Services Committee chairman Aaron Otto presented the resolution and asked it to be considered before the information center's budget, which was on the list of allocations to be looked at on Tuesday.

The new mission statement changes the focus to an educational and institutional information service instead of a general information line.

If the resolution is passed, the center would withdraw its budget from the allocations process, Otto said.

"Donna Ekart, student director of the center, said if they don't get funded $8,000, then it's not worth funding them," Otto said.

In a letter submitted to Senate, the administrative director of the information center agreed to restructure the information center and model it after academic resource centers at other universities.

The information center would stop providing phone-number information. It would concentrate more on providing University information and research information such as government information, statistics and trivia facts.

FUSION

Performance provides history of African American music

AMY ZIEGLER
Collegian

It was a cultural celebration.

An African flag was waved through the air. Bongos set the rhythm, and dancers traced the history of African American music from the slave era to modern rap.

Fusion, a production hosted by Arrested Development, blended the beat of a tribal drum, the power of tribal dancers and the drama of storytelling into an entertaining and educational performance Friday night at McCain Auditorium.

For a $2 admission cost, a crowd of about 350 people witnessed everything from a slide show to a limbo contest.

Annie Gilliam, adviser of the Union Program Council multicultural committee, said she was pleased with Fusion but wished more people would have attended.

"It was a good show and had a good message," Gilliam said. "It was a real history lesson."

Fusion, a production created to educate college students about the history of African American music, was powerful at times, but a few glitches hindered the overall success of the show.

The audience had to wait outside in the McCain lobby for a half-hour because the performers' flight was delayed, and the stage wasn't ready at show time.

When the crowd finally settled in their seats and the lights went out, a slide presentation about African history and a documentary about Arrested Development flashed up on the screen.

It was interesting, but after about 10 minutes, I was ready to see what I came for, which was Ajile Axam, the director and choreographer for Fusion, performing live on stage.

When she swirled out on stage with an African flag, the production started rolling.

Axam has been dancing since she was 4 years old, and her experience with the art form and her love for performing shone through in every move.

Although the other dancers had powerful stage presence, Axam was the backbone of the production.

She could not only dance; she could also captivate the audience with her voice and her intensity as a storyteller.

The other performers, six dancers from Axam's Atlanta-based company and two tribal drummers, also added to the power of the production with their professionalism and uplifting message.

Stacy Yeager, freshman in computer information systems, said African American music is sometimes viewed in a negative light, but Fusion sent a positive message.

"I feel they can be there to represent who we are and what we represent," Yeager said. "We need more people to bring up the music industry."

Yeager said she attended Fusion to learn more about her cultural heritage as an African American.

"Since it's Black History Month, I decided to come out and get cultured," Yeager said. "UPC brought it out, and I came to show support for them and for my people."

SUBWAY

K-State Union ready for new sandwich shop

MIKE MARLETT
Collegian

Subway will spring to life this morning in the K-State Union.

The sub shop will be open from 9 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. Monday through Saturday and from noon to 10:30 p.m. Sunday.

Employees were preparing food, putting up cabinets and installing microwaves Sunday night to get ready for today.

Scott McCobb, manager of the restaurant, said he expects the turnout to be pretty good, 500 or more customers a day — double the number for the Subway in Manhattan Town Center.

Linda Huffman, regional manager, said the management really does not know what to expect. She said this is the first Subway that the owners of the chain have had on a college campus.

"We don't have anything to go by," she said.

McCobb said the stand Subway set up in Trotter Hall did better than expected.

"We doubled what we expected to do," he said.

The restaurant will open with promotions ready to go.

McCobb said coupons for free bowling will be given to the first 1,000 customers. He said he expects the coupons to be gone on Wednesday.

Fighting racism through the church

Minister relives racist treatment, works for equality

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

The Rev. Don Fallon has seen racism in many different forms in many different places.

Fallon, coordinator of religious services, said he became acquainted with the issues of racism when he was an Air Force chaplain in Orlando, Fla., from 1952 to 1954.

Fallon said the military base was integrated, but the community of Orlando did not allow black personnel to walk on one side of the street, to use certain bathrooms and water fountains, or to enter certain restaurants.

As a result of this discrimination, his main function on the base was to counsel military personnel, Fallon said.

"We actually had people who were brutalized and tarred and feathered if a black person was dating a white person," he said.

Fallon also said he couldn't even escape racism when he arrived home after work.

"My landlady ordered me not to bring minority people — blacks, Jews — into my apartment house," he said. "I tended to defy that, but it was just secretly done."

Fallon said the discrimination he faced helped him to identify with others in the same situation.

"It angered me. I had a real sense of compassion for our military people who were discriminated against," he said.

"I know that discrimination existed in the North, but it wasn't as blatant and open as it had been in the South."

Fallon

Fallon was then transferred to England in 1955 and was stationed there for three years.

Fallon said he married about 10 interracial couples each month while he was chaplain there. This caused tension when these military personnel were sent back to the states.

"These people couldn't be assigned to the South because of the local discrimination and violence in the South," he said.

In the early 1960s, Fallon moved to Topeka and began a Lutheran church.

He was involved with housing issues and the integration of his church during this time.

Fallon said the Topeka Council of Churches, of which he was a member, tried to integrate predominantly white communities.

"We planned an active role to plant minority families in white neighborhoods of Topeka," he said. "We found homes in local communities for black families to move into."

Fallon said they encountered racism while in the process of placing these minority families.

"Several people attempted to buy out homes next to them," Fallon said. "They'd buy the house before we could get the black family in."

Fallon said he again stumbled across racism as a result of trying to integrate his church and because of his support of the black move-ment.

"They stood at the door handing out fliers showing Martin Luther King as a communist," he said.

He also said much of his gathering would not take communion at the same altar because of the stereotypes of the cleanliness of colored people.

"A number came to me and threatened me that if I kept preaching integration, they were going to withdraw their financial support and membership from the church," he said.

Fallon said a positive change did occur while he was at that church in Topeka.

A white family had attempted to buy out a home across the street before a black man could do so, but they were unsuccessful in their attempt.

"The neighborhood boycotted him and just wouldn't talk to him," he said.

In time, the father of the family died of a heart attack, and the black man brought food to the grieving family, Fallon said.

The widow accepted the dish, and they became good friends and attended Fallon's church together.

"It was almost as if the barriers had come down," he said. "I think it helped our congregation to accept black people as people."

Students donate time to repair local homes

ANGIE STUMP

Lucille Mathews' collection of dolls was scattered throughout her house as volunteers repaired her home of 25 years.

"I'm glad it is being done," Mathews said. "But I hate the clutter and the mess."

Mathews' home was in a fury of activity on Saturday as volunteers from the K-State chapter of the Associated General Contractors of America did a large structural repair job.

"We are replacing the flooring and 10 feet of the main beam," Jason Robben, senior in construction science, said.

The construction science students and other volunteers worked in conjunction with Manhattan's Home Owners Maintenance and Energy Program.

"This whole house could be condemned," Sonja Redmon, HOME executive director, said.

"Our goal is to provide our clients with decent, safe and sanitary housing."

HOME is a local, non-profit organization. It has three staff members and is funded by the city of Manhattan, Social Services and private donations.

"We serve mostly women over 60 making less than $8,000 per year," Redmon said.

HOME's employees are Michelle Lynch, program coordinator, Stacy Spina, maintenance supervisor, and Redmon.

Spina is in charge of the repairs and supervises the volunteer labor.

Lynch said it takes a lot of time and money to coordinate a project as big as this one.

"This would cost $1,500 to repair on the open market, and we would never be able to afford it without help," she said.

Steel and Pipe Supply Co. and Hi Plains Mobile Home Parts and Service donated materials to help with the renovation.

"We couldn't do it with out the help of the K-State groups," Lynch said.

Students and volunteers jacked Mathews' house up before repairing the floor.

"Her floor upstairs was sagging due to termite damage," Brad Fields, HOME volunteer, said.

The volunteers jacked the house up to make it steady so the plaster walls would not crack and crumble.

Mathews was not charged any money for the repair job.

"Since I am not working steady, I couldn't afford it otherwise," Mathews said. "I am thankful it is being done. It wouldn't have been fun to fall through the floor."

The HOME program gets about 350 calls a year from people wanting help from the program.

"Our goal is to keep these people in their homes and keep the homes up to code as long as they want to live in them," Lynch said. "With the grace of skilled volunteers, we can do it.

"We also try to educate them on how to maintain what we have started for them."

NEWS BRIEFS

▶ OPERATORS CALL FIRE STATION 18 MINUTES AWAY; 3 DIE IN BLAZE

SOUTH DUNNELLON, Fla. (AP) — Three children died in a house fire Saturday, as neighbors who battled the blaze with garden hoses wondered why firefighters were called from nearly four miles away instead of a closer station.

Three brothers, 7, 5 and 3, died after being trapped in the one-story, wood-frame home. Their bodies were found inches away from windows of the house, which had no smoke detectors.

The boys' 15-year-old brother suffered second-degree burns trying to rescue them. He was hospitalized in fair condition Saturday.

The children's mother, Doris Townsend, and her boyfriend were in the house but escaped.

Emergency operators called firefighters from a station about four miles away from the house even though there was another station in a different county about a half-mile away.

It took the firefighters from Citrus County 18 minutes to reach the house, said Randy Robinson, fire chief of the closer station.

Robinson said his fire department — the third one called — got to the scene in two minutes. The second fire department called was seven miles away, officials said.

"We buy our food, we go to the bank, we spend our money in (Marion County). Why can't they come over here to help?" asked Carlton Lorenzo Washington, a friend of the victims' family.

The County Sheriff's department said the 911 system attempts to use the closest fire station in the county in which the fire breaks out.

▶ NAACP OUSTS OLD, ELECTS NEW LEADER

NEW YORK (AP) — The NAACP replaced veteran chairman William Gibson with Myrlie Evers-Williams, the widow of slain civil-rights leader Medgar Evers, on Saturday after agitated rank-and-file members declared no confidence in Gibson's leadership.

Gibson was defeated on a 30-29 vote less than two hours after the board of directors went into a closed session, said a person who was in the meeting and slipped out to tell reporters. The vote came about three hours earlier than had been anticipated.

About 300 rank-and-file NAACP members sat in on the session and refused to leave the room when Gibson attempted to restrict the gathering to board members.

▶ CLINTON CONVOY DELAYS PARAMEDICS

BANNING, Calif. (AP) — Paramedics rushing to an elderly heart-attack victim were delayed because a freeway was closed for President Clinton's motorcade, officials said Saturday. The woman later died.

California Highway Patrol officers prevented the ambulance from getting onto an interstate highway Tuesday while Clinton was on his way to the Bob Hope Classic golf tournament.

Doctors couldn't say whether the delay cost 73-year-old Frances Jantzon her life.

At a news conference Saturday, officials from the highway patrol, the Secret Service and the Careline California Ambulance Co. said the motorcade caused a delay of less than two minutes.

▶ SCIENTISTS PREDICT THE EXTINCTION OF HALF OF WORLD LANGUAGES

ATLANTA (AP) — The world's 6,000 languages are dying off quickly, and up to half of them will probably become extinct during the next century, experts predicted Saturday.

"I call this a catastrophe — the rate of loss of mankind's linguistic diversity," Michael Krauss of the University of Alaska said.

While once languages were suppressed by government policy, the forces conspiring against native tongues now seem to be largely electronic.

Satellite television, cellular telephones and the Internet all let people speak to each other instantly all over the world, and all drive the need for languages that many understand.

In most cases, that language is English. Even defenders of dying languages concede this is not necessarily a bad thing, since a common language clearly allows people to communicate easily.

For instance, scientists the world over often speak to each other in English, whether their labs are in France or Taiwan.

However, linguists attending a conference Saturday of the American Association for the Advancement of Science urged the preservation of small languages as second or even third languages, rather than allowing them to be swallowed up by English, Arabic, Spanish and other major languages.

"We should care about this," Krauss said. "The world will be less interesting, less beautiful."

Black Student Union teams with UPC to produce fashion show

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

Union Program Council Multicultural Committee and the Black Student Union teamed up to produce the first Ebony Fashion Revue in hope of bringing more opportunities to smaller groups on campus.

"This is the first step in bridging the gap between UPC and multicultural groups on campus," Annie Gilliam, UPC adviser, said.

The fashion revue consisted of four categories of clothing: casual, evening, African and formal wear.

Students modeling the clothes wore clothes that were donated by Lerner New York, Pier 1 Imports, Fashion Bug, Merry-Go-Round, J W Men's Apparel, The Limited or Lowman's Men's Store.

Others chose clothes from their own wardrobes.

"We made our own decisions on what we wore, so it expresses our personalities," said Tamara Morrow, model and sophomore in electrical engineering.

One of the ways the history of African American people was highlighted was by the collection of African clothes.

The clothes were borrowed from Roseline International Enterprise in Wichita.

"The fabric is shipped in from Nigeria, and the patterns in the cloth have special meanings," Joseph Oninjala, owner of Roseline International Enterprises, said.

The wearing of cloth from native African gives African Americans a connection with the culture.

It is also a symbol of identity, Oninjala said.

The African fashions displayed vibrant colors in styles of traditional African dress, as well as using the fabric in more western-style fashions.

The models for the fashion show put much time into making the production go off as smoothly as it did, CeCe Ridder, UPC adviser, said.

"The models gave up about two to three hours every Saturday for two months to make all this possible," she said.

The models were randomly chosen.

Some were members of BSU, and others were African American students at K-State not involved with BSU.

"They just came and asked me, and I figured it was quite an honor," Terrence Brotherton, model and sophomore in life sciences, said.

"This is the first time, and we are setting the trend."

Juanita McGowan, assistant professor in social work, was the master of ceremonies.

"The show defined the completeness of the African people. All aspects were shown — the creativity, the rhythm. It reflected the culture and who we are," McGowan said.

"It was a joy for me to work with the fashion revue. They were really prepared. All I had to do was read the cards and enjoy the evening."

Shelia Muhwezi, student coordinator and member of BSU, said she was surprised by the turnout to the fashion revue.

"It went beyond perfect," Muhwezi, freshman in psychology, said.

Gilliam said the goal of UPC for the year was to make more events like the fashion revue possible.

"We'd like to see all multicultural groups use UPC," she said.

By offering the opportunity to produce events such as the fashion revue, UPC hopes to attract more sub-populations to help keep those group's events on campus, Gilliam said.

Proceeds from the fashion revue went toward both UPC and BSU.

"The fundraiser is going to be used to promote more events like this one," Ridder said for UPC.

BSU is going to use the money they raised to help finance its trip to the Big Eight Conference Thursday through Saturday in Oklahoma.

Animal science contest opportunity for learning

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

Forty-five teams, four groups of animals and three nights were added together to equal one large learning experience.

The Animal Science Academic Quadrathlon concluded Thursday night in Weber and Call halls.

The contest consisted of four divisions, including a laboratory practical, a written exam, an oral presentation and a quiz bowl.

"It's an excellent learning experience. It allows them to get experience outside of their respective fields. If they are from a beef background, they will learn dairy and swine, etc.," John Arthington, graduate student in animal science, said.

The winning team will be representing K-State at the Midwest competition April 9-12 in Des Moines, Iowa. The team will compete with about 15 other teams.

K-State will be represented by Grant Grinstead, junior in animal science; Jason Sutterby, junior in animal science; Warren Forbes, junior in animal science; and Ron Weathers, senior in animal science and business administration.

"We'll try to represent K-State and the animal science department the best we can," Weathers said.

The 45 teams, each consisting of four members, was a record number of participants. That was a growth from only 25 teams last year, Ernie Minton, associate professor of animal science, said.

Arthington suggests the growth may be from the filter-down effect.

"I heard it was fun, and we get one hour of credit," Marti Valek, junior in animal science, said.

Students could sign up as teams or enter themselves as singles and be placed on a team of four. Although the majority of the contestants were animal science majors, the competition was open to anyone.

Valek met three new people who she had only seen in her classes. It was neat to meet people she hadn't known before, Valek said.

Learning was part of the process as well.

"It never hurts to know more. There is so much specialization now, but it never hurts to know more," Jon Bergstrom, graduate student in swine nutrition, said.

The written test questions were pulled from a file of questions that were representative of the curriculum taught here.

"We tested them over the things we would have expected them to have learned," Minton said.

The laboratory practical involved a variety of applications to the animal science industry. Topics ranged from identifying feeds to judging wool and identifying poultry cuts.

In the oral presentation, teams were given an hour to research one of four topics drawn. The teams then made presentations before judges for a minimum of eight minutes. The judges then asked questions about the presentation.

The final step was the quiz-bowl competition featuring single-elimination rounds. The teams were asked 40 questions or for 20 minutes, whichever came first.

"We've all accumulated information from the good instructors we've had," Sutterby said.

"It's an excellent learning experience. It allows them to get experience outside of their respective fields."

Raising meter prices a costly mistake

The council hasn't created a solution to the problem, only added to the confusion and dislike for Parking Services.

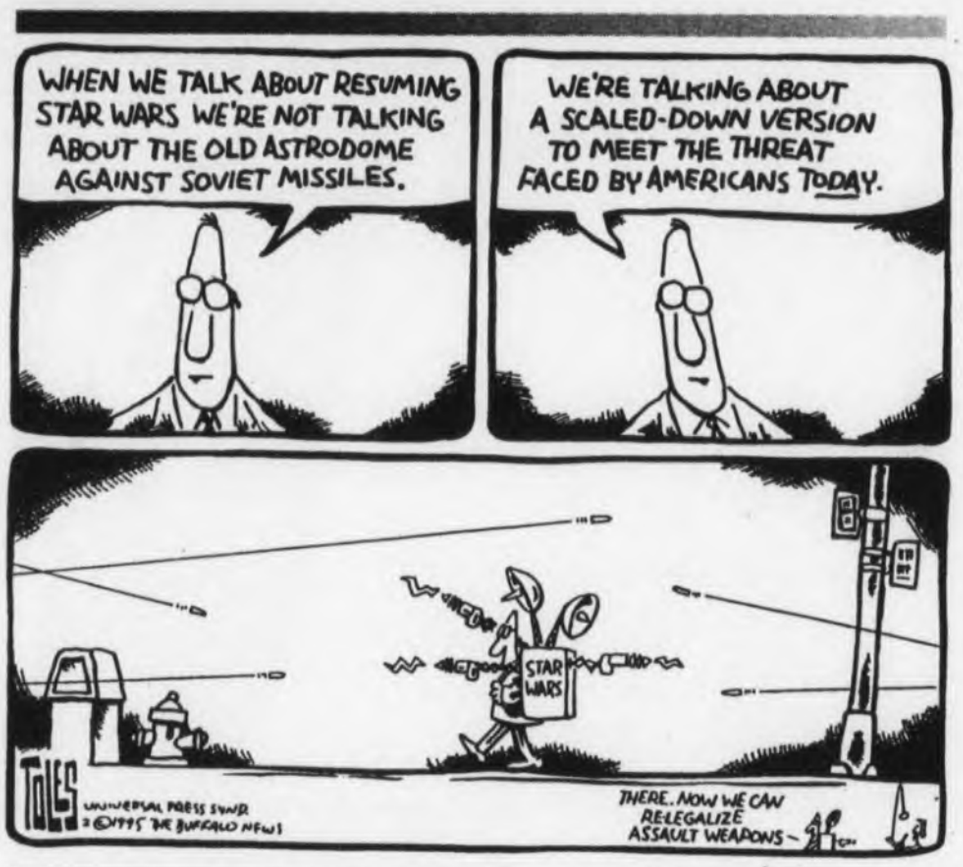
K-State students are getting the short end of the stick — again.

The Parking Services Council voted to triple the price to park in the metered lot in front of the Union.

Beginning in July, students will now have to pay 75 cents an hour just to park at the Union.

The council said it raised fees because parking is inexpensive, and they hoped the increase would discourage people from parking in the lot for extended periods of time.

The council hasn't created a solution to the problem, only added to the confusion and dislike for Parking Services.



The parking council fails to realize this action will not discourage people from parking in the lot as long as they want. It will only create more complaints about the system.

The council should reconsider the lot increase and consider all options, including listening to students' ideas before planning a solution that affects students.

The Parking Services Council is planning an open forum in two weeks to explain the issue and hear student opinions on the subject.

Students need to help Parking Services by attending the forum and expressing their views, alternative ideas and suggestions.

Homosexuals possess same natural feelings, desires as heterosexuals

KEVYN JACOBS

Did I choose to be gay?

This seems like such a silly question to me.

Do you REALLY think I CHOSE to be part of a persecuted minority?

Do you think I LIKE being threatened, assaulted, taunted, beaten and fired from my job?

Why on earth would someone choose to go through what I go through as a gay man?

Most gay men, myself included, would say that we did not choose to be as we are — that we were "born this way."

Those who insist that I chose to be gay usually are the ones who believe homosexual acts are themselves sinful or immoral.

And since one must have a choice to commit a sin, then I must choose to be homosexual.

These people usually (but not always) fail to see a distinction between homosexual orientation and homosexual acts — they believe that homosexuality is a behavior, not a state of being.

They are so focused on the sex, they ignore the love. They are so worried about what I and my boyfriend do in the privacy of our bedroom that they forget about what we do in our everyday lives.

As for homosexual acts, I can say with 100-percent certainty that I do choose to participate in homosexual acts.

There is no doubt about this in my mind — I choose to kiss my boyfriend good night, I choose to put my arm around him when we sit together in the movie theater.

And yes, I will not lie to you, I am not a virgin with men. I have, on occasion, had sex with men. And I did choose to do that.

It's clear that I do have choices when it comes to sex.

I can choose to be promiscuous, or I can choose to be monogamous with one man, or I can choose not to have sex with my boyfriend until we get married.

Or I can choose to be celibate, as many gay people do. Or I could have chosen to remain a homosexual who is a virgin.

I do not think we should declare homosexual acts to be immoral when they are an integral, natural and non-destructive part of a loving relationship.

Or I could have chosen to have sex with women. But do I choose to be attracted to men? Do I choose to fall in love with men?

This is the question of sexual orientation.

Homosexual orientation is defined as a predominant attraction — physical, emotional, spiritual — to a member of the same gender.

And an orientation cannot be chosen.

My orientation goes to the very core of my being. I am attracted to males. I always have been. I never chose to be attracted this way, but I am nonetheless.

In fact, I was a homosexual virgin for most of my teen years.

I was physically and emotionally attracted to men, and very aware that I was homosexual, but never acted on it.

I was homosexual in orientation only.

It wasn't until my early 20s that I came to realize that homosexual behavior wasn't immoral.

That was when I finally did choose to allow myself to be intimate with another man.

As I stated earlier, I don't believe homosexual acts are immoral — especially if there is a homosexual orientation behind them.

This is in conflict with some schools of thought, I know, but the evidence seems to suggest that homosexual feelings are a natural part of the makeup of some individuals.

Homosexual feelings or a homosexual orientation cannot be immoral, because you cannot control your feelings or orientation.

And while I can choose to be sexually active or not with men, I do not think we should declare homosexual acts to be immoral when they are an integral, natural and non-destructive part of a loving relationship.

A woman once asked me what it is like to be gay.

I asked her if she had ever fallen love with a man, to which she replied, "yes."

I told her that is what it is like to be gay.

You get that giddy, heart-thumping feeling when you see him. Your knees go weak, and you get butterflies in your stomach.

It's part of the pair-bonding tendency that we humans have.

And what about sex?

Well, sex is just an extension of that pair-bonding.

There is a natural human tendency to want to be physically intimate with a person you are in love with.

Frankly, I think it is rather silly to assume that I choose to have those kinds of feelings about men.

Love doesn't allow you to 'choose' who you are going to fall in love with.

It just happens.

Styrofoam not a wise choice

Dear editor,

In response to Kathleen Mastio's Feb. 13 column, I would like to point out a few things I feel are important.

Let me first say that to quote the plastics industry on the benefits of Styrofoam is akin to quoting the tobacco industry on the benefits of smoking.

"If you took the time to read some literature, you might find the groups emphasize the reuse of items."

JASON BROWN
junior in geography

Styrofoam production may use less energy than paperboard production, but what is it made of?

Styrofoam and other plastic products are petroleum-based. Petroleum is a non-renewable resource. Trees, on the other hand, are infinitely renewable if forests are properly managed.

A product is only as recyclable as we make it.

I can take wax-coated milk containers, cardboard pizza boxes and any number of steel/tin cans and aluminum beverage containers to be recycled at Howie's. I cannot, however, bring Styrofoam cups in to be recycled.

Biodegradable Styrofoam is a crock. So are biodegradable trash bags and other plastics.

In fact, if you are planning to throw your paper products in the garbage around here, they are not biodegradable. Everything you throw away in Manhattan is landfilled.

Landfilling prevents aerobic decomposition of organic wastes by compacting garbage tightly and covering it with dirt.

Environmental group agendas are certainly not misleading or harmful. If you took the time to read some literature, you might find the groups emphasize the reuse of items. A prime example of reuse comes in the form of cups.

Instead of using a Styrofoam cup, any environmentalist would suggest you buy a refillable mug.

We can do a lot at K-State to help the environment.

Try to refuse a bag at the bookstore if you don't really need it.

Use the recycling receptacles for newspaper and aluminum that are provided for you.

Buy a Willie mug and use it instead of a Styrofoam cup.

Most importantly, we need to be informed on the benefits and side effects of everything we do. Read some books, or take a class like BIOL 303, Ecology of Environment Problems.

You might find that you have been doing some pretty unsavory things without realizing it.

Jason Brown
junior in geography

ADPi thanks community

Dear editor,

The women of Alpha Delta Pi would like to take the opportunity to thank the community and campus for their support shown in the recent loss of our sister and many people's friend, Heather Stewart.

The flowers and cards were very thoughtful and demonstrated a special kindness that will always be appreciated.

It is difficult to make sense of tragedies such as this, but knowing the campus and community are behind Heather's friends and family has made the healing easier.

Thank you again for your kindness.

Alcohol poisoning too common, can be easily prevented

KATHLEEN MASTIO

During my lifetime, very few things have made such a lasting impression that I can still remember them with flawless clarity.

However, an article in Friday's Collegian reminded me of an event long past.

When I was 10 years old, I stepped forward to see a friend of the family, full of dreams and goals, lying dead in a casket.

His face was bluish-purple and lifeless.

He had drank himself to death.

On his 19th birthday, he went out with friends to a nearby bar to celebrate.

He would down 19 shots during a two-hour period.

His friends took him back to the dorm where he lived and put him to bed.

Later, when he began to vomit, his friends laid him over the side of the bed, not wanting him to aspirate his vomitus.

Someone went in to check on him every few minutes.

They decided it would be best not to take him to the hospital because he was underage.

Besides, they were already doing everything they could to keep him safe.

They had stayed sober so Jay could drink all he wanted.

They would even walk home to prevent an accident.

Hadn't they done everything they were supposed to do?

Jay's friend would go in to check on him one final time that night.

They would find him not breathing and turning blue.

He was dying.

It was too late for his friends to save him.

He would die from alcohol poisoning.

This process causes the collapse of the autonomic nervous system.

I ask you to think about how you would feel standing over the dead body of a friend, knowing you had helped kill him.

His brain stopped telling his body to breathe.

He suffocated to death.

His life ended that night because his friends thought it was cool to help get their friend drunk.

I am sure they don't feel that way now.

I ask you to think about how you would feel standing over the dead body of a friend, knowing you had helped kill him.

Could you sleep at night?

Could you go on with your life as though nothing had happened?

Could you ever drink again?

Could you face his parents and tell them how and why he died?

I am sure living with the guilt would be bad enough, but to see his mother, father, sisters and brothers mourn his death would be awful.

It would be horrid to know that your hand aided in his death, instead of reaching out to prevent it.

Jay's friends thought they had done everything they could to be safe.

This was obviously not the case. Jay died anyway.

Jay's friends knew how to keep him safe, even if he got sick.

They never counted on the unthinkable, the unspeakable or the inconceivable.

So many students have lived through drinking as much or more, but no one thinks twice about dying.

Everyone has heard an infinite amount about drinking and driving, but very few people know drinking too much can just plain kill you.

You don't have to get behind the wheel of a car to be just another statistic.

Jay died a horrible death that night.

For him, it was pain-free, but for his friends it would mark the beginning of their suffering.

His family would suffer from their loss for the rest of their lives.

Every birthday, every holiday and even the anniversary of his death would be constant reminders.

The next time you go out to help a friend get drunk, picture them lying in a casket, blue from alcohol poisoning.

Look at his family crying and mourning his loss.

Ask yourself, is this what I really want to give my friend for his birthday?

Flag a symbol of the South

Dear editor,

In response to Kevyn Jacobs' Feb. 13 column:I thought liberalism was about accepting the way others might view things. I thought political correctness was the intentional avoidance of offending someone. Yet all I read is self-righteousness and altruism.

There you go again, filling up the buses with campus liberals, sending them down to Dixie to tell us how to run our lives. Though I've been most of my life in Kansas, I am a native Southerner and am proud that I am the descendant of slave-holding plantation owners from Strayharn, Miss. I have been offended.

The flag of the Confederacy has nothing to do with slavery or bigotry, but in your prejudice, that is all you see. The Stars and Bars represent a way of life, state's rights, economic freedom and allowing the will of the majority to determine the affairs of a region.It reminds us of Southerners who fought and died for our cause to preserve the true intentions of the Constitution. But I know the real reason that you hate it: It represents the region most opposed to your sexual deviancy. And we don't take well to insults to our heritage.

As ol' Jesse Helms put it, if you come down here, you best bring a bodyguard. As for Hot Line Gifts, they stopped selling the shirts. Economic freedom suppressed.

Joe Cummings
sophomore in business administration

▶ DRINKING

Story was irresponsible

Dear editor,

It looks like the Collegian cranked out another Pulitzer-prize winner in the "Finally 21 Finally legal" article in last Friday's paper.

Nothing less than journalism at its finest, giving readers the play-by-play of Kent Hamilton's birthday bonanza.

"There are some people who aren't so lucky that spend this same night in the hospital or even in the morgue."

JOHN LYLE
senior in veterinary medicine

I was inspired by the compassion of his girlfriend. Going out of her way to wear a "nasty shirt" just in case he "puked" — how romantic.

Then volunteering "to watch over Hamilton to make sure he made it through the night." It must be love. I hope they get married.

I was touched deeply by the bond of friendship between Kent and his fellow celebrators. Following the sage advice of his roommate, he embarked on his "rite of passage" with a shot of the "good stuff." Thank God his friends were there to keep the liquor flowing and for having the wisdom to lead him on, even though he could hardly walk.

I can hear the cheers as he raised the 16th shot to his lips. My heart swells. He takes that last shot like a man, and even though he can't remember it, I'm sure he has never felt like a bigger man than at that very moment.

When I finished the article, I really couldn't believe it. So much for responsible journalism. Maybe the title of the article should have been "Idiot Drinks 16 Shots and 7 Beers in Two Hours and Forty Minutes and Lives" or "Half-Brained Phi Delt Kills Other Half in Night of Drunken Debauchery." Sarcasm aside, this kid is lucky to be alive. There are people who aren't so lucky, who spend this same night in the hospital or even in the morgue. I know one of those people.

Sure, his friends were by his side all night; obviously they had his best interests in mind when they carried him from bar to bar pouring on the alcohol and cheering as he drank his way into the back of a hearse. How do you explain to someone's parents,"Yeah, we poisoned your son. It was fun. We cheered when he took that last drink. Sorry."

The Collegian represents the students, and if this is representative of our student body, it is no wonder that the university east of Manhattan on I-70 thinks we are a bunch of clods.

Alcohol could lead to death

Dear editor,

After reading Friday's Collegian, I have finally realized just how ignorant many people are. I am referring to the article "Finally 21 Finally legal." In case the reporters, Mr. Hamilton and his group of friends aren't aware of the fact, there are many cases of alcohol poisoning and alcohol-related deaths reported in this country every day.

Although the article began with an editor's note stating that the article was not meant to promote alcoholism but merely to show how one person celebrated his 21st birthday, I seriously doubt you would print an article about someone having a birthday party at the K-State Union bowling alley where alcohol is not served.

Just recently, the Manhattan Mercury printed an article about several teenagers in Manhattan who were found passed out on the ground. Two of the three youths had stopped breathing, and all were rushed to a local hospital.They could have died if not for a concerned citizen who found them. I don't think alcohol abuse is a laughing matter, and for you to print such an article shows just how ignorant the Collegian and its reporters can be.What would his friends have done if Mr. Hamilton had stopped breathing, choked on his own "yak," or his pulse quit? Was anyone checking his breathing and heart rate while he was passed out? I seriously doubt it.There have been many cases of people choking to death on their own vomit. Simply placing some newspapers and a trash can by him wasn't going to help if he was so drunk he vomited in his sleep. I hope Mr. Hamilton's parents don't get a hold of the article and find out what their son is learning in college.

Why not try to be more responsible and report on real news — or is news so slow that you have to sink to this level of journalism? I guess since it's too cold out to have streakers on campus and everyone is tired of the O.J. case, you had to find something to fill up all that space — complete with photos.

Hell, while you're at it, why not promote drugs, unprotected sex and child abuse? After all, they also can cause death.If I sound angry and bitter it's because I am. A friend of mine died of alcohol poisoning on his birthday by doing the same thing as Mr. Hamilton. I hope Mr. Hamilton's parents never have to close a casket lid on their child because that child died of ignorance and "just plain fun."

▶ PARKING

Construction too costly

Dear editor,

I am writing about the parking proposal. There are several reasons as to why this should not occur, the least of which is the cost of all the new construction taking place.

"And by creating a shuttle service, Bramlage could be used to handle any overflow parking."

KURT R. SIVILICH
senior in architecture

First of all, in talking with my professors in the College of Architecture, it has come to my attention that the ground in which the stadium is placed is not completely stable and is only capable of supporting the existing structure (and even then just barely).

Putting an additional structure on that parcel of ground would not be cost-effective as it would take additional structural supports to keep the building from settling over the years and having to repave and level the entrance.

Second, the stadium, even though it is not used for football games any longer, is still used by the band, rugby and lacrosse teams for practice, as well as by joggers and people who wish to use the track.

The parking garage would be removing this space, chasing those people elsewhere. In addition, the stadium is a memorial, and the garage going there would deface it, committing a reprehensible act of blasphemy.

With all that out of the way, let's talk logistics. First of all, the University is tearing up a usable green area to put in a parking structure. Then it intends to tear up a parking lot to create a usable green space.

Following this warped logic for a moment, the cost would not only include the parking garage but would also include the cost of tearing out and disposing of the paving as well as the cost of the topsoil and grass seed for the new green space to be created.

All this nonsense could be avoided if they built the parking garage on the old parking lot, which would leave the stadium alone and keep an already accepted green area.

If this is unacceptable to the University, then there are other methods for dealing with the parking situation that would be less costly, such as shuttle service to the outskirt parking lots for those students who detest walking.

And by creating a shuttle service, Bramlage could be used to handle any overflow parking. And if the University absolutely has to have a new parking garage, then put it on top of another parking lot somewhere else or use a green space that isn't used for anything, such as the one in front of the president's house or the one east of Ackert Hall.

Also, there are students and faculty who live within walking distance of the college who drive the two or three blocks to school, cutting off available spaces for the long-distance commuters.

There are other solutions to this problem, solutions that are less costly, less disruptive and less of an affront to the students and professors of this institution of higher learning. I just hope that the administration is willing to listen to those who are in opposition to the existing plan.

▶ MINIMUM WAGE

Inflation's cause incorrect

Dear editor,

Upon reading Jeremy Stephens' column against the minimum-wage increase, I was reminded of the editorial policy of the late Mark Twain, who said, "First get the facts, then distort them." Mr. Stephens does a fine job of adhering to this policy.

His argument against the minimum-wage increase is predicated on the unfounded assumption that the minimum wage has been responsible for rapid inflation, which actually eventually leaves workers worse off than before. He notes that during a control period in the 1970s, the minimum wage increased a total of 47.6 percent, and during the same period, prices increased 53.1 percent. However, during a similar period in the 1980s when the minimum wage was not increased, prices only rose by 19.3 percent. This is his "proof" that minimum wage hikes lead to disastrous economic consequences. What Stephens fails to recognize is that correlation does not equal causation.

The inflation of the 1970s stemmed from several different sources, only one of which was wage-push inflation. A large portion of this inflation can be attributed to the OPEC oil price increases, which took place at the beginning and end of his reference period. Similarly, a high rate of money growth during the decade was also a major contributing factor. If the government had NOT increased the minimum wage to keep pace with inflation, workers would have experienced a halving of their real wage as opposed to the 5.5-percent loss that actually occurred. Government was simply allowing those on the bottom of the economic ladder to keep pace with prices. Stephens is similarly lax in his analysis of the disinflation of the 1980s.

"What Stephens fails to recognize is that correlation does not equal causation."

ALAN GRANT
graduate student in economics

This was NOT, as he suggests, attributable to the lack of minimum-wage hikes. Rather, it was the result of a tight money policy specifically designed TO REDUCE INFLATION. This policy was accompanied by reductions in the real price of energy and a very strong dollar that reduced the price of imports.

I would suggest that Stephens dig a little deeper into the facts before he writes his next column instead of jumping to the conclusion that just because the minimum wage and inflation are both rising at the same time, the minimum wage is causing the inflation.

I would also pose the following question: If you, Mr. Stephens, were an unskilled minimum-wage worker, would you have preferred to work in the 1970s when your real wage fell by 5.5 percent, or in the 1980s when your real wage fell by 19.4 percent?

If you are both rational and honest, you will find the basis for your column invalidated.

Garage a bad plan

Dear editor,

I am just one of many students appalled by the new proposal to build a parking garage inside of Memorial Stadium. Of all the stupid ideas flowing from this University, this may have been the most stupid of the year. Almost every college has students bitching about the supposed parking problems, and this proposal shows how it has been blown out of proportion here. Continuing with this proposal will be a big mistake.

"Careful observation of the stadium reveals that in spite of its age, it still receives much use by different groups of students."

MATT PEACOCK

Careful observation of the stadium reveals that in spite of its age, it still receives much use by different groups of students. Calling the garage "aesthetically correct" is laughable. Does that mean the outer surface of the garage will resemble the stadium's? Will it have that "old stadium" texture? Also, will people be allowed to rappel up and down the sides of the garage? I am glad that I will have graduated from K-State by the time this garage is finished, so I won't have to see that the garage doesn't even rise above the stadium walls. And all at a low price of $12 million. Years from now, when I am a millionaire, I will be sure to donate lots of money to my juco, and none to K-State, because my juco didn't have its head way up its ass.

Troops could use mail

Dear editor,

Hello. My name is Cpl. Brandon Blick. I am in the U.S. Army out of Fort Bragg's 82nd Air Division. My battalion is currently assigned to a six-month tour of duty in Egypt's Sinai desert. We are part of the MFO or Multinational Force and Observers, which insures that the peace Accords of the Egyptian-Isreali War are being met. We began our mission on Jan. 10 and will finish on July 23.

I am a medic for a squad of 10 men. My squad is currently assigned to a lonely and remote outpost. Days here can be long, slow and monotonous. We have no television, no radio, no Sega and no fast food. It's enough to drive you up the wall at times. Several of the men in the squad have written letters such as this one. They sent them to churches, schools and universities, asking what I would like to ask you. Namely, if you could find time, please send me a little mail out here. Don't get me wrong. I'm not losing my mind, and I don't walk around suicidal, but I guess it's getting to me. I guess I should get used to it after all the deployments I have been on but the truth is that I don't. Just a letter saying "Hi, how are you?" would be great. Tell me what's going on back in the U.S. I promise I will answer every letter that I receive. It appears that I have plenty of time to do so. Please print my request in your school paper or do whatever to help me out. Your efforts will be greatly appreciated. Thank you for your attention. Help me please. I'm on a ship of fools in a sea of sand.

Kansas wins 12th in a row in Manhattan, stays a perfect 7-0 in Bramlage Coliseum

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

Sometimes playing hard just isn't good enough.

This statement summed up K-State's 78-67 loss to Kansas Saturday in front of a sold-out crowd in Bramlage Coliseum.

The win extended the Jayhawks' winning streak in Manhattan to 12 games and kept KU undefeated in Bramlage Coliseum.

Kansas 78
K-State 67

Kansas coach Roy Williams, whose team raised its record to 20-3 and 9-2 in the Big Eight, said the Cats played well enough to win, but he wanted KU to keep the streak alive for at least one more year.

"K-State played tough, and they should be commended." he said.

"They had a week off, and they're tired of hearing about the streak, I told my team to just put it off for just one more year."

Despite the Jayhawks' size advantage, K-State freshman Mark Young said K-State entered this game with nothing to lose and everything to gain.

"As a player, you get into the rivalry with everyone else. Everyone is all 'KU this, KU that,' but that's because they're winning. They're a quality team. With all of our history, and this being a sellout, we played with nothing to lose."

Williams said the Cats seemed to play with more energy.

"It was one of those games where I think they were intense and they were motivated," he said.

The loss extended K-State's losing streak to five and dropped its record to 11-12 and 2-9 in the Big Eight.

Kansas led the whole game, but never by more than 13 points. K-State never let the game get out of hand.

"We scrapped and rebounded a little bit," said K-State coach Tom Asbury, who is 0-5 against Kansas in his career.

"We started making shots and got the crowd into it."

Despite being down by as much as 13 points in the first half, the Cats fought back to within five points when Tyrone Davis hit a two-footer to make the score 39-34 Hawks.

KU wasn't through. Sophomore guard Jacque Vaughn drove the length of the floor, dishing off to fellow sophomore guard Jerod Haase for a 22-foot baseline three-pointer with five seconds left.

The three-pointer gave KU a 42-34 lead at the half.

In the second half, the Hawks went on a 9-4 run, which ended on a 12-footer by Stanley Hamilton at the 16:29 mark.

The Cats would keep the game within 10 points until K-State went on a 8-2 run which made the score 59-58 Hawks.

"We could have given up and got blown out. But we fought back like warriors," K-State senior forward Hamilton said.

Williams said when K-State pulled to within one point, he just told his team members to settle down.

"I told them to start playing defense, to take responsibility and to do their job."

Kansas freshman forward Raef LaFrentz said this was the time that KU needed to take care of business.

"I said to myself, 'We're either going to quit here, or we're going to go take care of business and win the game.' We went out there and took care of business," he said.

KU did take care of business, going on a 16-5 run that ended on an eight-footer by Elliot Hatcher with 1:31 left in the game.

Asbury said the Cats couldn't get the shots to fall when they needed them.

"We didn't score. We had the lid off of the basket. We had pretty good shots," Asbury said.

"Give them credit — they're the No. 3 team in the nation, and they beat us."

K-State was led by Hatcher's 18 points and seven rebounds, which was the sixth time he has led the team in scoring and the second time he has led in rebounding.

Davis added 15 points, and Belvis Noland finished with 14.

Jerod Haase led KU with 21 points. Greg Ostertag and Raef LaFrentz chipped in 14.

K-State was out-rebounded by a margin of 44-36 with a big portion of the rebounds coming from Ostertag (11) and LaFrentz (9).

Junior forward George Hill said the Cats are going to keep going and try to improve by season's end.

"We haven't given up," he said.

"We're just trying to get better."

Hamilton said he wants to play in a postseason tournament.

"I would just like to extend my season and keep playing," he said.

"This is my last year."

KU's size caused the Cats problems

TODD STEWART
Collegian

K-State had no match for Kansas' big players Saturday. Kansas beat K-State 78-67 in Bramlage Coliseum.

"They've got really good, big players. Really good, big players will always beat regular, average-sized players," K-State coach Tom Asbury said.

Led by 7-foot-2-inch senior center Greg Ostertag, 6'11" freshman forward Raef LaFrentz and 6'10" sophomore forward Scot Pollard, Kansas' interior size advantage dominated the Cats all day.

The Cats' junior center, George Hill, 6'8", drew the task of guarding Ostertag for most of the game.

"Guarding the Big O is tough," Hill said.

"You've just got to try to keep him off the blocks so he won't have point-blank range."

That is easier said than done.

Ostertag's front court, LaFrentz and Pollard, combined to make 15 of 22 field-goal attempts for 34 points and add 25 rebounds. In the more than 62 minutes the threesome was on the floor, they only committed four turnovers.

"It's tough," Asbury said. "They use their big guys well. They've got all the players."

Where the size really made a difference was on rebounding.

The Cats were out-rebounded for the seventh time this season in conference play, 44-36. Eighteen of the 44 Jayhawk boards came on the offensive end.

The Cats tried to overcome their lack of size against the Jayhawks with quickness.

"We wanted to dribble and penetrate," Asbury said. "If we had any advantage, it was quickness. So we wanted to penetrate."

Despite the double-digit loss, the Cats were positive about their performance against the nationally ranked Jayhawks.

Asbury gave all of the credit to Kansas.

"Give them credit — they're the No. 3 team in the nation, and they beat us."

K-State could get another shot at Kansas at the Big Eight Tournament. Kansas, which controls its own destiny for the No. 1 seed, could likely face the Wildcats in the first round.

If that were to happen, it would be a rematch of last year's first-round game, in which the Jayhawks pounded the Cats 73-52.

But what Saturday's game came down to was, simply, the Jayhawks' ability to do whatever they wanted in the paint.

"We control our own destiny for the Big Eight championship," LaFrentz said.

"We think we controlled our own destiny in this game."

It doesn't get any easier, however, for the Cats.

Cats lose to Oklahoma but rebound to win at OSU

K-State split its weekend road trip, losing to Oklahoma Friday and defeating Oklahoma State Sunday.

The Cats, 14-10 and 6-6 in the Big Eight, maintained their fifth-place ranking with Sunday's win.

Oklahoma 71
K-State 60

Oklahoma coach Burl Plunkett picked up his 1,000th career win Friday night as the Sooners upended K-State 71-60.

K-State 57
O-State 56

The Cats led by as many as six in the first half, containing the inside game of OU. But the Sooners fought back to take a two-point lead into the break.

The second half was all Oklahoma. K-State simply couldn't get its shots to fall.

"We missed a lot of open shots tonight," K-State coach Brian Agler said.

"We didn't execute bad offense. When we watch the film, we'll probably see a lot of good things, just some shots that wouldn't go down."

Oklahoma had no such difficulty, shooting 48.1 percent in the second period.

The Sooners pounded the ball inside on almost every possession, finishing with three post players in double figures.

"They had trouble defending us because of the size difference," Plunkett said.

Agler also said defense was a problem.

"We just didn't hook up defensively in the post," Agler said.

"We did the things we needed to do offensively. We just didn't compete defensively. I was really disappointed in that part of our game."

Senior Shanele Stires led all scorers with 23 points, Freshman Brit Jacobson added 16 for the Cats.

K-State rebounded Sunday, with a 57-56 win, for its first win in Stillwater since 1985.

Though the game was always close, the Wildcats led the entire contest behind 47.7 percent shooting from the field.

The Cats led by seven at the break, extending their lead to nine following a three-pointer from junior Carlene Mitchell with just 7:22 remaining in the game.

But the Cowgirls would go on a 10-2 run over the next five minutes to pull within one point of K-State.

"They made some big plays and made some big shots to get themselves back in the game," Agler said.

"They came at us with all kinds of pressure and just about cost us the game."

Jacobson nailed the game's final field goal, giving K-State a three-point lead with just 45 seconds remaining.

OSU's Stacy Coffey hit two free throws to close the gap to one, but both teams missed their free throws down the stretch, giving the Cats the victory.

"I know they've lost some opportunities at the free-throw line, but we missed some crucial free throws, too," Agler said.

"Neither team really played a pretty ball game, but I can speak from our behalf — I thought we competed really well."

Sophomore Andria Jones led the Cats in scoring, pulling down 14 points for six-of-seven shooting.

Stires added 13, and Mitchell had 11.

K-State's Brit Jacobson and Shanele Stires battle for a rebound with an Oklahoma defender during K-State's 71-60 loss to the Sooners Friday at the Lloyd Noble Center. K-State rebounded Sunday to beat Oklahoma State in Stillwater, 57-56, for the Cats' first win at Gallager-Iba since 1985.

Signed, So-In-Love

Dear So-in-love,
Let me get this straight: You've been dating for two years, you are in love and you are happy and you don't know what to do next?

My advice is that you get a dozen roses, dress up in a tux and ask her to make an honest man of you. Then go have lots of babies and live happily ever after. Write and tell me how it turns out.

Send me your letters.

Show focuses on audience participation

MIKE HILL
Collegian

"Flintstones. Meet the Flintstones. They're the modern stone-age family."

The Flintstones is just one of the many TV theme songs you could sing along to if you went to Cal Spooner's show Friday night at Rowdy Trouty's.

Spooner is from Minneapolis, Minn., and has been doing piano shows for two years.

"I was a guitar player for 16 years, but I've been playing the piano for the last couple," he said.

Spooner's act includes a variety of music from the 1950s and '60s, but the main part of his act are TV themes and off-color parodies.

"I try to not be real dirty about it. I just let the audience's minds take over," Spooner said.

Spooner said he gets his material from all over.

"A lot is traditional to the act, some of it even goes back to the turn of the century," he said.

Spooner said he doesn't plan a show and never knows what he is going to do next.

"I start out with something fairly strong, and then I start to pick on people," he said.

Spooner said he is always looking for a clown in the audience.

"I just give them an opening to stick their head through and then look out," he said.

Spooner said the audience is the whole key to the show.

"The act is not about what I'm saying, it's about what the audience is doing. That's what they remember," he said.

Some songs Spooner did were his TV themes from "The Jeffersons," "Happy Days" and "Cheers." The audience also liked Spooner's song about "Cheers" titled "Cliff the mailman song."

Spooner also did many audience participation songs like "I'm a Little Teapot" with a parody to go with it called "I'm a Little Bimbo," which he made a woman in the audience act out.

Spooner got into the K-State/KU rivalry by singing parodies of the two schools' fight songs and trying to upset the KU fans in the bar.

Chris Turpin, a KU student, said he thought Spooner was great.

"This guy is funnier than hell. He's showing us a great time," Turpin said.

Many of the K-State students in the bar said they liked Spooner's material because it was something different in Aggieville.

"We usually don't come here but we are having a great time with the sing-along," Julie Dreiling, senior in human development and family studies, said.

Niki Hostetler, senior in business, said she liked the material Spooner played.

"It was fun singing along with the TV themes," she said.

Clay Clayton, senior in electrical engineering, said the off-color stuff was the best.

"This stuff is hilarious. The dirtier he gets, the funnier it gets," he said.

Spooner will be playing again on Friday, Feb. 24, at Rowdy Trouty's.

Choir concert to honor mentors

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

Kansas State Choir and the Kansas State Choral will honor their mentors at the annual President's Concert.

The concert will be at 8 tonight in All Faiths Chapel.

This year, the choir members have named people who have motivated them in music. Those individuals will be recognized during the concert, Mollie Massieon, senior in music education, said.

Students were allowed to nominate three people they wished to honor.

Those people were then mailed a letter notifying them of the recognition they would be receiving, Rod Walker, director of choral activities and studies, said.

Almost 200 letters were sent, and the individuals will be honored even if they cannot attend, Walker said.

"We thought it would be a nice thing to do," he said. "A lot of times people don't know they have touched lives."

William Wingfield, instructor in music, said an interesting music selection will be performed at the concert with both light and more serious pieces.

"We have a few pieces that are really simple, and some of it is complex, but all of the music will be entertaining," Nate Hancock, senior in vocal performance, said.

Manhattan High School Chamber Choir will also be performing that evening.

"It's nice to keep in touch with the local high school, and they do well so it's nice to have them," Walker said.

Admission is free to the public, and Hancock encourages people to attend.

"We do work hard to put these concerts on," Hancock said. "We get one chance to perform. It's nice to have people there showing support."

Sawyer Brown gives energetic performance

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

Amidst the smoke and heat of the yellow lights, a sea of 10-gallon hats, gleaming belt buckles and clapping hands emerged.

They came to see what's been called one of the liveliest acts in country, and they were not disappointed. Sawyer Brown gave an energetic and original performance Sunday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

Mark Miller, known for his unusual style of dress, was clad in a blue, tuxedo-like jacket, oh-so-tight jeans, black boots and a grey hat. He immediately stole the show with his gyrating hips, suave moves and comedic interjections.

As the cylinders of green and blue light splashed all over the stage, Miller and the boys played favorites such as "The Walk," "Thank God For You," "Dirt Road" and "Trouble On the Line."

When the echoes of the roaring applause had died down, Miller jokingly told the women in the crowd that he had gotten together backstage with all the men in the audience, and they had chosen him to serenade the ladies with a love song.

As Miller sang "I Don't Believe In Goodbye," several women threw roses on the stage, and screams of all sorts could be heard from the roof of the coliseum down to its roots.

Duncan Cameron, lead guitarist, was Miller's partner in crime as they jumped around the stage, slid on the conveyor belts on either sides of the platform and kicked a huge, red, blue and white beach ball back to the fun-loving audience.

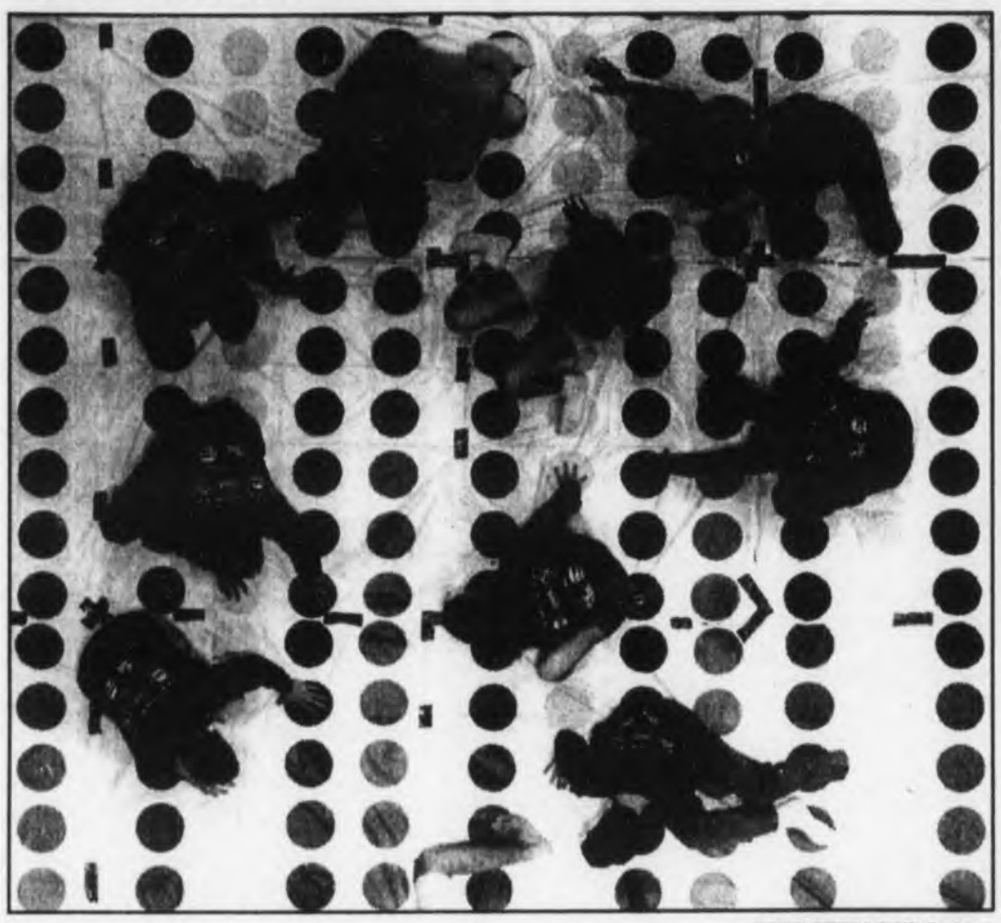
Sawyer Brown knew exactly how to work the crowd, and after the first couple of seconds of the performance, the crowd was theirs. Even the little ones in the audience could be seen waving their hands and mouthing the words to the music.

One of the more powerful moments of the evening occurred when Miller sang the haunting ballad, "All These Years." The audience got quiet, while the darkness was filled with swaying bodies holding up lights.

Sawyer Brown's opening acts were Rick Trevino and Toby Keith.

Trevino elicited quite a bit of energy, but with the anticipation of Sawyer Brown in the air, he wasn't given all of the crowd's attention.

Keith, who at first seemed as though he were confined to an area that didn't extend far from his microphone stand, finally took off his jacket, lost the guitar, showed off his biceps in a sleeveless shirt and started to work the crowd.



Much like Keith's performance, Sawyer Brown's ended in boots pounding on bleachers for an encore. Miller and the boys ran back on stage to give the crowd a final dose of "Some Girls Do."

▶6 PEOPLE KILLED IN INDIA DURING WEEKEND ELECTIONS

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — Kuki rebels hurled explosives and attacked security forces that killed six people during weekend elections in southeastern India's Manipur state, a news agency said.

Two voters and a guerrilla were killed Saturday when two crude bombs exploded outside the state capital Imphal, Press Trust of India said. Another guerrilla was killed in a shootout with Indian security forces Sunday.

The rebels were attempting to disrupt the vote by attacking security forces guarding polling booths, police told PTI.

In another incident, guerrillas ambushed a convoy of security forces in the state. Two civilians were killed and seven soldiers injured in a gun battle, PTI said.

Kukis are fighting the Naga tribe for territory in Manipur that the Nagas claim as part of a hoped-for independent homeland in the eastern Indian hills.

More than 300 civilians have died in the warfare over the past year.

Legislative voting in the state was held Saturday and Sunday. Officials said turnout was 90 percent despite the violence.

▶ SCHOOL BOARD

Candidates discuss religion in schools

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

Almost 200 people, a standing-room-only crowd, attended the Flint Hills Mainstream Coalition school board forum Sunday.

The seven Manhattan-Ogden Unified School District 383 candidates in attendance agreed with each other, for the most part, on all of the six questions the coalition asked in advance.

Three of the 10 candidates — Rick Crow, Colleen Hampton and Kimberly Wells — did not attend, nor did they send answers to the coalition responding to the questions.

Coalition spokeswoman Jami Ramsey told the group all the candidates deserved respect.

"We owe them our respect whether we disagree or agree with their views," she said.

The coalition's questions focused on the issues of sex education beliefs, creation vs. evolution in science classes, school prayer, tolerance for non-traditional households, Quality Performance Accreditation and the school voucher systems.

The local coalition was formed to preserve traditional values of the separation of church and state, First Amendment rights, individual rights, the importance of family, public education, and tolerance and compassion for everyone, Ramsey said.

Candidate Peter Garretson repeatedly said he felt these issues were not the important issues the board would be facing.

Garretson noted the continued agreement of the candidates on the coalition's questions.

"I would vote for each one of them," he said.

Instead, Garretson called for the forum and future forums to address what he called the real issue: budget concerns.

"I think the time for litmus tests have passed," Garretson said.

On sexual education practices, the panel agreed the current system is appropriate.

Several candidates pointed out the importance of sex education outside of school, in home or church settings.

Candidate Michael Pearson said abstinence should be encouraged, but students should also be educated on all aspects because children as young as elementary school hear rumors.

"Kids need to be taught the truth," Pearson said.

The panel, for the most part, agreed in the separation of church and state.

Candidate Larry Weaver said the only place religion should have in schools is in reference to history.

"The state should not sponsor religious-based activities," Weaver said.

Candidate Mary Nichols said today's Supreme Court is one justice away from possible changes on this issue, pointing out that even in this diverse country, majority still rules.

Nichols also said as long there are tests, there will be prayers in school.

The teaching of creation in science classrooms brought about more varied responses.

Garretson said he didn't know how to teach evolution without also making references to creation. He said it is relevant to talk about what other people believe.

Punching the clock at SUNSET ZOO

HEATHER BALLEW
Collegian

Sunset Zoological Park provides K-State students with the opportunity to do everything from checking lions for sore throats to showing hissing cockroaches in a classroom.

To many K-State students, the zoo is an outdoor classroom providing experience in the areas of zoo management internships, zoo docents, veterinary internships and clinical exposures for veterinary medicine students.

"No matter what you're majoring in, there's something here for you at the zoo," said Angie Fenstermacher, director of marketing and development at Sunset Zoo.

The zoo management intern program allows students to work alongside animal keepers, maintenance staff and zoo administrators.

The program requires 700 hours of work during at least a two-year period. String rotations include 224 hours of work. There are four string rotations, or animal areas, at the zoo.

Brian Davoren, junior in life sciences, is a zoo management intern. He said although the internship is 700 hours of no pay, it's definitely worth his time.

"I look at quite a few employment opportunities in newsletters," Davoren said.

Employers look for experience plus a degree, Davoren said.

"I don't get paid for it now. ... but the experience will put me a step ahead when I get out of college," he said.

Zoo management interns are required to work 50 hours on a special project of their choice.

All projects must include education, animal management and research.

For his 50-hour project, Davoren wants to take the existing pool outside of the Children's Zoo where the turtles swim and turn it into an ornamental goldfish pond. He said his proposal is on the table but has not been approved yet.

Davoren said other interns have done everything from helping build exhibits to helping administrators with reports and paperwork.

"It just depends on what you're interested in and what you feel like tackling," Davoren said.

The interns have a required textbook and must have completed Sunset Zoo docent training.

The interns also must be a member of the American Association of Zoological Parks and Aquariums and the American Association of Zoo Keepers.

Fenstermacher said the zoo is working with K-State to develop a program that allows zoo management interns to get credit for their efforts.

Fenstermacher said anyone who is interested in becoming an intern must first go through the docent program.

After the program has been completed, prospective interns must fill out applications and go through an interview process.

Fenstermacher said students of any major can apply for the internship.

She said the zoo has had interns in everything from anthropology to education.

"The majority of zoo internship graduates do end up getting positions at other zoos," Fenstermacher said.

Davoren said in the past decade, at least three or four zoo management interns have obtained upper-management positions in zoos.

Davoren said he has attended one national zoo conference since he started interning. He said the conference helped him to meet people in the business and to make contacts.

Students may become docents, which are volunteer educators, by completing the program at the zoo. Troy Gilmore, education assistant at Sunset Zoo, said approximately 160 of the 190 docents at the zoo are K-State students.

Docent training programs are offered at the beginning of the spring and fall semesters and take 15 weeks to complete, Gilmore said. The class meets one night each week for two hours.

Docents also must be in Friends of Sunset Zoo. Gilmore said the docent course costs $15, and it costs $15 to become a member of Friends of Sunset Zoo.

Zoo docents do everything, Gilmore said. They help with birthday parties at the zoo, conduct zoo tours, give animal programs, conduct pregnancy watches, help in zoo cleanups, take care of the education animals and help conduct behavior studies on different animals.

Trisha Maag, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, has been a docent for a year and a half. This semester, she has been volunteering one to two hours a week.

"We just go out and try to teach people about the animals," she said.

Maag said her favorite thing about being a docent is getting to be close to some of the animals. The zoo docents are completely in charge of taking care of the education animals. Maag said that many people won't ever get the chance to work as closely with animals as she has.

Maag said sometimes the docents get to work with the animals in the zoo nursery. She said she worked with some Binturong cubs last year. Binturongs are related to the mongoose.

Maag said the cubs needed to be fed three times a day, and the docents got to help with the feedings.

People in all sorts of majors are docents, and people don't need to be involved in an animal degree program, Maag said.

"Anyone with an interest in animals can attend the docent program," Maag said.

Once people become a docent, they are required to volunteer 24 hours a year and attend six of the 12 monthly meetings of the docent organization.

Some programs that K-State students are involved in with Sunset Zoo are organized through the College of Veterinary Medicine.

Jim Carpenter, associate professor of clinical sciences and head of the exotic animal department, said that graduate veterinarians can be interns through the college for the zoo.

Or, senior students in the college may take a three-week, clinical-exposure course in which they work with the animals.

The internship program, Carpenter said, is halfway financially supported by Sunset Zoo.

Carpenter said the College of Veterinary Medicine provides all of the medical care for the animals at the zoo.

The interns are usually graduate veterinarians who have extensive experience in zoo animals. These interns, two of whom are chosen every year, are selected by an interview process.

Senior veterinary medicine students are involved at Sunset Zoo through a three-week, off-campus, exotic-animal rotation. Among other things, the students in this rotation help do rounds and preventive care of the animals at the zoo.

The rotation requires the students to spend Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons at the zoo working with the exotic animals.

Carpenter said students get involved in this clinical exposure to get more experience with zoo animals.

"They function as if this were a private practice," Carpenter said.

Cheryl Pfeffer, senior in veterinary medicine from Oklahoma State University, is taking the three-week course this semester.

She said she heard about the course through word of mouth on the Oklahoma State campus.

Pfeffer said the course has been exactly what she was looking for.

"It's fantastic," Pfeffer said. "And it's the best time."

Pfeffer said since the class began, she has seen a red-tailed hawk and some owls.

"We see any sick animal they're concerned about," Pfeffer said.

"I've always had an interest in exotic animals, so I wanted to learn all I could about exotic animals," she said. "It's a deviation from normal cat and dog medicine."

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Fallon remembers the past, has high hope for the future

Fallon came to K-State in 1965.

Only one black professor was teaching classes at the time.

Fallon said the pinnacle of the racial tension on campus and across the nation was in 1969.

He said it was also in 1969 when he became acquainted with two K-State students.

"We had two black kids come to K-State — one from the ghettos of Kansas City and one from Harlem, N.Y.," Fallon said.

"They were members of the Black Panthers."

The Black Panthers, to the contrary of King's passive beliefs, advocated violent revolution against white oppression and white supremacy.

"These young men talked very much about revolution, and it led to such polarizations that they were finally expelled from the residence halls," he said. "I think their being here sensitized us to the real issues."

Fallon took these young men into his home, but the violent talk continued.

"They confronted some Marine recruiters with obscene language, and they talked violence," he said.

Fallon said they were charged with obscene language but were later acquitted of the charges. He testified on their behalf because he didn't think the real issues were being tried.

Fallon always tried to tell the young men that King's methods of non-violence and civil disobedience were the best ways to end racism.

"They thought it was too late for non-violence," he said. "They thought that Martin Luther King's view of non-violence was too late, too soft."

Fallon said these men adopted the views in the book "Black Rage," written by psychiatrists William Grier and Price Cobbs in 1969.

The book stated that black men carried this rage within them because their manhood was taken from them during slavery, Fallon said.

"These young men said they carried the black rage, and they said all black men carried that rage," he said. Fallon said the two men achieved great things after leaving K-State.

"One of these men ended up being an attorney working for youth rights in Harlem," he said. "The other young man, who didn't graduate from K-State, ended up in the ministry."

Fallon said many black students were having difficulty trying to accept themselves during this time.

"I ended up doing a lot of counseling with black students — male and female — who were searching for their identity," he said. "It was always the issue of being black and the acceptance of being created in the image of God."

Fallon said he didn't believe that many people understood what it was like for a black person to come into a Midwestern community as a minority.

"I don't think the University, Manhattan or Kansas, understood the issues of racism and white oppression and the conditions from which these minorities came," he said.

Fallon said he took student groups to the inner cities and to conferences to give them exposure to life in the inner city.

Sit-ins, marches and the conferences they attended were critical to his perception of the movement, Fallon said.

"It gave me a feeling to something very critical of the time — the power of non-violent action and of civil disobedience," he said.

Fallon said with the passing of the Affirmative Action program, he witnessed the recruitment of minority faculty and the development of new classes.

"We began developing black history classes, and students began to say what content would be in those classes," he said.

K-State also developed a committee that produced housing lists for minority students, Fallon said.

"The University established a committee on fair practices in housing," he said. "They would monitor housing in the Manhattan area and list apartments that would not accept minority people."

Fallon said the University also established 10 human-relations teams.

"These 10 teams went around to all living groups, talking about integration and prejudices," he said.

Fallon said he agrees with King's statement of having come a long way but still having a long way to go.

"I have been disappointed that we haven't gotten further down the road," he said. "I must admit that we have come a long way, though. When I think of our inner cities, it's almost as if we've gone backwards."

Fallon said he does have a glimmer of hope for the future, though.

"I do reflect a lot of disappointment, but at the same time, I do see the hope and the growth that's come," Fallon said.

"I certainly see it at the University with the changes we've made."

Future of information center will be academic assistance

Assistance Center, submitted the letter endorsing the change in mission statement and guaranteeing continued funding from the University for the information center.

Lynch said he could not commit to the long-term continuation of the service, but it would be given a chance to improve. If the University started funding the information center, it would have to fight for funding against other University programs.

Lynch said he would withdraw the information center budget from consideration if the resolution is passed Thursday.

"If you vote against this resolution, vote for full funding. If you vote for it, Lynch will pull the budget," Otto said.

The cuts the information center received last year hurt the efficiency of the service, Ekart said.

Ekart told the Social Services Committee the service couldn't live like it did this year. The information center isn't properly staffed, and it has no money to advertise the service, she said.

"Senate made a decision tonight to reform the information center," Otto said.

He said significant, fundamental, structural changes will be made. The changes will affect what the information center will and won't answer, Otto said.

The goal is to make the information center a truly academic resource for students wishing to find out when the last day to drop a class is, when they pay fees, how to appeal an academic ruling or when other lecture times are for a class, he said.

Senate also introduced legislation recommending classes be let out during Landon Lectures.

Senators asked instructors who do not cancel class to offer a set of makeup procedures to the students. Instructors who do not monitor attendance should announce other lecture times so students can make up the notes, senators said.

The resolution will be voted on next week. If it passes, a copy will be sent to President Jon Wefald, Faculty President Dennis Kuhlman and the deans of all the colleges on the main campus.

A second resolution concerning Landon Lecture seating was also given first reading.

Steve Weatherman, business senator, said he thought K-State students, faculty and staff should be given priority seating over the grade-school and high-school students who come to the lectures.

"It's great to have them come," Weatherman said. "Our priority is to us."

Although students do not pay for the Landon Lecturers, Weatherman said he thought there was a reason why they are on campus.

The Privilege Fee Committee presented two bills recommending the continuation of two fees. Both the Union and KSDB-FM 91.9 privilege fees will continue at their present rates if passed next week.

Dealing with family structures in schools discussed

Deb Nuss and Joleen Hill said the place for the discussion of creation should be in humanities classes instead of science classrooms.

The discussion of board members having tolerance for non-traditional families such as single-parent, interracial or homosexual households found the panel in consensus that all people deserve respect.

Nuss said acceptance is a better word than tolerance, and the goal should be not to point out differences, but similarities.

"Children don't think about it as something different until parents point it out," Nuss said.

The panel seemed to agree QPA is a good assessment program that only needs modification.

Phil Morgan said the biggest complaint he has heard is that the paperwork involved with the program takes up teachers' time.

"Our teachers should be teaching and not being taken away for paperwork that may not be necessary," Morgan said in his written response.

School voucher systems could allow a student to go to private school with public money or any public school of their choice.

Hill said she was against the use of public funds for private schools.

Audience invited to dance at show science, said he didn't know what to expect when he bought a ticket for Fusion, but he enjoyed the production.

"It was interesting," Carpenter said. "It basically talked about the contribution of African American art, music and dance to everyday life. It showed that rap was not something that was thought up in the '90s, but came from back in the old days."

To get the audience involved in the cultural experience, the performers invited the audience to join a limbo contest and, at another point in the show, asked them to dance up on stage.

After hesitating for a few seconds, the students started to flock up to the stage to moonwalk, breakdance and slide under the limbo stick.

"I thought that was the highlight of the show," Gilliam said.

"Students really enjoyed getting up on stage and not just sitting back in their seats."

While it was an innovative way to get the crowd immersed in the show, opening the stage to students was also a serious drawback.

The dancers and tribal drummers were strong enough to perform on their own and were the true heart of Fusion.

Other distractions, such as an artificial smoke machine, interrupted the flow of the production as well, but overall, Fusion offered an exceptional look into the African American culture through music and dance.

Harry Marsh, professor of journalism and mass communications, covered a highly publicized murder trial in Mississippi in 1954.

Fighting racism through journalism

Marsh witnesses events in center of civil-rights movement

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

This is the continuation of a series of stories about K-State students and faculty who participated in the beginning of the civil-rights movement of the 1950s and '60s.

More than 40 years have passed since the civil-rights movement, and Harry Marsh, professor of journalism and mass communications, remembers watching and learning from the progress as he took an active role in the spectator's seat.

"I remember the first time I was called a son of a bitch," Marsh said.

The event happened during the summer of 1944 when, as a 16-year-old boy from west Texas, Marsh took a job from a relative in Mississippi to help with entomology research on the plantations.

Marsh said he was raised to have respect for older people, and one morning he said, "Yes, sir" to a black man when asked a question.

"A Mississippi boy turned to me and said, 'You son of a bitch — you called that nigger sir,'" Marsh said.

And that was one of Marsh's earliest impressions of a society sitting on a time bomb.

"There was such an emotional feeling on the part of the whites in Mississippi that their way of life and culture will be destroyed, and yet the black people were so oppressed," Marsh said.

Nearly a decade later, he returned to the fragile delta area of Mississippi to work as a reporter for the Delta Democrat-Times, in the center of the nation's civil-rights movement.

He said when he arrived in 1954 in Greenville, Miss., there were two things that had begun to change the black population.

"The thing that really changed and began to militate the blacks in the South were the automobiles and television," Marsh said.

Each had the ability to expose the masses to different environments, he said.

"Sometimes it seemed to me the only thing holding the old rickety cabins up were a TV antenna on one side and a rusty automobile on the other," he said.

But being exposed to different environments could be deadly in those days, and Marsh watched a nationwide example unfold in the courtroom as he reported the murder of a 14-year-old black boy from Chicago.

The boy, Emmett Till, allegedly whistled at a white woman working in a plantation store. Later that evening, the woman's husband and his half-brother took the boy from his uncle's rural cabin.

The next morning, Till's body was found in the Tallahatchie River with a gin fan tied around his neck.

The five-day trial ended when the all-white male jury found the two men innocent after deliberating for just 20 minutes, Marsh said.

"The trial received wide coverage, including Time and Life, and I was covering the trial, as well as side stories, at the time," he said.

Marsh said he learned during the trial that people always immortalize the leaders of movements, which he said he agrees with, but people tend to forget about the ordinary people.

"American citizens of all kinds have been able to make their will permanent in Department presented money award

KIMBERLY WISHART

ARCO Foundation wrote a check for $22,005 and presented it to K-State's engineering department because of its successful minority program.

Last year, ARCO awarded 22 universities across the nation a total of $473,940 to assist graduate minority students in engineering.

"ARCO rated these institutions highly for the strength of their existing minority student retention programs, the number of minority students actually enrolled and graduating in their engineering programs and the quality of the instructional courses offered," Stephen Giovanisci, ARCO president, said.

K-State uses the money to pay for facilitators, books, guest speakers and photocopying.

These are all components of the Workshop In Student Excellence program, which has been in effect at K-State since 1990. Of the 2,300 students enrolled in engineering, there are 419 women and 140 minority students, Karen Martin, director of minority programs, said.

The program targets minority students of engineering by reducing classroom tensions.

"It's a retention program for traditionally under-represented students and women," Martin said. "They are clustered in the same math and science classes. This reduces tensions they feel in the classroom, and through this collaborative learning, students are getting better grades."

Martin said through permission of the other departments, students set their own schedules so they can work together in groups.

"It gives them some sort of control and belonging. I do require that they study with at least three white colleagues to make sure they are opening up to diversity, also," Martin said. "I have been going to predominantly white schools all my life, and I can see the isolation."

Martin has set up more workshops Monday through Thursday evenings for students to gain additional assistance.

Obey rules to receive education

SARA SMITH
Collegian

If a man said he would pay for all of your college expenses if you stayed off drugs and earned a C average, you'd probably think he was joking.

But Ewing Kauffman wasn't joking.

In 1988, the owner of the Kansas City Royals started a program through the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation called Project CHOICE. The program was designed to give high-school students in Kansas City a chance to go to college if they fulfilled a simple contract.

Manomay Malathip, sophomore in marketing, received a letter in the mail the summer before her freshman year at Wyandotte High School in Kansas City, Kan.

The letter invited her to an informational meeting about Project CHOICE. When Malathip attended the meeting, she said she couldn't believe what she was hearing.

"We just got a letter telling us to come to this meeting. I just went to the meeting, and they handed you a contract," she said.

Malathip said after looking at the contract, the decision to be a part of Project CHOICE was easy.

"The contract was so simple. It was all so cut and dried," she said.

The contracts for Project CHOICE promised that the Kauffman Foundation would pay for the tuition, books, supplies and living expenses of a college education.

All the high-school students had to do was not get pregnant or get someone pregnant, maintain a C average in high school and a 2.0 grade point average in college, and stay drug-free.

To Malathip, it sounded too good to be true. She signed on despite her doubts and is still in the program.

Project CHOICE is the reason Santos Ramirez, sophomore in criminal justice, is at K-State now.

"I'd be at a community college," he said.

Ramirez went to Westport High in Kansas City, Mo. He said he decided to come to K-State because of the quality of the University.

"It was the best school I'd seen," he said.

Council adds position

CARRIE COX

A tie in the Education Council election last week resulted in an extra seat being added to the council.

Nina Moore, Education Council president, said the Education Council elects 15 people every year, but this year an exception was made.

"We had 36 people running for 15 positions and had a tie. So we're letting 16 people serve this year," Moore said.

Elections for the Education Council were Wednesday and Thursday.

Hayley Briel, junior in elementary education and two-year member of Education Council, said she was impressed with the number of people running for positions.

"It's good to see so many people interested. Last year, we didn't

Walk to benefit immobile; volunteers needed in April

STEVEN YOUNG
Collegian

People who can walk will be able to do good April 8 for those who are immobile.

The MS Walk for Multiple Sclerosis will be at 7 a.m. April 8 in 10 eastern Kansas cities, including Manhattan.

Manhattan will have two routes, Renelle Everett, junior in accounting, said. She said one route will be four miles long, and the other will be nine miles. Both will begin at St. Thomas More Catholic Church.

"We encourage people to sign up beforehand so we can anticipate the funds raised and how much food to provide," said Dan Mauer, special events coordinator for the eastern Kansas branch.

The Manhattan walk requires 30 to 50 volunteers, said Janis Smischny, manager of the eastern Kansas branch of the Multiple Sclerosis Society.

Volunteers are needed in areas such as registration, food service, support vehicles and entertainment.

Multiple Sclerosis is a disease of the central nervous system. Because of MS, the body's defense mechanism attacks the body.

Fatty tissue around the nerves of the spinal cord and brain is scarred. When this happens, impulses from the brain are short-circuited.

Symptoms of MS may include weakness, uneven balance, fatigue and in severe cases, paralysis.

Nationally, 250,000 people have MS, Smischny said. Almost 3,800 people are Student killed in traffic accident

KIMBERLY HEFLING

A K-State student was killed when a concrete-mixer truck rolled over onto his pickup Monday afternoon.

Eric Martin, senior in engineering, died at 3:30 p.m. at the intersection of 11th and Yuma streets.

At the time of the accident, Martin was traveling southbound on 11th Street and was hit by a concrete-mixer truck. The concrete truck was westbound on Yuma Street turning right onto 11th Street, said Kansas Highway Patrol Trooper Wes Wheeler.

"As the vehicle made the turn, the load shifted, and the concrete truck rolled over on its left side on top of the pickup," Wheeler said.

Eric Martin was pronounced dead at the scene of the accident, he said.

Brett Martin, Eric Martin's 2-year-old son, was also riding in the pickup.

"Brett was transported to Saint Mary Hospital, then treated and released," Wheeler said.

The driver of the concrete truck was Sean McAdams. The truck was owned by Kershaw Ready-Mix Concrete & Sand Co. Inc.

A two-car accident involving a concrete mixer and a pickup truck claimed the life of Eric Martin, senior in engineering, Monday afternoon at the intersection of 11th and Yuma streets.

▶ SGA CREATES NEW COMMITTEE TO RESEARCH STUDENTS' NEEDS

Because no concrete goals could be established at the fall Student Governing Association retreat, a new committee for Student Senate was created.

The Long-term Development Programming Committee was established on Dec. 8 to examine SGA and groups that rely on it so student government can better serve the needs of the ever-changing student body.

"I think the SGA is moving away from the students," Matt Soldner, committee chair, said. "A standing committee might be the best way to address our changing needs."

The SGA needs to be more efficient and include more students on SGA, he said.

"We want the students to know the SGA is there for them. We want the students to feel proud of their SGA office," Soldner said.

Twelve people make up the standing committee. Soldner said SGA plans to get more people involved as the year progresses.

The first project for the newly formed committee is to interview and send questionnaires to groups of students, asking them questions about different SGA issues.

"There are a lot of things that need to be fixed in the SGA office. I think this committee will be very helpful to the SGA," Soldner said.

The special committee will also be researching the other SGA offices in the Big Twelve.

▶ AUTOMOBILE BILL MAY LOWER TAXES

TOPEKA (AP) — The House Taxation Committee started work on a bill Monday that would reduce motor-vehicle taxes by 50 percent over a 10-year period.

However, John Schmid, a Coffeyville car dealer, said lawmakers should also look at making car taxes more uniform across the state. He also said Kansans who drive older cars should pay more than the present $12 minimum, and those who drive new cars should pay less.

The tax would be lowered by gradually reducing the assessed valuation rate on cars, trucks and vans from 30 to 15 percent.

Under the present system, a taxing district's mill levy is applied to the assessed value of the vehicle.

▶ TERM LIMITS PASS WITH EXCEPTIONS

TOPEKA (AP) — A proposal to limit senators and House members to 12 years of service in each chamber squeaked by a House committee Monday, after members added an exception to the term limits.

Rep. Rochelle Chronister, R-Neodesha, proposed a successful amendment allowing any 12-year incumbent to run for another term if he or she can obtain signatures from 20 percent of a district's voters.

Under the proposal, senators would be limited to three four-year terms, and House members would be limited to six two-year terms. Twelve-year incumbents with the appropriate number of signatures would be granted a waiver for only one more term.

▶ BILL WOULD STRENGTHEN OPEN MEETINGS ACT; FINAL VOTE TODAY

TOPEKA (AP) — Monday, the House tentatively passed on a voice vote a bill designed to strengthen the Kansas Open Meetings Act.

Two amendments failed. They would have exempted advisory boards from holding public meetings and allowed public boards and commissions to have closed sessions on nominations for volunteer boards.

The bill would order the courts to construe the Open Meetings Act liberally.

It also specifically states that public officials can meet socially without notifying the public, something that is current law.

Rep. Gwen Welshimer, D-Wichita, said she opposed the bill because it exempted public notification of administrative meetings during a disaster or emergency situation, such as a tornado.

Many members of news organizations opposed that provision of the bill during committee meetings, which prompted Welshimer's opposition.

The House plans to take a final vote on the issue today.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Rep. Phil Kline, R-Overland Park, speaks to students, faculty and staff Monday evening in the Paslay Lecture Hall in Durland Hall. Kline, an engineer, talked about the power of communication and the importance of getting involved on campus.

▶ ENGINEERING WEEK

Kline: Get involved

REBECCA SCHULZ
Collegian

Engineers can no longer depend on their skills alone but need to be competent communicators within their profession and community, an Overland Park engineer told K-State students Monday.

Phil Kline, vice president of an Overland Park consulting firm and a state representative, addressed a small group of engineering students and faculty on "The Power of Communication" Monday night in Paslay Lecture Hall for Engineering Week.

Kline said he started his own consulting firm in 1950 with one partner. The firm has now expanded to 180 employees and 17 partners.

Kline said although he has become a success in the engineering field, it was important to him to get involved in the community.

"Phil, don't stick just with engineering. Get involved. Get involved with things in the community," he said, echoing the advice given him by a friend.

Kline followed his friend's advice by getting involved in local political positions and becoming a member of his children's school board.

Kline said his involvement in local government allowed him to get involved in the community and meet people like Bob Dole.

"We go back a long way. He went a little further, but I had an engineering firm to run," he said.

Kline has served seven terms in the Kansas House of Representatives and as a member of the Joint Community on State Building Construction, but because of the response of his district, he decided to run again.

"I'm telling you this because I want you to keep getting involved. Engineering itself isn't enough," he said.

Kline said five young associates in his firm have retired because they are burned out on engineering and on doing the same thing every day.

Kline also said many of the young engineers who come into his firm lack writing and speaking skills.

"You can become the most competent engineer, but you need to be able to competently convey this in writing and speaking," he said.

Brian Riedel, freshman in computer engineering, said he hasn't taken a lot of courses in writing and speaking, but he has become involved in the Engineering Student Council.

Through programs and lectures such as this, he has been able to improve his communication skills, he said.

"Communicating is just a major part of being in the workplace," Riedel said. "In general, even in just a business, it's import that you can speak to coworkers. If you can't speak competently, you can't convey your message."

Tim Stevens, a senior in computer engineering, said many of the speakers who come to speak to the students stress improvement of communications skill.

It's not easy for engineers to fit the extra courses into their schedule, he said.

"I agree with him. I think it's important. Engineering is all about making an impact on your community, and community is all about communicating," Stevens said.

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said the college is working to add more communication classes to the curriculum to help engineering students in this area.

"We have added a lot of strength to the communications area. We're working at getting people involved," he said.

Speaker explains Haiti's democracy woes

MIKE HILL
Collegian

A lack of stability is holding the proud and hard-working people of Haiti back, said Florence Bellande Robertson, assistant professor of French literature at LaSierra University and social activist for Haiti.

Robertson spoke at a Brown Bag Lecture Monday on "The United States 1994 Haiti Occupation: A Blessing or a Curse."

The speech was sponsored by the Black Student Union.

Robertson was exiled from Haiti for 29 years before returning in 1986.

"When I stepped off the plane in Haiti, my first feelings were of rage, anger and anguish," she said.

Robertson said Haiti's problems started with Columbus' voyage to the new world.

"Columbus was the beginning of genocide on my island," Robertson said.

Haiti has been occupied and influenced by foreign powers ever since, she said.

At the age of 18, Robertson said she became an activist trying to fight the dictatorship of the Haitian government.

Robertson said she has had many friends who died for their beliefs.

"We believed in the magic word 'democracy,'" she said.

Robertson said the economic embargo that lasted 2-1/2 years was key in turning Haiti into the chaotic country it is today.

"The embargo drove honest people to deal in the black market to survive," she said.

A lack of fuel due to the embargo made transportation impossible and was the reason for the destruction of many natural resources, Robertson said.

"People were destroying trees by the thousands to use as fuel," she said.

Robertson said lack of education was another main concern for the Haitians.

"For the last two and a half years, school has been an impossibility," she said.

Even with democracy restored, she said Haiti still had many problems.

"We still have looting, terrible insecurity among the people. Cost of living is at an all-time high, and the feeling of revenge is strong," she said.

Robertson said all the promises from the friends of Haiti were good things, but they had not been implemented yet.

"We can't rebuild with our lips. We must have money," she said.

Jim Schneider, senior in geology, said the lecture was a learning experience.

"I learned a little history on Haiti and how they got to the point they are at now," he said.

Schneider said he never knew Haiti was such a political issue.

"I didn't realize that politics played such a role in Haiti and why President Clinton wanted to help the Haitian people so much," he said.

Bands blend rhythm, tempo, move followers of live music

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

A blend of local and national-label music gave Manhattan's live music scene a good taste of entertainment Sunday night at Berlin.

The show kicked off with Sufferbus, veterans of the Manhattan scene.

The band's strong rhythm section and tight bass mixed well, lending a sound to the town that is so often forgotten.

A series of chords were strummed briefly.

"Gonna play a love song," Mitchell Leggs, guitarist, said.

A melodic, slow tune began to emerge from the stacks, creating a pacifying effect on the audience. Across the room, a girl slowly tipped a Bud longneck into the air, took a sip and moved her body in rhythm with the song.

Bang!

Sufferbus suddenly switched tempo, grinding the gears and dropping the transmission into "Half a Mind," a happy song composed of melodic bass and a steady rhythm. They ended with a spoof on Green Day.

After the cheers for Sufferbus had subsided, the road crew went to work in setting up the stage. Drums were carted, amps connected, and sound was checked.

The buzzing sound of a coaxial connection between guitar and amplifier started the House of Large Sizes show.

Lead singer Dave Deibler ignited the band before the audience could even prepare itself.

The first song was "We Reserve the Right," a song that is typical of the kind HOLS composes: straightforward, to the point, no bullshit.

The cohesiveness of the band was impressive. Barb Schilf, bass guitarist, had a style that perfectly complemented Deibler's flawless vocals and stop-and-go crunching guitar.

Her vocals mixed with Deibler's to create a unique sound that seemed to come from one person.

What else would you expect of a husband and wife in the same band together?

Deibler started the band about seven years ago after they were married, Schilf said.

"He needed a bass player, and I said, 'Well, that sounds like fun,'" Schilf said.

They began playing the Iowa club scene in the mid-1980s, Deibler said. The band's first gig was at a place called Dean's Parkade Lounge in Cedar Falls, Iowa, he said.

Deibler and Schilf liked Iowa so much that they started a 7-inch-record company named

K-State Information Center needs funding

With a cooperative budget by Student Senate and the Academic Assistance Center, we just might get an information service we could use.

If you've tried this semester to get a question answered from the K-State Information Center, formerly U-LearN, your chances of reaching a live human voice were iffy.

If someone did pick up the phone, you may not have received the answer you needed. It's frustrating, to say the least.

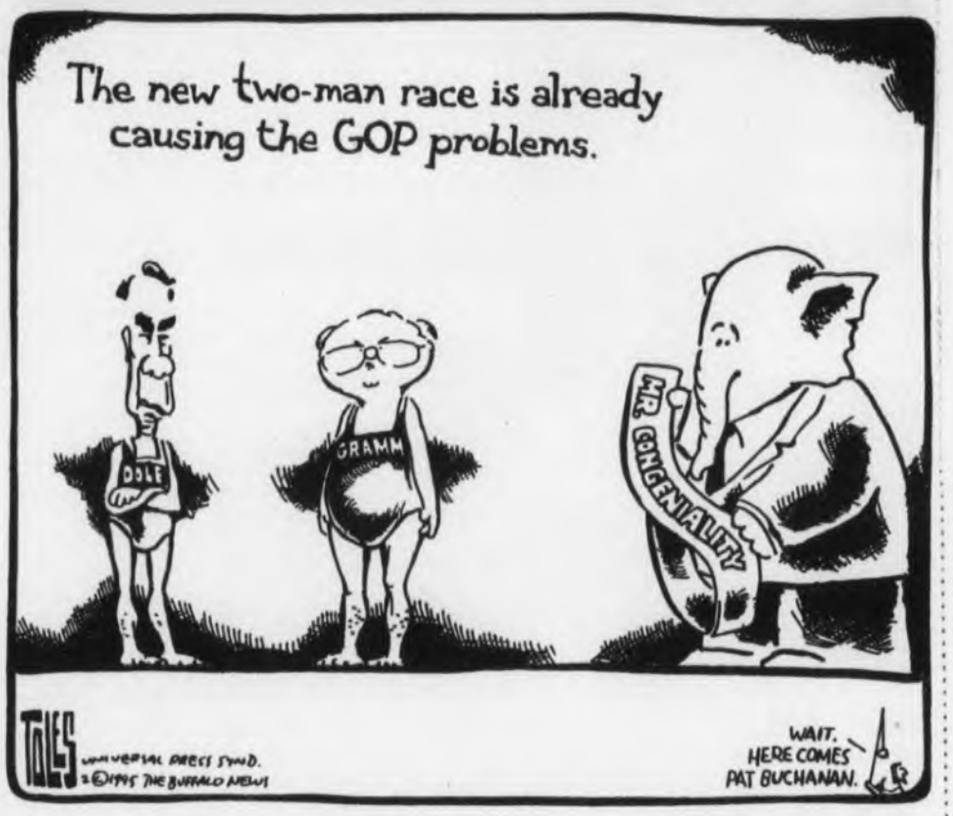
The reason for the poor service is a lack of funding.

KU's Information Center is a lifeline for its students, providing information as diverse as when next semester's classes begin to the middle name of the president to how to make a margarita.

KU has the budget for this service.

You could argue that students can learn to look up the info they want in the campus phone directory, dictionaries or encyclopedias, or as a last resort call the library reference desk.

But at an institution of higher learning, a quick, reliable campus/general phone-information service seems unquestionably essential.



It's not just keeping up with what other universities are doing.

It's called exchanging information, and it's what learning is all about.

With a cooperative budget by Student Senate and the Academic Assistance Center, we just might get an information service we could use.

Let's hope they both cooperate.

Springtime brings graduation phobia

ERIN MANSUR-SMITH

In the past few weeks, I have become a hopeless insomniac. None of the old methods to get to sleep have helped: counting sheep, warm milk, even reading my homework assignments. None of them save me from sightlessly staring at the television until 4 a.m., listening to grotesque talk shows and infomercials about hair clubs.

I've been without sleep before (my entire freshman year, as a matter of fact) and normally, a few sleepless nights wouldn't bother me. But my mind is starting to play funny tricks on me. I am convinced I heard a secret, satanic message in my French lab tapes. (I know for a fact if you play them backwards you hear "Paul is dead.")

As the days rack up with me wide awake, my delusions become even wackier.

If I concentrate hard enough, I swear I can see my own skin grow. It has been of great use to me during some of my longer classes, but it is starting to cause me a little amount of fear.

I'd hate for my professors to think I was actually weaving back and forth as I exit their classes because of them or their lecture material, but I doubt very seriously whether or not they'd believe my reason for staying up so late from night to night.

The fact is, I am possessed. I am possessed by a demon I can't get rid of, which comes to me as I sleep and whispers all sorts of horrid things in my ear.

Now, I am not claiming my body has been taken over by some spawn of the devil who makes me spew pea-green soup and scream obscenities in ancient Sanskrit.

I am told, while such extreme insomnia is a little strange, my fiends are a pretty normal occurance. Every senior just about to be released into the wider world has been visited by the same apparitions I have.

It is fear, abject terror. It is the fear that I won't make it. The horror I actually might.

It is the overwhelming certainty that even though I know I am a perfectly capable adult who can speak whole sentences and not use a double negative more than three or four times, and that once I get that piece of paper I've worked so hard for, I'll forget how to feed myself and have to move in with my parents.

Maybe I am being a bit extreme.

But dreams of living in a cardboard box, my diploma hanging next to "This End Up" or getting turned down for a promotion to work the fry machine at some greasy spoon because the competition had a degree from Yale, keep me wide awake.

In a country where most of the population is strangling on the poverty line and two paychecks away from homelessness, my unconscious imagination has a fertile ground to take root.

We aren't just talking about the job market for degrees in Advanced Potpourri Making rapidly waning. We are talking straight across the board.

I'll admit it: the whole idea of getting out there scares the beejeebers outta me. Not that I haven't learned a lot of practical stuff here to help me out. I know what year the Romans invaded Gaul, and I know how to ask for the bathroom in American Sign Language.

It just doesn't quite seem enough to survive. You know?

One thing I have discovered is that being a student is a lot like being incarcerated. You are placed in a very structured environment for years and years with its own set of highly specialized rules of behavior. You get used to it. You get to depend upon it and then, wham.

One day you are cut loose to fend for yourself with a new set of variables you aren't real sure about.

Some people make it. Some people don't. Some people do their time; then, realizing they aren't ready for the whole reality thing, they go back in for life, never to be haunted with the ghosts of getting set free again.

I think the only way I am going to sleep ever again is by telling myself over and over I don't have to graduate if I don't want to. I can stay here for as long as I like. Which gives me another, new kind of anguish.

God, I need a nap.

Erin Mansur-Smith really IS going to graduate in pre-law, English and theater.

Ignorance about garage causes more confusion

Martians invade Durland Hall!

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Guest COLUMNIST

Jon Wefald is next in line to the British Crown!

If you believe that, then you probably believe most of what has been said about the infamous Memorial Stadium parking garage.

Let me start by saying this column is neither for or against the concept of a parking garage in Memorial Stadium. This column exists solely to squash the rampant lies surfacing in this paper about the garage.

The truth, it turns out, is a precious resource.

First of all, let's rule out underground parking garages once and for all.

If you don't want to pay $12 million for an above-ground garage, you sure don't want to pay more than twice that amount for a sub-ground garage. Let's be reasonable.

Secondly, no money spent on the parking garage will be used to put in a new activity field in the lower Union lot. The real reason a field is planned for that location is because with the widening of Anderson Avenue to six lanes, there will not be a large amount of space left over for a parking lot.

Besides, there are activity fields at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for student use. Why do you think we pay for the Rec?

Third, you can't just place a parking garage anywhere on campus where there is some extra "space."

Putting a garage between Ackert and Durland halls creates more problems than it solves.

What most people don't realize is the concept of traffic flow. A garage being serviced by one road does not make much sense (envision cars bumper to bumper along Denison waiting to turn into and out of the garage).

The lawn east of Ackert is to be used for the future expansion of that building. You can't build a garage where future classrooms are to be located.

Don't even mention the lawn in front of Anderson Hall or the natural area around the President's house.

If you build the garage too far north, it defeats its own purpose. One reason a garage at Memorial is being considered is its close proximity to the Union and the more populous sections of campus.

I'd like to know who in our beloved administration has the professional training and the experience to make informed decisions about K-State's parking problems and solutions.

Yeah, you could build it next to Weber, but who'd use it?

Whether you are upset or happy with the current proposal, let yourself be heard. But, don't write a mini-opus that supposedly solves all problems and makes everyone happy.

It's not going to happen.

Don't make wild assumptions about this campus, either. If you don't know, don't say it.

If you have a question about something, call up Dwain Archer, director of parking services. He should be able to answer any and all questions concerning the garage. If he can't, he'll point you in the right direction.

Finally, don't believe everything you read or hear.

Student leadership on this campus doesn't know much more than you do about this thing. Why, you ask?

The administration appears to hardly know what is going on.

We students have questions that are not being readily answered.

I'd like to know who in our beloved administration has the professional training and the experience to make informed decisions about K-State's parking problems and solutions.

So far, I haven't met anyone who fits that description.

The next few weeks are crucial in deciding what will come of all this.

Is there a real parking problem, or is this debacle just smoke and mirrors?

I urge everyone who owns a K-State parking permit to educate themselves on this issue and take action accordingly.

Don't shoot and ask questions later.

Russell Fortmeyer is a sophomore in architectural engineering.

▶ JON'S NOTES

Faculty getting cheated

Dear editor,

We are all aware of the bilateral negotiations between the United States and China on allegations of Chinese theft of U.S. intellectual property. There might also be theft of intellectual property going on at K-State.

"Many faculty members, including myself, use lecture notes as a basis for future public work."

professor of economics

The Feb. 13 Collegian reported that a note-taking firm is selling KSU faculty lecture notes for profit. Certainly, faculty notes encourage the sharing of lecture notes among students. But selling lecture notes without the faculty member's permission may be a form of intellectual theft.

Most faculty notes are a form of research, often involving several hours of research for an hour lecture. Many faculty members, myself included, use lecture notes as a basis for future public work. For example, in the Department of Economics, three professors have published textbooks for classes that they are teaching.

I see two potential problems from the unauthorized commercial use of lecture notes. First, a commercial note-taking service may be stealing intellectual property that a faculty member could be using for publication. Second, the commercial service may fail to cite sources for the lecture material, even if the faculty member has been scrupulous in mentioning the sources. Most faculty lecturers acknowledge the last name of the author from whom a concept is borrowed, implying the students can request the full biographical detail. To illustrate, I tell students periodically that I can provide more detailed citations for the works of scholars I mention in my lectures.

Thus, at the Feb. 14 Faculty Senate meeting, I suggested that a senate committee investigate adding to Appendix F of the faculty handbook the point that plagiarism includes "the commercial use of a lecture without the permission of the lecturer." This addition may be essential to reduce theft of intellectual product on the KSU campus.

▶ PARKING

Put new parking elsewhere

Dear editor,

I am writing in concern about the parking proposal. There are many reasons why this proposal should not take place. First is the geographical location, second the history behind the stadium and third, the current uses of the stadium grounds.

The land within and around the stadium is very unstable. This can be seen just by looking at the existing stadium. There are cracks in the towers, and some parts have shifted so much the damage is clearly visible from the road.

The problem of this stability will not go away by simply "beefing up" the foundation. The location of the proposed garage will end up costing the University more money in the years to come. Repairs will need to be made because of structural damage that will occur due to uneven settling of the soil from the weight of the cars.

"The problem of this stability will not go away by simply 'beefing up' the foundation."

fifth-year student in architecture

How would you feel if you found a car parked in the middle of the Vietnam Memorial (either here on campus or in Washington)? Most would be appalled at the thought of desecrating such a monument. This is just what the University is proposing, but on a larger scale.

By putting a parking garage in the middle of Memorial Stadium, they would be desecrating a monument to World War I veterans.

Every day, especially on warmer days, I see students and local citizens using the stadium grounds. The K-State Marching Band uses it for band practice because it is the size of a football field. The rugby and lacrosse teams use the land to practice on. The kinesiology department, students and locals use the track on nice days to run or walk laps.

Also, won't the exhaust fumes get into the classrooms and offices that are located within the stadium walls?

Imagine you have a morning ceramics class or go into telecommunications, and you become nauseated because of the carbon monoxide leaking into the building from the parking structure.

Since the students want closer parking, because they are too lazy to park in Lot B-3 and walk to class, the proposal team should look at the feasibility of building the structure on top of existing lots.

There is plenty of room in the Lot D, west of the stadium, to put in a parking garage. This way, the construction can be phased and not create too big of a loss in parking spaces.

Also, the garage can be built on the Durland lot. Currently, it makes a great wind plane, which blows students around the corner of Durland. The flat expanse also looks out of place between Ackert and Durland.

Since there is a proposal of a phase III of Durland, why doesn't the University contract the parking garage to the companies that are working on the Durland construction? It would save on time and money to not have to contract out another company for the job.

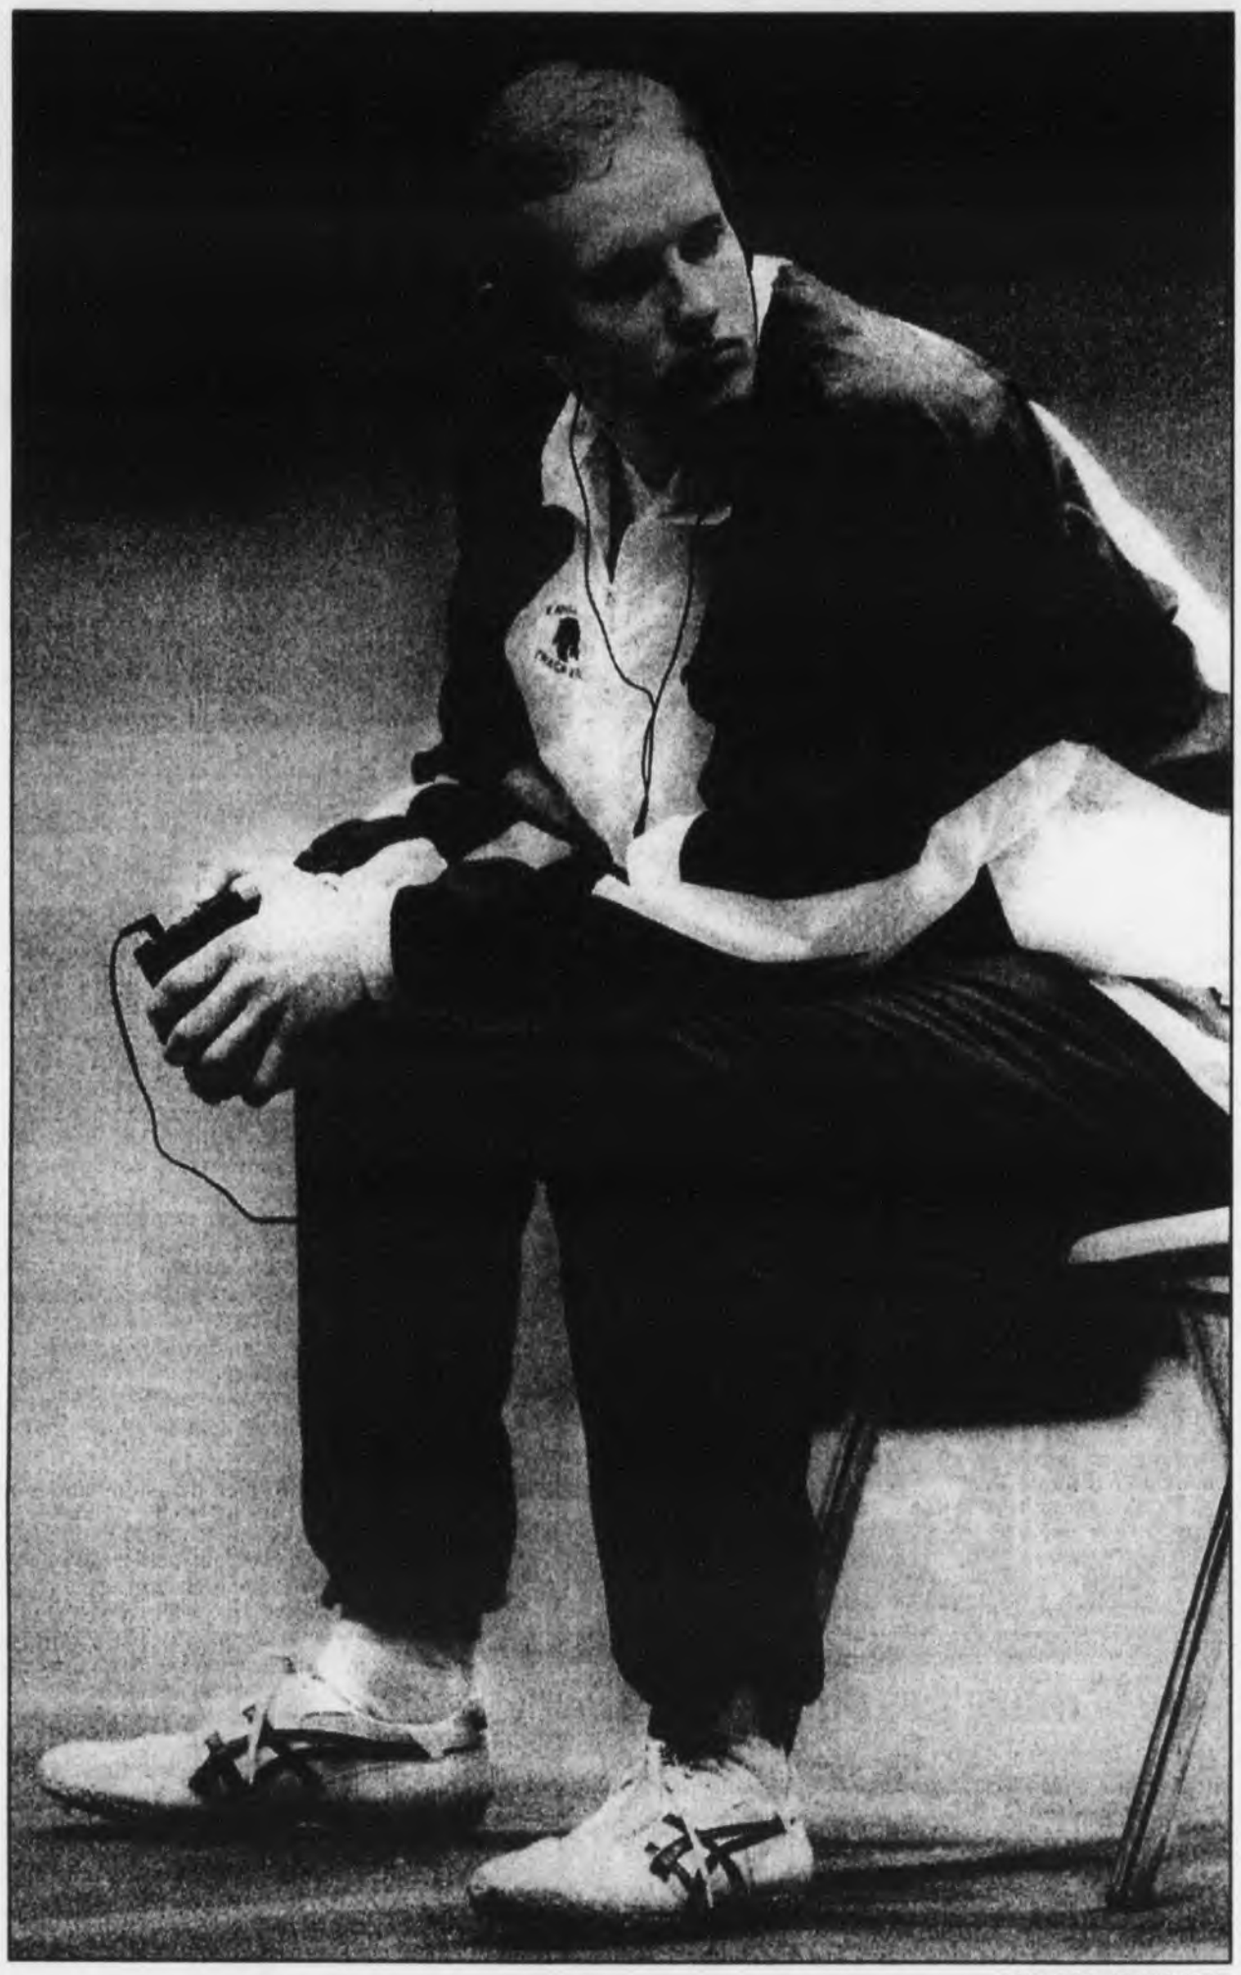
Groups hurt environment

Dear editor,

Nobody can help every good cause. Anyone can be part of a "Save Our Overgrazed Public Lands — Don't Buy Beef" movement.

Cattle lobby activities, resulting in the defeat of candidates supporting good causes, may have been paid for by the beef you ate.



Beef, eaten by those who otherwise care, may lead to the further slaughter of wild horses (competing with cattle for forage) and the extinction of species on our overgrazed public lands — land also menaced by special interest-backed groups trying to wrest control from our government and prevent range land reform.

K-State high jumper Ed Broxterman relaxes between events during the KSU Open Friday at Ahearn Field House. Broxterman provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Track & Field Championship Dec. 9 at the KSU All Comers Meet. Broxterman will be competing in the high jump at the Big Eight Championships this weekend in Ahearn Field House.

K-State high jumper Ed Broxterman has accomplished his goals with just plain

Hard Work

JILL TEQTMEIR
Collegian

It's hard to believe that high jumper Ed Broxterman, who provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Track & Field Championship with a jump of 7 feet 3-3/4 inches at his first meet this year, didn't want anything to do with the event as a freshman in high school.

"I was leery to do the same event as my older brother, Steve, who was high jumping in college and doing really good," he said.

Broxterman said he knew that people would expect him to do as well as his brother, and he wasn't sure he wanted that responsibility. It did not take long to change his mind.

"About the second week of practice, my high-school coach begged me to try the high jump. So I did it.

"My first meet, I jumped five feet, two inches," Broxterman said with a smile.

But by the end of his freshman year, Broxterman cleared 6'8", and his junior year, he captured the state record by clearing 6'9-1/2".

The rest is history.

Broxterman said he's not the type of person to put in his time at practice and then just depend on natural talent to help him win. He credits his success to personal effort and support from his coaches and trainers.

"I've been working really hard, especially with weights — increasing the weight on my squat and clean lifts. The weight trainers do a good job of keeping me motivated, and Coach Rovelto is real good at organizing the workout schedules," he said.

Broxterman has had to work even harder since he experienced the pain of a ruptured appendix Dec. 9 at the KSU All Comers Meet.

"I felt pain while I was jumping, but it wasn't too bad. I just kept rubbing my side hoping it would feel better," he said.

Broxterman qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships at this meet despite his discomfort.

"It was really weird because I was in a really good mood because I had just qualified, and I was also hurting, so I was laughing and hurting at the same time," Broxterman said.

The next two days, Broxterman said he was in so much pain it was ridiculous.

"I never knew anything could hurt that bad," he said.

The hospital staff didn't think the pain was from his appendix because the pain he felt was on his left side instead of the right, where most appendixes are located.

"When they opened me up, they found that my appendix was so big. It was seven inches long, almost all the way across me. That's why I hurt on my left side, too," Broxterman said.

A couple of days after he was released from the hospital, Broxterman was riding a bike and doing sit-ups.

"A lot of people would have used what happened as an excuse. But Ed didn't. I knew if he could just get back into things, he would see that he wasn't going to be set back that much by the practice time he missed," Rovelto said.

Broxterman said it was pretty painful to start working out again, but he knew the longer he waited, the harder it would be.

"This all happened during finals week, so I had to make up my finals the week after and had to take one the beginning of this semester, which was really tough."

When Broxterman isn't facing off against the high-jump bar, he's most likely doing homework and going to classes.

"Track is really time-consuming, as well as all sports. There's not a lot of free time if you want to get good grades," he said.

Broxterman said he knows all about getting good grades. He has been on the Phillips 66 All-Academic Team for six semesters and has received a 3.83 GPA the last two semesters while enrolled in 17 hours of classes.

Broxterman said he's glad that he grew up in the small community of Baileyville.

"Sports were a really important part of my high school, and we were really competitive. Especially in basketball — it's still my favorite sport to play," Broxterman said.

"Living on a farm near a small town helped me acquire a strong work ethic. I think it's carried over in my weight-lifting and my grades at K-State," he said.

Broxterman said his goals change as he continues to achieve more. His current goal is to qualify for the Olympics.

"I think that I already have, but it just depends on what the qualifying mark ends up being. If I qualify, then my goal will be to actually get there," he said.

Broxterman said high jumping is an event you can never really win because you walk away ending on misses.

"You always leave disappointed and thinking you could do better because you always quit when you miss the height three times. To win, you would have to jump forever and keep clearing new heights," he said.

But Broxterman said he wouldn't trade high jumping for anything.

"It's amazing to feel myself jumping as high as I do. Sometimes, I can hardly imagine that I'm really doing it," he said.

But he is, and he's doing it well.

"It's just me against the bar," he said.

So far, he has been the one coming out on top.

Cats drop 2 during weekend road trip

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

This weekend's season opener against Oral Roberts saw the K-State baseball team pick up where it left off last year — in the loss column.

The Wildcats blew a 6-1 lead in Saturday's contest and went on to lose 6-8. Sunday's game wasn't as close; the Golden Eagles walked away with a 14-9 victory.

Saturday's game saw K-State starting pitcher Eric Yanz allow just one run and three hits as his Cats clung to a 2-1 lead through the fifth.

The K-State bats finally got hot in the sixth inning; the Cats scored four runs on two hits, powering them to a 6-1 advantage.

But K-State couldn't hold on. The Golden Eagles scored two runs of their own in the bottom of the sixth and then put the game away after a five-run eighth inning.

Leading the way offensively for the Cats were Todd Fereday and Chris Hess. Fereday was 2-for-3 on the day, while Hess went 2-for-4.

Taking the loss for K-State was pitcher David Johnson.

The Cats again jumped ahead early in Sunday's action, holding a 5-1 lead at the top of the fifth. But the Golden Eagles responded with five runs in the bottom of the fifth and seven more runs in the sixth to take a 13-5 lead.

K-State managed a four-run effort to start the ninth, but that wasn't enough.

Matt Koeman took the loss for the Cats, as K-State fell to 0-2.

Once again, it was Fereday and Hess giving the Cats power at the plate. Fereday went 2-for-3 and Hess was 2-for-4.

The Cats take the field for their home opener against Missouri Western at 3 p.m. Wednesday.

Sooners upset top-ranked Jayhawks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORMAN, Okla. — Kansas killed itself by missing the front end of three one-and-ones in the final 2:41.

After a poor first half, Kansas came out inspired in the second half, and it carried over to coach Roy Williams. He was given a technical foul for leaving the bench to admonish a student who taunted one of his players under the Kansas goal.

The Jayhawks failed to exploit their size advantage in the first half, when they twice fell behind by 13. Once they started dumping the ball inside, the Jayhawks got right back into the game and made their outside game more effective.

Scot Pollard scored 10 points in the first half, while Jerod Haase had two three-pointers, and B.J. Thomas and Sean Pearson made one each, giving the Jayhawks a 63-57 lead with 8:45 to go. Oklahoma righted itself from the perimeter. Dion Barnes hit a pair of three-pointers, and Ryan Minor and Ernie Abercrombie hit baseline jumpers as the Sooners tied the score at 69 with 3:22 to go.

Stickbacks by Pollard and Raef LaFrenz widened the lead to 73-69 with 3:04 to go, but the Jayhawks didn't score again. John Ontjes hit a jumper in the lane, then Abercrombie hit his big shot.

MIKE BUNCH

Is it Guns N' Roses meets the southern rock invasion?

Slash, the lead guitarist for Guns N' Roses, teams up with four friends to create a new group, Slash's Snakepit.

Mike Inez, Eric Dover, Gilby Clarke and Matt Sorum join Slash in creating almost 70 minutes of guitar-laden music on "It's Five O'Clock Somewhere."

The group has succeeded in cutting 14 tracks that all sound remarkably alike in style and riffs.

The instrumental music is solid and driving but gets repetitive after a while. A good example is track 8, a purely instrumental piece called "Jizz da Pit."

Slash and crew drive the same guitar and rhythm riff for three minutes — a little overkill. It would be good as a solo in a normal piece, but dedicating an entire song to it just isn't right.

This is a problem with a lot of guitar greats who try to do some solo work or a special project — they get stuck in a set style and sound.

At the other end, the lyrics and vocals on all the tracks are pretty strong. Dover has a unique voice that lends itself to the southern rock/hard rock sound the Snakepit puts out.

On the first track, "Neither Can I," Dover tries something a little different with the vocals. Early on, the lyrics are performed in a Zydeco style and then move into a solid-rock style.

I think the variety and change in the vocals make this one of the best tracks on the entire CD.

Slash and company cover a broad range of topics lyrically. Suicide is one such issue and the subject of track 9, "Lower."

It paints a bleak picture of some of the evils that drive people to kill themselves and how others can help. The chorus line says, "So tell me how to do it/How to do what I'm gonna do/How to take the knife from inside of you/ ..."

Definitely a strong subject to talk about in a rock song.

There is even an attempt at a love song. "I Hate Everybody But You," track 13, is a pessimistic look at love and relationships.

The idea is, "To hell with the world, I have you." I like it.

Though the riffs and rhythms become repetitive, the lyrics are strong and not what I expected.

I think die-hard Guns N' Roses fans and hard-rock fans of all types will not be disappointed by Slash's offering. Who knows? It might even convert a few people.

Professor covers civil-rights reform society. It takes some vigilance, but you can do it," he said.

And it is the ordinary people who have the ability to come together and change things, he said.

"To me, as the civil-rights movement moved along, it drew people together, except for the really strong segregationalist," Marsh said.

He said the idea was drawing everyone together and making a nation, and that atmosphere is missing in today's society.

"In some sense, the idea of multiculturalism needs to be with unity," he said.

Something else missing from today's society is respect for Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday, Marsh said.

"Dr. Martin Luther King's birthday is looked at as a holiday for blacks, and really it is for everyone," Marsh said.

But the battles of the past have left behind useful guidelines that the people of today must learn to follow through with, he said.

"The single most important thing that happened was the legalization of desegregation," Marsh said.

And today, the biggest thing supporting the lack of desegregation is housing, he said.

In fact, today's inner-city situation creates not only racism but class confrontation, Marsh said.

Marsh said that the people of the inner city are very much like the black people in Mississippi in the 1950s and '60s because they are sitting on a time bomb.

"When you are a minority, you always feel it," he said.

But whether a minority or majority, Marsh said he has always believed in letting people know about the world around them.

William Marsh, senior in civil engineering, said he has always respected his father's job.

"It's an honorable profession," William said.

And, he said, reporting on the civil-rights movement would have been difficult.

"That would have been a tough job to report that fairly," he said.

William Stamey, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences from 1969 to 1987, said one of the reasons he hired Marsh as the head of the School of Journalism in 1980 was because Marsh cares about people and has a professional dedication to the field.

"He has very obvious professional abilities to write and express himself well," Stamey said.

Recently, Marsh completed his first book, "Creating Tomorrow's Mass Media," and he has previously written articles and coauthored books.

"I try to keep my hand at writing," Marsh said.

Drug testing enforces financial-aid program gone to college eventually without Project CHOICE, but he wouldn't have gone to a university right away because of the expense.

"I'd be at college. I would have gone to juco first, though," Craven said.

Ramirez graduated from Westport, the original school picked for Project CHOICE.

In 1989, the program was expanded to include all USD 500 schools in Kansas City, Kan., which opened the door for Malathip and Craven, who graduated from Wyandotte.

However, all the students at Westport were given the option of joining the program, while 30 students from each class in each of the KCK schools were selected.

Although Project CHOICE encourages students to go to state universities, anyone who wants to go to an out-of-state or private college can make a request to go some where else if they have a reason — even if it's an Ivy League school.

"Oh yeah, they'll pay for Harvard," Malathip said.

One of the ways the Kauffman Foundation enforces the contracts is with random drug testing.

"They have random drug testing, and they could do it any time. In high school, they came and pulled you out of class," Craven said.

At K-State, students on Project CHOICE are given a notice to report to Lafene Health Center for drug testing within 24 hours.

Although the Kauffman Foundation makes sure everything is paid for, it doesn't just hand money out freely.

Students in Project CHOICE are given a $300 account at the K-State Union Bookstore every semester for books. If they buy anything anywhere else, they can be reimbursed if they have a receipt.

The living arrangements aren't exactly flexible, either, Malathip said. Living expenses are paid only if the students stay in residence halls.

"You have to live in the residence halls all four years," Malathip said. "We're trying to change that."

The foundation also runs the program on a second-payer basis, Ramirez said.

Students apply for financial aid, and they accept whatever form of aid they don't have to pay back, like grants and scholarships. Then Project CHOICE pays for the rest.

Malathip said she doesn't pursue scholarships because she would feel guilty getting one.

"We're taking scholarships away from somebody else, and we're going to have it paid for anyway," she said.

Craven said some people have the wrong idea about the students on Project CHOICE.

"Many people think that we're disadvantaged children, and we're really normal young adults just trying to get an education," he said.

Council members to have transition time have enough people to even have a true election, and this year we could only choose half the people who ran," Briel said.

Members who are elected to the Education Council serve from their elected date in February until the following April of the next election year, Moore said.

"This allows the incoming members to learn from those who have already served a full year. We find that the system works really well," Moore said.

Willard Nelson, faculty adviser for the Education Council, said the extra time students serve is beneficial to everyone involved.

"I think the seven-week transition period is an excellent way for new members to become familiar with the council's duties, and it also allows the outgoing members to ensure that everything gets off on the right track," Nelson said.

Moore said she is happy with the incoming group of members.

"We have a good variety of men and women and people with different education majors, and that's important," Moore said.

Kim Rourke, sophomore in preprofessional elementary education and newly elected council member, said she is excited about serving for the Education Council.

"I think it's going to be great, I just can't wait. I think this is a great opportunity to meet more people and really get involved with what my college is doing," Rourke said.

T.J. Rose, sophomore in preprofessional secondary education and newly elected council member, said he is looking forward to serving but was surprised to hear the results.

"I had no clue. I just turned in my application the night before because my adviser told me it would be a good idea. I think it's going to be a good opportunity for me, but I have no idea how I got elected," Rose said. "I guess I have a catchy name."

Program helps minorities reach full potential

"The Minority Engineering Program promotes cooperative academic environments that emphasize collaborative learning, instead of the competitive environment more common to the engineering school experience," Giovanisci said. "These supportive structures have proven to be powerfully effective in improving the graduation rate of minority engineering students."

K-State also has a student study center in Seaton 120 where students are required to spend three to five hours, depending on their GPA.

Minority Symposium, DEN 120, and Minority Colloquium, DEN 220, are both classes designed specifically with the minority students in mind.

"They can learn basic skills of college time management, make sure they are on the right track career-wise, learn about who's who in higher education and practice study skills," Martin said.

"We want all of our students to reach their optimum potential," Martin said.

Band's, crowd's energy unstoppable

North Cedar Records.

Its sole purpose is to help local bands in Cedar Falls to get their stuff out there, Deibler said.

"It's fun helping bands who are just getting started because we've been through it," he said.

House of Large Sizes has been touring the Midwest for about two weeks.

Deibler said he was tired before the show began. You wouldn't have known it.

About 150 people turned up for the show, but HOLS had enough energy for 500.

The trio continued its set with a song from "My Ass-Kicking Life," the latest album in a discography that stretches back to 1987.

"Tired of Feeling Good" was the tune, but the amount of energy the band and the crowd put out together could have been measured in kilowatts.

People were hopping around the floor in time with the drums of Mark Munn, the latest in a long line of drummers.

He has been with the band for six months.

Munn is obviously a quick study. The band had tight segues — they moved smoothly from one song to another with little pause between.

This intensified the energy in the air, and by the final song, people were hopping around the floor like Pogo sticks.

Manhattan bars, like Berlin and Snookie's Bar, deserve a thumbs-up for bringing top-quality acts like HOLS to Manhattan. The pendulum of live music is coming back around.

affected in the Mid-America Chapter of the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. The chapter consists of 105 counties in eastern Kansas and western Missouri.

The society's clients help with the walk. They might be handing out medallions or helping at rest stops along the route, Smischny said.

"It's just kind of a neat thing where they can get out and do things in the community," she said.

The support being shown by participants is also beneficial to those with MS, Smischny said.

Stickers may be worn by walkers who know someone with MS, Smischny said. The stickers tell the names of the MS sufferers being walked for. The goal this year is to raise $125 per walker. The average raised per walker last year was about $110, she said.

Anyone who raises $75 or more will receive a prize. Nine prizes are available. The top prize, given for raising $5,000, is a four-head VCR, mini bookshelf stereo or a $200 Land's End Gift certificate.

By collecting $125 in donations, a walker qualifies for a drawing to win two round-trip TWA tickets to Rome, or one of two round-trip tickets to anywhere TWA flies in the continental United States.

Whoever raises the most pledges more than $5,000 chapter-wide gets a trip for two to any TWA domestic destination.

Smischny said last year's grand-prize winner raised about $9,200.

The prize was donated back to the chapter.

Groups in the MS Walk are eligible for team awards as either a corporate team or community team. Awards are given for the largest team and the team raising the most money.

The MS Walk is a fundraiser for the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. The society sponsors research into the disease, as well as education and support programs for victims.

Smischny said this is the seventh year for the national MS Walk. The eastern Kansas branch has had four previous walks, she said.

University Counseling Services can help you beat mid-semester

You have a test in economics, a project due, a study session with classmates, and you have to go to work.

It's that time in the semester when students are beginning to evaluate exactly how much they can handle between classes, work and extracurricular activities.

A student's ability to handle the stress of a full class load and a job changes each semester and varies from person to person.

Some students are able to go to college and not work. Other students must work to make ends meet.

Lynette Harris, senior in electrical engineering, takes 17 hours of class and works at least 12 hours a week.

She said relationships stress her out the most.

"You have to find study time, work time, and you have to worry about someone else's schedule," Harris said. "It's only hard if you make it hard."

Todd Miller, senior in construction science, doesn't work during the semester.

"The more money I make, the more I want to work, and then I neglect school," he said.

Ray Estes, senior in construction science, also chooses not to work.

"I take over a full load of classes and don't have time to work," Estes said.

Estes starts his day on campus at 7:30 a.m., and it doesn't end until at least 6 p.m.

"By the time I'm through with school, there's not time to work, and then I've got homework to do," Estes said.

"It's more than a full-time job going to school," he said.

Some employers find that having student employees is beneficial.

Terry Kuchcinski, owner of TK Construction, has a large staff of student workers.

"There are a couple of reasons why I like to work with students. The flexibility is good, and most of my students work part-time, and I don't have to pay unemployment insurance," Kuchcinski said.

There are resources on campus that can help students who have difficulty balancing work, class and activities.

University Counseling Services has seminars and brochures about stress and time management.

What do you do when you're tired of the Rec?

JAMIE CONGROVE
Collegian

Waiting for long lines to use workout machines and having to fight for a place to do aerobics have made some students choose private health clubs instead of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Nancy Miller, senior in exercise science and an aerobic instructor at Manhattan Athletic Club, said she enjoys working out at a private club because she thinks it is more personal and less like a meat market.

"Sometimes people get embarrassed when they work out at places like the Rec because it is so much like a meat market," Miller said.

"It's like going to a bar. You have to be social. When you work out at a private place, you don't have to do that."

Other people said they liked to work out somewhere more private.

T.J. Winter, owner of Nautilus Fitness and Aerobics Center, said it's nice to work out away from campus because you get to meet different types of people.

"We're not as busy, and it's a chance for students to get off of campus. It's nice to meet other people than just students," Winter said.

Not having to wait to use exercise equipment is another appealing aspect of private clubs.

"When people really like to work out and they go to the Rec, they don't get as good of a workout in because they have to wait for machines. It's a more hard-core place," Sean Doerflinger, owner of Hardbodies Gym, said.

Doerflinger said 80 percent of his membership comes from students. He said he thinks students work out because of their diets.

"A lot of students get in trouble with their diets because they like to drink and party. So you have to combat it somehow," he said. "Like right now all of the guys in here have hangovers."

Kristi Pottroff, owner of Manhattan Athletic Club, said she enjoys seeing many people working out.

"People are becoming more educated on the fact that dieting alone won't allow you to lose weight. We're a lot more health-conscious now," she said.

Pottroff said she thinks when people work out and they look good, they feel better about themselves, too.

Leslie Coffee, junior in biology, said she likes to work out because it is a good stress reliever, and it's a chance to take a break from studying.

"It's so important that people work out because it gives you a chance to clear your head. Plus, when you work out, you can set goals for yourself, and it is so cool once you meet them," Coffee said.

Winter said it is important not to stop your workout program as you age. He said he sees a lot of younger people working out, and then once they get older, it is not as important because of families and jobs.

"But when you're single," he said, "there is a lot of competition out there to look good."

No matter where students work out, there is no doubt that exercising has beneficial effects on the body. But sometimes students don't have the money for a private place.

Sharah Davis, sophomore in psychology, said when she is at school she works out at the Rec because it is hard to afford a monthly membership when there are other things to pay for.

"Working out at a private health club would be nice because there are less people using the machines," Davis said.

"But when I really want to get a good workout and have to go to the Rec as opposed to jogging outside or taking a walk, I usually go in the morning because there is hardly anyone there at that time."

Davis said she really didn't think it mattered where people work out as long as they are comfortable with the surroundings.

"I think if people feel more comfortable working out at a private place, and they have the money, that's great," she said.

"But some people like to go to the Rec just for socialization purposes too. So it doesn't really matter just as long as people are staying active and feel good about themselves."

Mountain biking

Mountain biking is a popular way to stay in shape. One great place to go off road is on the trails at the Tuttle Creek Reservoir spillway cycle area. Last fall, more than 20 people competed in the Pi Kappa Mountain Bike Challenge. The course was a 3/4-mile loop at the spillway cycle area.

If everything goes as scheduled, the front entrance of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex will open in early March.

Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services, said the construction and renovation are going according to plan.

"Now that it's almost reality, it's pretty neat to see," Martini said. "It's just been a real smooth project so far, but it takes time to get certain things done."

Martini said the entire project should be completed in June. He said he wants the construction to be completed and ready for students by the beginning of the fall semester.

"There will be parts of it available for students to use shortly," Martini said.

The new business offices and checkout areas should be done in April, along with the new gymnasium.

"The students are going to be able to use the new parts of the rec as we complete it," Martini said.

During the construction, a portion of the parking lot in front of the Rec Complex has been closed. Once the project is completed, Martini said a section of parking will be opened in front of the complex. He said there will be the same number of parking spaces after the construction as there were before.

Martini also said the dirt road to the west of the intramural fields will be paved, and parking spaces will be created along the entire road. Construction of the new parking spaces will begin this summer, he said.

Although the new section of the recreation complex has not yet been unveiled to the students, Martini says he thinks the students will like what is being done.

"If the students could come out and see what's happening in the new part, I think they'd be really excited," he said.

"The students have been real cooperative."

The project, which is being completed by Coonrod and Associates out of Wichita, is costing $7.9 million. This price includes construction, architect fees and new equipment, Martini said.

He said part of the expense of the project was the lighting of the intramural ball fields.

Martini said once the new areas of the complex are opened for use, old areas will be closed so that they may

EATING ON YOUR OWN

In trying to balance a budget and budgeting time, cooking loses out

When someone else cooks your meals, it is difficult to know exactly what you're eating.

When you're responsible for cooking your own meals, a tight budget or time restraints can be obstacles preventing a healthy diet.

Whatever the reason, eating habits change for many students when they come to college.

> "I eat one meal at home, which is made from good food, but my 10 o'clock meal usually involves fries."
> JASON RAWLINGS
> Senior in biology

Jennifer Partridge, junior in pre-occupational therapy, said to follow daily dietary guidelines she tries to eat breads and cereals for breakfast, fruits for lunch and vegetables for dinner.

"I also try to keep my fat intake around 20 percent, but I don't watch my calories as much," Partridge said.

Partridge said she feels she snacks more than she should.

"This is probably because there is less time to sit down at every meal," she said.

"It's also more of a hassle to cook a meal for just one person," Partridge said.

Partridge said budget restraints also make it difficult to eat healthy.

"I tend to eat more toward a budget than what's good," she said.

Partridge said she started eating healthy in high school. Since then she said she's noticed that she feels better on days she eats foods that are better for her.

"Some days, I'll eat at Carlos O'Kelly's or something and I feel sluggish afterwards, even if it tasted good," she said.

Tricia O'Connor, freshman in art, said her eating habits have changed since coming to college, mostly because she has had to fit a certain time schedule for meals in the residence halls.

"You're forced to eat meals at certain times, and you have to get your stomach set to that schedule," O'Connor said.

O'Connor said it bothers her that she might be eating more fat in her food then she realizes.

"You're never really sure how they prepare it. I've heard some pretty scary stories," O'Connor said.

"I probably eat the same amount, but you can't tell how they cook it," she said.

O'Connor said now when she goes home she appreciates the good food and usually ends up eating more food than at school.

Chris Wittwer, sophomore in business, said he eats less in college than when he lived at home.

"I ate more before because my mom is a great cook," Wittwer said.

"Now that I live in a fraternity, it's harder to eat healthier," he said.

Like Wittwer, Mike Carson, senior in architecture, eats only two meals a day.

"I skip breakfast mainly because I'm too lazy in the morning to make anything," Carson said.

Carson said to improve this diet he tries to eat a healthy sandwich at lunch with either an apple or a banana and tries to avoid eating French fries.

Carson said he eats less fat than before he came to college.

"My metabolism or something slowed down when I came to college," Carson said.

"I can't just chow down on fast food. I will see the effects of it," he said.

In his first four years of college, Carson said he lived in a fraternity and it was harder to eat healthy than living on his own.

"I eat much better now than when I lived there," he said. "Before, I had to say no to food that was right in front of me. The food was good, but just kind of fattening."

Eating healthy is not a concern for all students.

Jason Rawlings, senior in biology, said he eats three meals a day, mostly consisting of foods from McDonald's, as well as pizza.

"It doesn't bother me a bit. I eat one meal at home, which is made from good food, but my 10 o'clock meal usually involves fries," Rawlings said.

Rawlings said he eats a meal at noon, one at 6 and one at 10 p.m.

O'Connor said it's difficult to eat healthy consistently.

"Some days I try to eat really healthy," he said. "Other days, I just don't."

EAT HEALTHY AND $AVE MONEY

On a tight budget? These basic shopping tips can save you money.

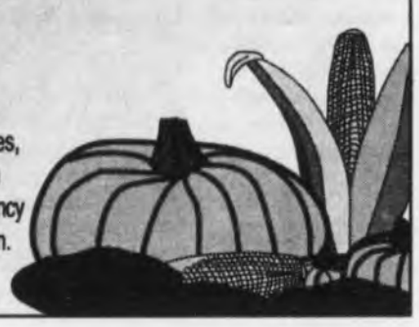
COUPONS — Take advantage of sales and coupons, but only for products that are healthy and packaged in quantities that you will really use.

BUY IN BULK — But only stock up on products you can store properly and use before they go stale.

SHOPPING LIST — Avoid impulse buying. Use a shopping list, and don't shop when you're hungry.

CUT BACK — Don't buy alcohol, expensive, sugary snacks or convenience foods. Use the money you save for healthy treats and fresh foods.

AVOID SUPPLEMENTS — Don't use vitamin and mineral supplements unless a health practitioner tells you that you need them. They aren't substitutes for balanced meals.



HOME COOKING — Make your own casseroles, stews, desserts and salads, staying away from pickles, olives, relishes, exotic ingredients and fancy spices that are often high-cost and low-nutrition.

SNACKS - Often the texture, temperature or other characteristics are the attractive features of food. Before you get your snack, decide if you want something crunchy or smooth, cold or hot, liquid or solid, and for nibbling or eating at one sitting. Try to select snacks from this healthy list.

- peanut butter
- fresh fruit and vegetables
- toasted whole-grain English muffins, bagels and bread rice cakes
- unbuttered and unsalted popcorn
- dry-roasted, unsalted nuts
- unsalted seeds, breadsticks and pretzels
- raisins and other dried fruits
- low-sodium soup
- cocoa made with low-fat milk
- frozen low-fat yogurt
- water

walkways to access the old parts of the building that are still in use from the new parts of the building.

Along with the new walls and roads come new fitness equipment and programming for the complex.

Martini said new equipment has already been ordered, and students should expect more pieces of equipment and more weights.

"We're going to at least double the number of pieces of equipment," Martini said.

He said a big-screened TV will also be a part of the new equipment at the complex. He said it will be placed in the new lounge area.

"We do plan on expanding our programming in different areas," Martini said.

"Our programming is going to change," he said. "With a bigger facility, we're going to add things."

Martini said programming for aerobic classes will be increasing because of the construction.

He said the new building will have an aerobic-fitness multi-purpose room specifically for these classes.

Martini said the room will have mirrors in it and a floor designed especially for doing aerobics on.

He also said that because of the new lights on the intramural fields, the outdoor intramural program may be expanded from weekends and afternoons into the night.

But Martini stressed that the new building was constructed to give students more space to do the things they want to do in the Rec Complex.

"We don't want to build a new building and program it to death," he said.

"This is a total dedication to the students' recreation," Martini said.

Fighting racism through protesting

Scary sight fuels teacher's fire for Civil Rights

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

When Charlotte MacFarland was a young girl living in Louisville, Ken., she saw a little, black girl standing outside of a White Castle restaurant.

The restaurant would not serve the girl.

MacFarland really did not know what to think, but her mother knew what was happening.

"My mother told the girl, 'I'll go in and get your hamburger for you,'" MacFarland said.

This frightening childhood experience and several other things prompted MacFarland, assistant professor of speech, to be involved with the Civil Rights movement in the mid-1960s.

MacFarland said her involvement in the movement brought about a lack of trust in people and a fear that physical harm would befall her.

She started to receive threatening letters from the Ku Klux Klan during her freshman year at Stetson University in 1965, and people would come by her residence hall yelling vulgar remarks.

Stetson University, in Deland, Fla., was a small, very southern school. Only a small number of black students attended the school, she said.

"The nicest thing I ever got called was a whore," MacFarland said.

"I was really scared," she said. "I didn't know who I could trust in the town. The Klan was very quiet — you didn't know who was in it," she said. "When the movement got bigger, I felt safer."

MacFarland said everybody who was involved in any way received threatening letters. Intimidation was the Klan's tool.

MacFarland said it was illegal to openly harass people, so the KKK would usually send letters to tell people to stay in their place.

She was involved in the movement by attending rallies and speeches and singing folk songs about various topics.

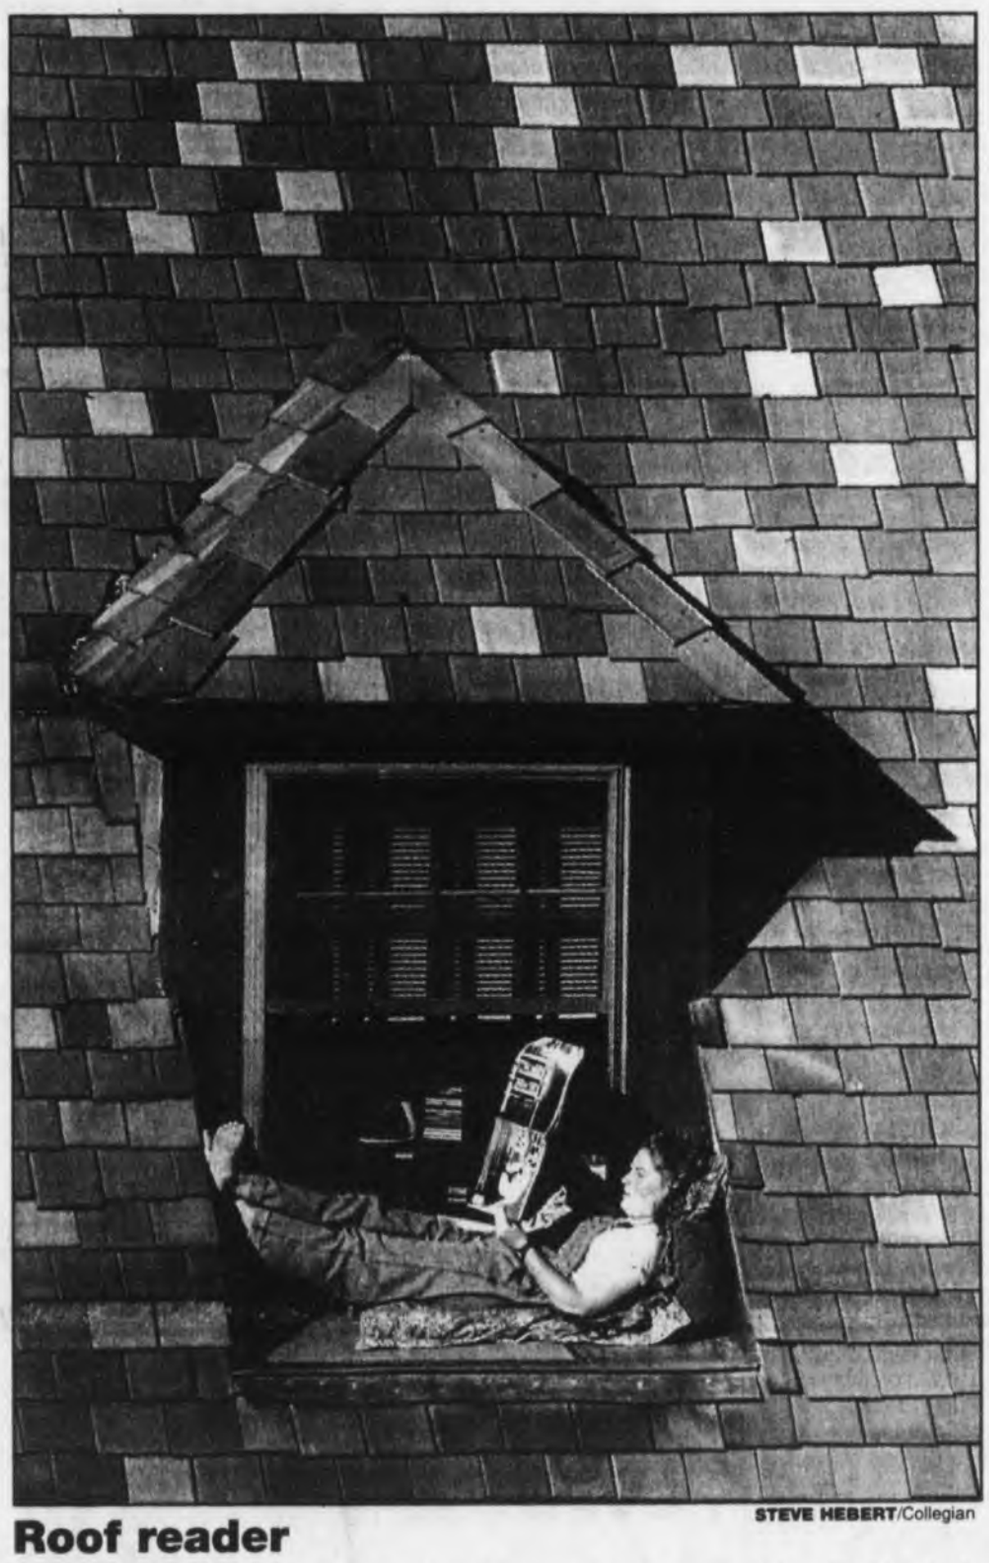
MacFarland also said her choice of friends made her a visible target for the KKK.

"I had many black friends, and I went places with them," she said.

One such friend was her traveling college-choir roommate.

"There were people who hated me because I roomed with her," she said.

She said that one time when the choir was in Atlanta, a wealthy banker, who was offering lodging to the choir, did not allow her roommate to stay in his house.



MacFarland told the banker that she wouldn't stay there if her roommate couldn't stay, as well.

"I was angrier than she was," she said.

MacFarland also helped with the integration of schools in Florida.

"When the schools opened, I was walking children to school and making sure that they got there safely," she said. "In some cases, we even bought them textbooks."

Perry to be 100th lecturer

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Secretary of Defense William J. Perry will present the 100th Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. March 9 in McCain Auditorium.

Perry

Perry is expected to comment on Fort Riley, ongoing negotiations with North Korea and other world events.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lectures, said Perry was scheduled to speak last fall. However, the lecture was postponed because of international events.

"When the Pentagon called and said they were looking at March 9 and asked if that would work, I said we would make it work," Reagan said.

Originally, William Raspberry, columnist for the Washington Post, was scheduled to speak at the 100th Landon Lecture. Raspberry has always been scheduled to speak on April 13, and it would have been coincidence if he was the 100th Landon Lecturer, because speakers are scheduled whenever possible, Reagan said.

"With the caliber of speakers we go after, we have to be very flexible," he said.

It is hard to schedule lectures because often the Landon Lecture will take an entire day out of

Senate to fund groups' newsletters

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

Student Senate doesn't usually fund newsletters, but it granted funding for them for two groups Tuesday night.

Funding for both newsletters was added to the groups' budgets through amendments.

Derek Kreifels, business senator, introduced an amendment for the College Republicans that would give the group funding for a newsletter.

"There are a lot of College Republicans who can't go to Monday night meetings, and the best way that the group has to let everyone know what's been going on is by this newsletter," Kreifels said.

College Republicans were granted $436 for Political Awareness Week and the newsletter.

The second amendment was for Students for Disability Awareness recommendation. The original recommendation did not allow funding for a newsletter.

Scott Rottinghaus, arts and sciences senator, presented a request for the money to be funded under the Shuttle Service.

The Shuttle Service is an institutional service that provides transportation around campus for disabled students, Rottinghaus said.

The newsletter is made available to disabled students to let them know about the Shuttle Service and other services on campus, Thuy

Groups see cultural differences, try to mend gap

MELINDA CARTER
Collegian

Africans and African Americans have similarities, but the relationship could be much stronger, said Samuel McCarthy, freshman in biological and agricultural engineering.

The African Student Union and the Black Student Union had a joint meeting Tuesday evening to discuss ways of bridging the gap between the two cultures.

Both ASU and BSU members recognized that differences exist among them, said Jawwad Abdulhaqq, freshman in political science and president of the BSU.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

"African and African American are two different things," he said. "There's an assumption that just because we're both black, we have something in common."

Siendou Ouattara, graduate student in engineering, said the groups should try to make an effort to recognize their similarities instead of emphasizing their differences.

"Let's try to see what we can do to come together. It's not because of our skin color, but you have to start somewhere," she said.

A panel of students and faculty consisting of both African Americans and Africans was present to help lead the discussion. They also emphasized that the discussion should come from the heart so everyone could get their true feelings out into the open.

Pierre Faa, graduate student in grain science, suggested that the BSU and the ASU first accept their differences.

"I think we have so much expectation with black Americans and black Africans, but we have different cultures," he said. "If we are trying to make a connection based on the color of our skin, then we are doing it for the wrong reason."

Many said they felt the primary problem was not necessarily between cultures but rather between people in general.

"It's like any group, whatever culture. You're going to have to get out there, and you're going to have to say hello," Dwain Archer, adviser for the BSU, said.

Johnnie Montgomery, junior in psychology, said the two groups need to accept those differences and learn from them.

"The differences in the two cultures are fine," he said.

One of the members of the audience reminded the panel that there exists in some African Americans a desire to make a connection with the African continent and reflect back to their ancestry that does not begin with slavery.

Jessie Kwatamdia, graduate student in adult, occupational, continuing education, said beyond the scope of a greeting, there needs to be an understanding of each other.

"You can easily bridge a culture. If you don't talk to one another, you don't learn about one another," she said.

Kwatamdia supported her

Robin Lucas, owner and manager of My Place, stands behind the circular bar in her new location on Third Street. My Place moved from the east side of the K-177 bridge to the west side. Lucas said she hopes to make the forced move a positive one.

My Place finds new place for old tradition

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

This is the fourth in a continuing series of stories looking at how the building of a bridge is affecting the lives and businesses of the people in the area.

After a long, tiring day at work, most people like to kick back in the warm, friendly company of family and friends.

For the crowd down at My Place, kicking back with their friends almost became a thing of the past.

Robin Lucas, owner-manager, said about a year and a half ago the Kansas Department of Transportation came in and told them they were going to have to move.

The construction of the new Highway K-177 bridge has caused several businesses in the area to move and My Place is one of them.

Lucas said looking for a new place was not easy.

"Most places, the rent started from $2,000 and then went up. Other places just didn't want to rent to a tavern," she said.

MAKING WAY FOR K-177

After a year and a half of looking and having the 30-day notice to vacate extended, Lucas started thinking that My Place was going to come to an end. Then she finally found a place.

My Place signed a lease for the space where 3rd Street Pub used to be.

"We have remodeled and fixed it up," Lucas said. "We brightened it up."

My Place increased its square footage from 900 square feet to 2,000 square feet.

The increase in space has allowed for more room for the usual crowd and new comers.

"We have every type of person in here," Lucas said. "Everything from lawyers to bikers."

Lucas said the 3rd Street crowd and the My Place crowd combined to make the new My Place crowd.

"College kids are welcome, also, as long as they have an ID," Lucas said.

My Place has remodeled much of what was left of 3rd Street Pub, but has kept the old circular bar.

"The bar used to turn. It doesn't turn now, but one of the guys here at the bar says he is going to fix it," Lucas said.

Lucas said the customers really pitched in to help with the move and remodeling efforts.

Customers helped out with trucks, manpower, re-doing upholstery, and just general construction.

"They were all worried about losing their My Place," Lucas said.

Some of the new items that were added to the existing building were carpet, a new storage room, and 20 new bar stools that will not fall off the circular bar.

▶ KOCH, WESTERN RESOURCES PROMOTES ENGINEERING DESIGN IN FAIR

National Engineers Week was celebrated for the first time this week at K-State.

An activities fair was in the K-State Union Tuesday to help observe Engineers Week because it is now nationally recognized.

"This is the first large activity fair we've had. There have been small-scale activity fairs before," said Raymond Chow, graduate student in nuclear engineering and chairman of the Engineer Student Council E-Week.

The activity fair was sponsored by Koch Industries and Western Resources.

These two societies also supplied items to hand out during the fair.

Ed Chavey, fifth-year senior in architecture, represented The National Society of Architecture Engineers at the fair.

"Any exposure that can be given to different organizations can benefit the students and organizations together," Chavey said.

Chow said the fair promotes engineering and designs students have made.

The College of Engineering's organizations are open to all people on campus and are highly encouraged for engineering majors, said Roger Fales, junior in mechanical engineering and representative for the American Society of Mechanical Engineers.

"We wouldn't prevent anyone from joining on campus," he said.

Other activities will be going on during the week to celebrate National Engineers Week. All of the activities are being sponsored by the K-State Engineers Student Council.

On Wednesday, there will be a mousetrap-powered car contest at 6 p.m. in the Durland Atrium. Students will test cars they have designed to be capable of carrying a 2-kilogram brick exactly 3 meters.

"Terminator 2: Judgment Day" will be played at 8 p.m. Thursday in Durland 152 and can be seen by all K-State students to examine various engineering aspects in the movie.

On Friday, there will be an egg-drop contest at 11 a.m. in the Durland Atrium, where high-school students will come and design their own container to enclose an egg in. The eggs will then be dropped off the 3rd floor.

"The purpose of the contest is for the students to design the lightest container that will protect the egg," Chow said.

All of the activities help promote engineering in general, he said.

▶ FAMILY VOYAGE ENDS WITH BOAT ACCIDENT; ALL SUFFER HYPOTHERMIA

A family outing at Tuttle Creek ended in hypothermia for a father and two sons, but all three escaped serious injury.

The three were fishing Monday morning near the northern point of Tuttle Cove, said Larry Couchman, director of Riley County Emergency Medical Services.

The boat began to take in water about 10:30 a.m. and capsized in 25 to 40 feet of water.

The three victims stayed afloat by holding onto tree stumps, Couchman said. One of the sons was able to grab a flotation device from the boat and walk to a nearby house for help.

EMS crews then arrived and used a boat to rescue the two still in the water, Couchman said. The victims had been in the water about 45 minutes.

"All three of the victims had some degree of hypothermia at the scene," Couchman said.

Water temperatures ranged from 35 to 38 degrees.

"It starts affecting the body's reflexes fairly quickly at those low temperatures," Couchman said.

The three were treated and released from the Saint Mary Hospital, Carol Couchman, house supervisor at Saint Mary's, said.

▶ PRIME MINISTERS LOOK FOR PERMANENT PEACE

LONDON (AP) — Agreed at last on a vision for the future of Northern Ireland, British and Irish leaders embark Wednesday on the next difficult step toward peace: persuading Protestants and Catholics to sit down and talk.

"The objective that I have is to insure that what has been thus far a cease-fire is able to be turned into a permanent peace," Prime Minister John Major told the House of Commons on Tuesday.

The long-awaited document that Major and Irish Prime Minister John Bruton plan to release Wednesday in Belfast sets up a framework for negotiations and is likely to fall short of all parties' aspirations.

The intention is to accommodate the conflicting aspirations of a pro-British Protestant majority and a Catholic minority that wants to end British rule of Northern Ireland — the ancient grudge that sustained a quarter-century of violence.

The Irish Republican Army began a cease-fire on Sept. 1, and pro-British gunmen from the Protestant side followed suit in mid-October.

The cease-fires brought rapid changes.

British soldiers ceased patrolling Londonderry on Oct. 24, and daytime patrols ended in Belfast Jan. 15.

British officials began meeting in December with officials from Sinn Fein, the political party that supports the IRA, about the all-party negotiations.

▶ CAMPUS SAFETY

High-tech alarm cries wolf

MELISSA HOYT
Collegian

The state-of-the-art fire-alarm system that was installed in Calvin Hall may be making some noise now, but it can save lives later.

Remodeling of the fire escapes and the construction of the main entrance with the addition of an elevator has allowed the installation of the new alarm system.

"The new system is heat-and smoke-sensitive," said Dan Short, dean of the College of Business.

"When the sensor detects one of those two, the alarm sounds, the fire doors shut, and the elevator returns to the ground floor and shuts down," he said.

On Friday afternoon about 4 p.m., the alarms went off at Calvin. It was just a faulty auto detector.

Then on Monday, the alarms went off twice, about 4 p.m. and 11:30 p.m. The system was then turned so it was not on-line.

Simplex, the manufacturer and installer of the system, was expected to be at Calvin to look at the system sometime Tuesday afternoon.

The updated alarm system brought Calvin up to full fire code.

"That extra margin of safety is important to us," Short said.

Short said the beauty of the system is that it contains the fire within an area.

Because the alarms shut down the elevator, people not able to use the stairs could have problems getting to safety.

To solve this problem, a safety feature was added.

A trapped, hurt or disabled person has 12 rescue buttons stationed around the building to push.

These rescue buttons light up on a panel near the front door of the building.

When rescue teams arrive, they can look at the panel to see where the alarm is going off and if anyone is trapped in the building.

The update in the fire code is allowing the College of Business to also remodel the attic.

"Fire code didn't allow the attic to be furnished," Short said.

"We can now remodel the attic and put the student lounge, study cubicles and meeting rooms for student organizations up there," he said.

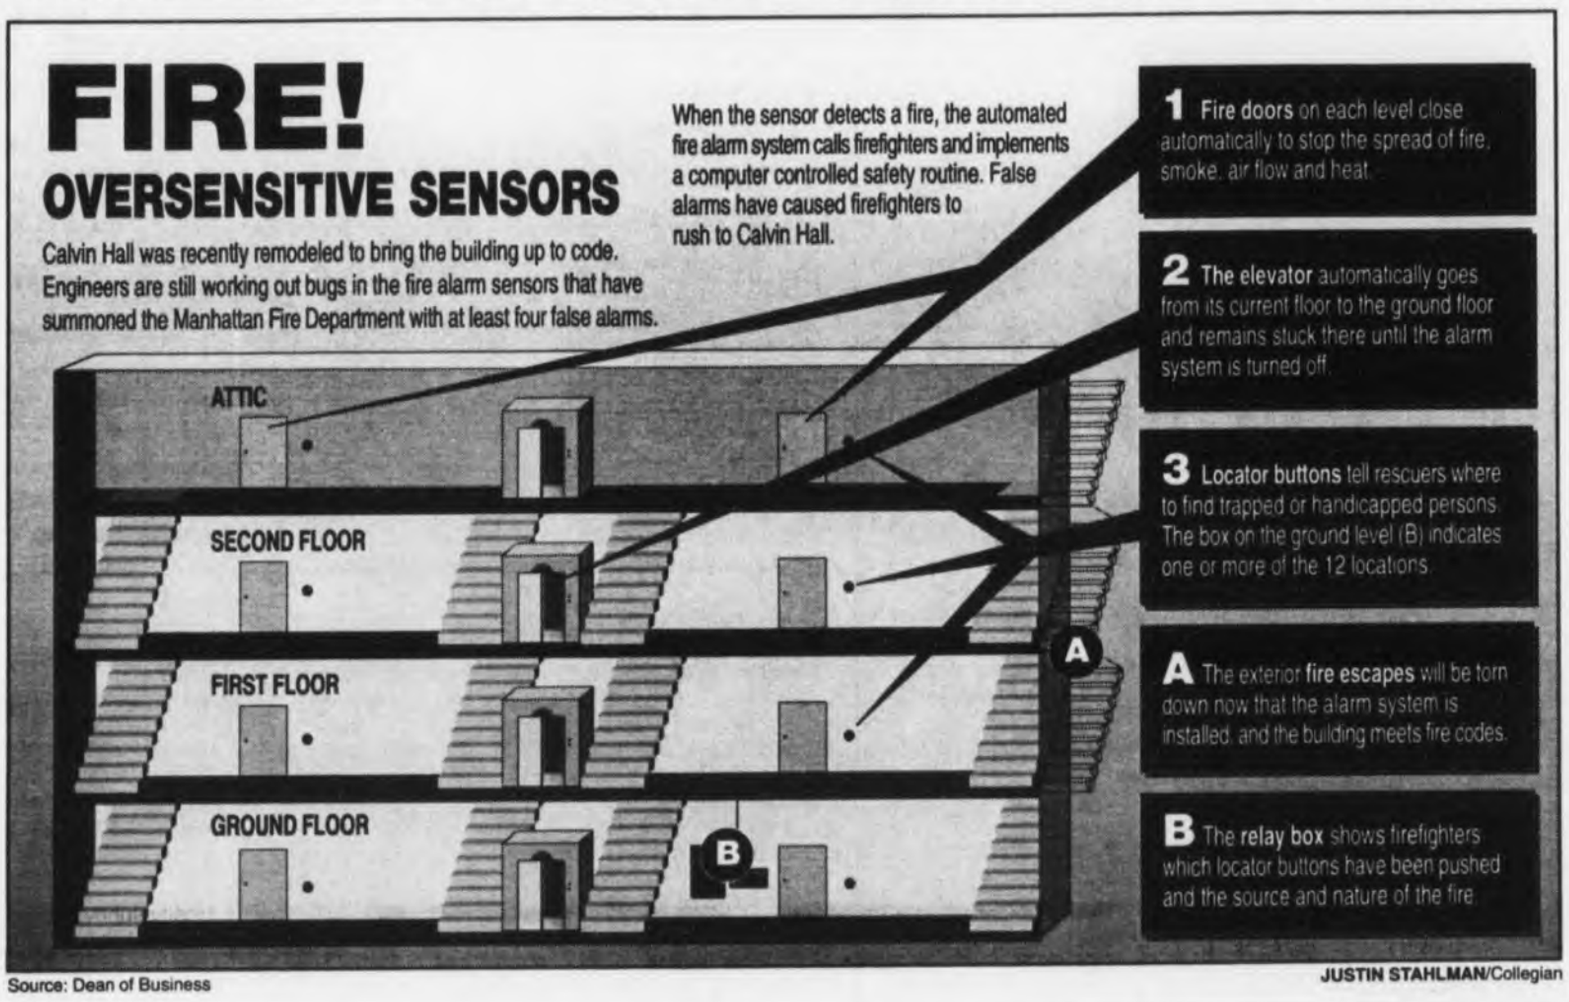
Short said the construction should start around July 1.

Short met with the architects last week.

Plans should be finalized soon, and bids from contractors will then be accepted.

"We are looking at a finishing date for spring '96, but realistically, it will probably be finished around March 1, 1996," Short said.

The update in the fire code also allows for the removal of the metal fire escapes on the west side of Calvin.



"We are waiting on the windows to be made that replace the current doors to the fire escapes," Short said.

The new system has the option to be connected to the K-State Police.

When an alarm goes off in Calvin, a panel at the campus police will light up and the dispatcher will be able to call the fire department.

Gerald Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect, said it was in the long-term plan to have all buildings on campus hooked up to the campus police.

Sales tax to aid development plan

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

City commission set a $2-million budget for the city's economic development plan Tuesday night.

The money for the economic plan will be raised from a half-cent city sales tax, which was approved by voters in the November election.

The money will be credited to the Economic Development Opportunity Fund.

The money will be used to try to bring businesses to Manhattan.

City Manager James Pearson said the 1995 budget amendment can not exceed $2 million. This figure is the expected revenue from sales tax in one year.

Any extra money received will go into next year's city budget, Pearson said.

The commission amended an ordinance to prevent people from parking motor vehicles on private property.

City Attorney William Frost said the ordinance amendment is a response to continuous problems with people parking in areas blocking driveways or on private property.

"It is not to solve parking problems in apartment complexes. To prevent outsiders from parking at apartment complexes, the complexes must have signs posted that indicate the property is restricted to the general public," Frost said.

The ordinance was amended to say permission from an owner or occupant is necessary before parking is allowed in a residential area or that the area must be open to the public, Frost said.

Cars parked on private property or in private driveways without permission could be towed according to the ordinance.

CITY Commission

Frost said the term public is defined as property devoted to any use other than single-family or two-family residential areas.

Confirmation of nine members to the Economic Development Opportunity Board was also approved. The individuals represent numerous professions and backgrounds across the community.

Mayor Helen Cooper who appointed the individuals, said the board is a good cross-section of the community.

"There were many people who applied to be on the board and all were well qualified. But unfortunately, only nine could be chosen to serve on the board," Cooper said.

Cooper said William Varney will act as chairman of the board.

▶ AIDS PATIENT TO GET BABOON MARROW

ATLANTA (AP) — In a sign of doctors' growing desperation in the fight with AIDS, a patient with the disease will soon receive a bone-marrow transplant from a baboon to rebuild his immune system.

The transplant, described Tuesday at a conference sponsored by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, is meant to resupply the human bloodstream with baboon blood cells, which do not get infected with the AIDS virus.

"Given the fact that there is no treatment for AIDS, people have been very comfortable with moving ahead," Dr. Suzanne Ildstad, who's directing the experiment, said.

"Pangols," their program for the current tour, is a West African word referring to the spiritual nature of all beings and things. Each dance in the program, whether telling a story or celebrating a movement or music form, explores the spiritual relationship between people and their environment.

"Senegalese dancing goes beyond excitement, way past zeal, far above frenzy, into some kind of kinetic nirvana. It erases that awful distance that so often creeps up between performers and audience." (Pamela Sommers, The Washington Post)

Proposal lets students go to Landon Lectures

Hopefully, the resolution will mean that the audiences will be filled with the people for whom the lecture was intended.

K-State will have another Landon Lecture on March 9. Will more students be able to go this time?

Student Senate is fighting the battle for us.

Last Thursday, a resolution was submitted stating that instructors who still had class on Landon Lecture days would need to arrange makeup procedures for students who wished to attend the lecture.

Instructors who do not monitor attendance would be asked to announce other lecture times so that students could make up the time lost.

A second resolution proposed that K-State students be given priority seating over high-school and elementary students who attend the lectures.

This seems fair because the lectures are supposed to be for K-State students, not their administrators or neighbors. Students actually are the ones most prevented from attending and getting decent seats.

The resolution will be voted on in Senate Thursday. Passing it would mean that President Jon Wefald, Faculty President Dennis Kuhlman and all the college deans would receive a copy.

Hopefully, the resolution will mean that the audience will be filled with the people for whom the lecture was intended.

Hopefully, students won't get cheated out of another one-time opportunity this semester.

Kansans obsess about taboos

Manhattan is overrun with hypocrites.

Any observant person who comes to Kansas can't help but notice the incredible obsession with taboos on smoking and drinking.

Kansas has had a rather inglorious history with vices, although most people pretend otherwise.

Kansas' legal age for the purchase of tobacco is 18. Nearly all K-State students are at least this age, but they can't buy tobacco anywhere on campus.

The state of Kansas trusts students and staff too little to make our own decisions about what we will and will not consume when we're on state property.

Puritans (the faction of conservatives and liberals who like to force their morality on everyone else) claim that secondhand smoke is the reason to keep tobacco off campus even though there is no decisive proof that it is causal to health problems.

Pipe tobacco, cigars and chewing tobacco have never been linked in any way to secondhand-smoke-related health problems whatsoever, but they are just as illegal as cigarettes here on campus.

Before anyone begins to think that no students or staff smoke pipes at K-State, it should be said that these are the words of a pipe smoker.

Some people foolhardily hide behind the Bible and more or less claim that Jesus and the surgeon general are in agreement on the morality of smoking.

What goes unmentioned usually is that smoking is in the same class of self-destructive vices the Bible warns against but doesn't name eating red meat in any reasonable quantity, diets of more than 30-percent fat content, not exercising and poor stress management.

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

Those who think smoking is a sin should give up hamburgers, get on a treadmill or shut their hypocritical mouths. Ditto for the people who want alcohol consumption to be a sin.

There is an incredible amount of drinking that goes on in this state in spite of all the Puritans' efforts to protect us from the so-called perils and sins of drinking.

Prohibition failed in the '20s. It has failed in its more modified form in Kansas, and it has failed in the so-called war on drugs.

Americans hate paradoxes and ignore them at everyone's expense.

Nonetheless, when the taboo on anything is taken away, there is inevitably a short-term increase in the once-forbidden activity and then a drop in the activity to levels that are lower than ever.

It's amazing what people won't do when they are told they can.

A perfectly good example of this is the rates of the disease of alcoholism in this country.

Most people don't know that alcoholism rates were highest during Prohibition. It's on the rise now among young people because prohibition exists for people below the age of 21.

Besides the legal taboo, there is also a social prohibition on drinking.

Consider the young man who goes out to get drunk on his 21st birthday, a very common experience in America.

One must really wonder if the true problem is not the objective newspaper account of this behavior, but rather the people who, in spite of probably indulging in some heavy drinking themselves at some time or another, sanctimoniously and publicly pretend their sins are better than his.

These people keep encouraging social prohibition that leads to a greater desire to drink and go against taboos.

They also ostracize people who do have drinking problems with their judgmental attitudes and narrow-mindedness instead of providing better avenues for help.

Who is responsible for the binge drinking that surveys say are on the rise on college campuses? Students are, of course.

Yet when college campuses in the United States are compared to those in countries that are less uptight (read: backwards) about alcohol, the United States almost always has higher rates of binge drinking.

This country comes out looking like hypocrites who pretend to believe drinking is immoral but do it anyway in staggering proportions.

Manhattan and the Midwest are no exception to the hypocrisy. After all, where are all the notorious party schools?

They're not in New York, Los Angeles or Chicago. They're in Oklahoma, Kansas, Indiana, Texas and Florida.

They're right where the Bible Belt fastens its buckle around its swollen waist.

What a non-coincidence.

The people of Kansas, including the people of Manhattan and K-State, need to accept that as long as they are puritanical about alcohol, tobacco and even drug use, abuse and related crimes will continue to skyrocket just as they have ever since legal restrictions were put on them.

Grow up, people. Live and let live. Butt the hell out already.

College ratings have dubious standards

KADY MASSEY

"I think that K-State has some of the best undergrads in the nation, but you'd have to sit in the classroom with them to tell," G.W. Clift, K-state instructor, said.

This quote came bubbling to the surface last week during a discussion in class with Clift about university ratings and who the "they" is that decides. Such as: "They say K-State has one of the best research programs in the country," or "I hear they say that you can major in bronc bustin' at Fort Hays State."

Not to invalidate either one of these claims, but who are "they" and what are they saying about other colleges? I feel that this is an especially crucial question to ask now, when ACT and SAT scores are being mailed out and high-school seniors are starting to consider universities. Most of us are already at the college of our choice, but can anyone honestly say they don't know anyone who hasn't transferred at some point?

Clift had considered the question of college rankings and had written an essay on the subject. He gave me a copy and suggested I look into it. So I did. Here's what I found.

I looked in the three most recent books I could find at Farrell Library for how K-State ranks nationally: "The Fiske Guide to Colleges 1995," which billed itself as "the highest-rated guide to the best and most interesting colleges in America," "Barron's Best Buy's in College Education," and "Peterson's Register of Higher Education." Upon cracking open these impressive works and flipping straight to the indexes, I found K-State wasn't even listed in the Fiske or Barron guides (KU was), and about all I could find in the Peterson's Register was where K-State is located and which majors we offered. So much for being interesting.

When I started reading to find out just what made a college interesting and affordable, some strange things came to light. The good people at The Fiske Guide to Colleges had the oddest criteria. They used things such as whether or not a student would need a car, the amount of social life available, and how recently the sports department had built any new buildings to measure a university's worth.

"Barron's Best Buy's" polled the deans of students at 400 four-year colleges. They also questioned the student government, undergrads on the campus newspaper and a representative sampling selected by the dean. To me, this sounds like stacking the deck.

From the 400 schools polled, Barron eliminated a hundred of them to present the 300 best buys in college education. To Barron's, a school that has two-thirds of the faculty with Ph.D.'s, half the freshmen graduate within four or five years and a "significant percentage" of the grads go on to the pursuit of advanced degrees within five years of graduating qualifies as a best buy.

All the schools mentioned in both books listed such useful criteria as how many books were in the library, the male-female ratio and which sports were the biggest on campus. Fiske and Barron both included quotes taken from students at these campuses to help present the college in the best possible light and give it that human touch.

I can see how such things could be considered important by some people, but when I read Clift's essay and thought about it on my own, I realized that in these days of the Internet and Interlibrary loan, all I really need is a modem and an address to get the Library of Congress in my kitchen. I've also always felt that anyone who chooses their college by the football rankings gets what they deserve. (I hope Boston College's enrollment has gone through the roof.)

Not to invalidate either of these claims, but who are "they" and what are they saying about other colleges?

To finish up his essay, Clift created his own ranking system to demonstrate just how stupid these things really were. He used such criteria as how close the college is to a large city and whether or not there is a literary magazine on campus.

He used his system to rank schools in Texas as the best for undergrads. The top five schools according to his system are: Le Tourneau, Prairie View A&M, (I haven't heard of it either), Sam Houston State, Southern Methodist and Southwestern. This just goes to show what a ranking system can do.

Actually, the more I studied all these books, the clearer it became that any school can be considered interesting or a best buy. I'm tempted to create a system that will rank K-State in the league of such heavyweights as Harvard, Yale and Brown Mackie Community College, just for kicks. Maybe I'll have a few friends over this weekend and do just that.

▶ ALCOHOL

Collegian showed insensitivity

Dear editor,

Within the week, the Manhattan Mercury carried headlines reporting that three 14-year-old boys had nearly died of alcohol poisoning and exposure, and the Collegian carried what essentially amounted to a full-page story giving us a chronicle of a college student's birthday celebration in which he drank seven beers and 16 shots over the course of about three hours. The Collegian article carried an "Editor's note: this article was not meant to promote alcoholism, but merely to show how one person celebrated his 21st birthday."

The story gave us a shot-by-shot report and, of course, included lots of reassurance that he was cared for by sober friends during the entire evening.

I suppose I should applaud the responsible way in which the celebration was conducted, but I simply can't get past the image of college students drinking to get drunk and the image of those 14-year-old boys wanting to become "men."

I suppose I should chuckle at the writer's creativity, but I simply can't get past what her purpose could possibly have been. There are literally thousands of stories that beg for a writer's sensitivity and skill in communicating. I suppose I should be pleased that the editors took the time to add the disclaimer, but I simply can't imagine that he really believed what he wrote. The influence that the mass media has in American society is certainly no secret.

I am disappointed by the entire incident. It suggests that "being there to get you drunk on your birthday" is the mark of a true friendship; that any story is worth writing and a simple disclaimer somehow exonerates editors from their choices. The timing of the article was incredibly insensitive to the families of the three boys as well as the Manhattan community. The space and prominence given to the article suggest either a lack of concern for or understanding of the responsibilities that journalists have to their society.

▶ STUDENT SENATE

SGA must monitor own budget

Dear editor,

I would like to take this opportunity to express my views regarding Student Senate's actions dealing with the allocations process, and I would like to comment about recent coverage relating to the Senate and its actions.

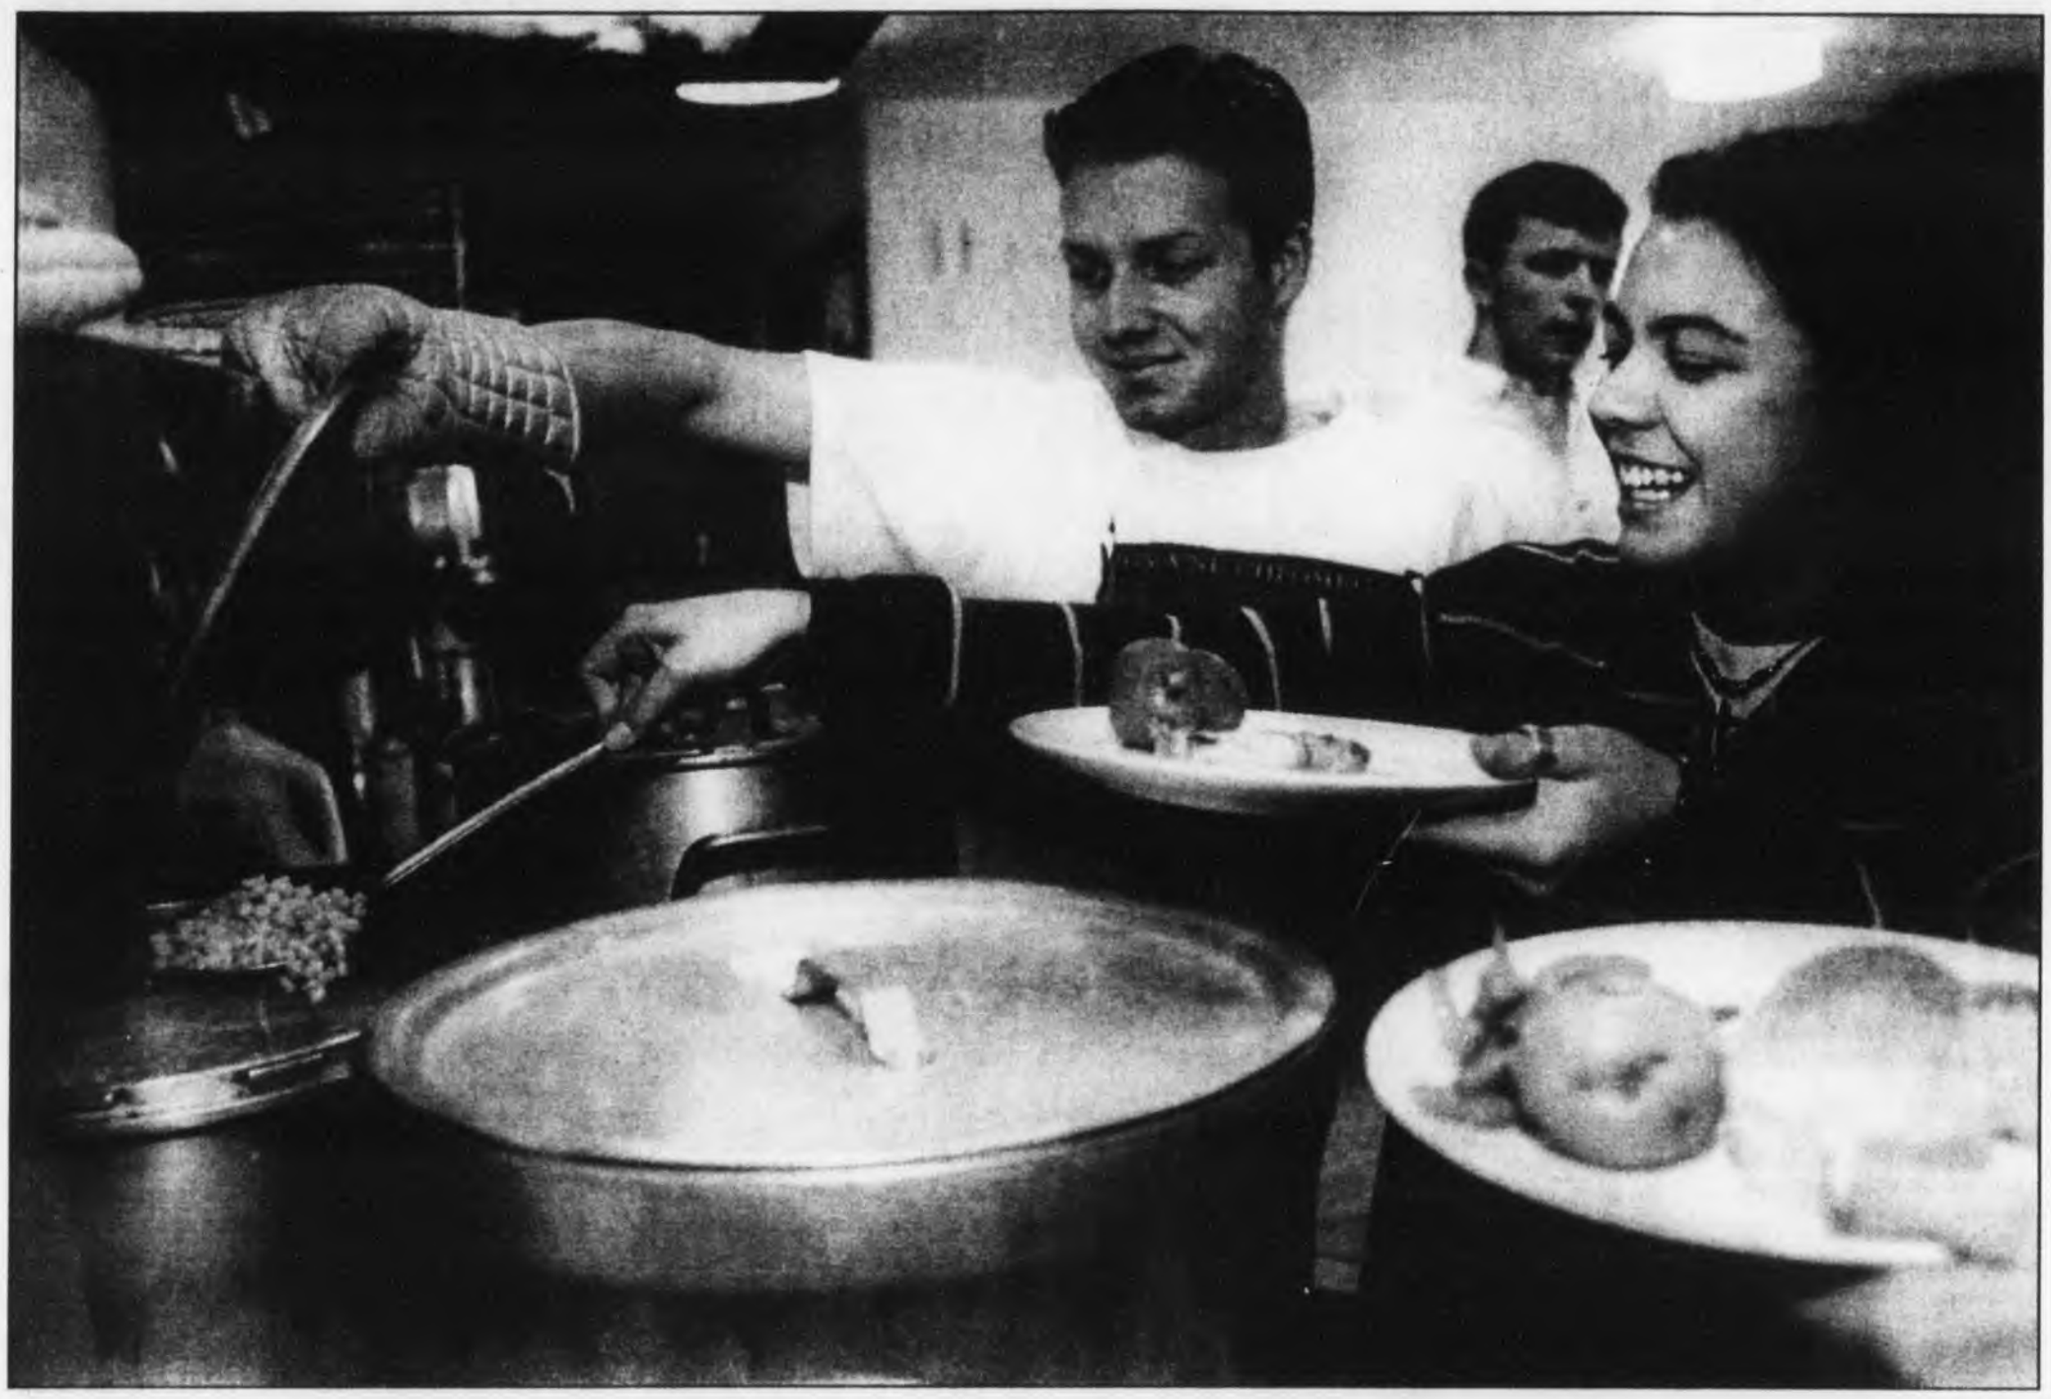
Recently, I read a letter about the Senate allocations process. I must respectfully disagree with a few of the points in that letter. I also feel compelled to explain my part in the Senate action of Feb. 9, when we dealt with the budget of the Office of Student Activities and Services.

At the outset, I want to publicly commend the Senate Allocations Committee for working long and hard on the budgets. They did cut their quested level of funding for OSAS. Personally, I wanted to see the committee cut even further. But they did not, as is their prerogative. Myself and others then exercised our constitutional rights by amending the bill on the Senate floor. So all parties were acting properly, within the governing rules of SGA.

As for the comments in the letter, it was stated that "it was inappropriate to single out one of the six institutional services that Student Senate funds on the day its budget was to be reviewed and approved." While I certainly respect the right of others to opine, I would simply state that it is my opinion that the Office of Student Activities and Services should receive scrutiny from outside sources. We should, in my eyes, strive to run our affairs at a higher level because we are the governing entity of the student body. To cry foul when light is shed and dialogue is initiated on a process that few students understand is not fair.

"I hope we can all remain respectful and professional in the process."

TRENT LEDOUX
senator, College of Agriculture



It was also stated in the letter that the Collegian printed a "glaring inaccuracy" when it was written that "it is unfortunate that Senate treats its budget differently than the budgets of other groups that come before it." I will concur that the OSAS budget did go through the same legislative process as all other budget requests. However, it is obvious to me that the OSAS budget was not cut as deep as some of the budgets submitted by other groups. Let's be honest. There are groups that have and will come before the Senate to request funds, and their budgets have been recommended for OSAS. Is this what students want their dollars going to?

As for my part in the recent budget meeting, I supported many of the amendments offered that cut the budget. I voted aye on amendments that cut student salaries because I do not believe that big bucks directly correlate with excellent service. I feel that students want SGA to live within its means. Is it unfair to ask the student governing body to live and operate with the $131,895.93 that was allocated last year? How many student groups get a big boost in their budgets in a year? Is it fair that OSAS takes such a large piece of the pie with regards to the student activity fee?

These questions prompted me to vote aye on well-conceived, rational amendments, which sought to further increase an already bloated budget request. I stand firm behind my votes and welcome any questions, comments or criticisms about my actions. You see, I pride myself with being willing to listen to all sides of an issue.

Even last Thursday, I listened intently to all points of view because those persons are entitled to think and say what they want. But when myself and others who agree with my position on the way Senate prioritizes it spending are chastised in memos and on the floor, it demoralizes the whole legislative process. See, I am just trying to do my job as my friends on the other side of the issue are trying to do theirs, also. I hope that we can all remain respectful and professional in the process. I want people to know I don't mind being referred to as "The Axe" because I know that my constituents want me to be prudent and careful with their money. Yes, it is the students' money! And if that means that I am not popular with the hierarchy and bureaucracy within the realm of student government — then so be it.

Sorority service

Houseboys serve food for about 130 women in the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority each week

Story and Photos by Cary Conover

▲ Melissa Enstrom, sophomore in kinesiology, helps herself to some corn as Chad Wilson, senior in management, assists her.

◀ Wilson serves dessert Wednesday evening during a formal dinner.

One male for every 21 females.

This is the ratio the six houseboys at the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority deal with in their jobs.

During the sorority's formal dinner every Wednesday evening, they nonchalantly zip in and out through the kitchen doors serving dinner, but without the macho attitude many might expect them to have.

"It's hard to get used to being out there with all those girls. You just gotta get to know them and become friends with them and quit acting like you're in a restaurant," Rick Smith, senior in graphic design and Theta houseboy, said.

On Wednesday nights, four of the houseboys dress up and work in the dining room serving food and refilling water glasses while the other two work strictly back in the kitchen.

"Sometimes it's nice working back here, and sometimes it's not," Smith said.

Regardless of what duties need to be done, the houseboys incessantly joke with each other, volleying comments back and forth and to members of the sorority.

"It's fun. There's nothing like being around 130 girls," Chad Wilson, senior in management, said.

But even with only about 100 women actually showing up for dinner each Wednesday night, the ratio of houseboys to women was still high enough to keep the houseboys busy.

"I was amazed that five or six guys could put on a show like this," Lorraine Harrington, Kappa Alpha Theta housemother, said. "I've got the best houseboys in town."

On normal nights, when only two houseboys worked, things became a little more hectic, and it was harder for the houseboys to cover the same ground with less help.

"You have to deal with them a lot more," Smith said.

Jeff Bartels, senior in agribusiness and head houseboy, said it is a job that must be done, regardless of its unique nature.

"You gotta be able to think for yourself," Bartels said.

"It's mostly hands-on. You're expected to do so much."

Smith said being a houseboy is harder than most people think it is.

"You can't be too shy," Smith said. "I'm sure it's really intimidating for some guys to come in and have all these women around. You kind of have to get used to it."

Even when Smith started two years ago, he knew about half of the women in the house, but it was difficult for him to adjust to being around so many women.

"It helped, but the first formal-dinner night was pretty nerve-wracking. I felt like I was on a stage," Smith said.

Harrington is in charge of the houseboys, and any prospective houseboy who applies is interviewed by her.

"Mom has the final say on who's picked," Smith said.

Harrington had previously worked as a housemother at the University of Colorado. She looks for people who need a job and are willing to work seriously.

"I've found that they have to have some sort of work experience," Harrington said.

She has hired some houseboys because they had worked in their fraternity's kitchen and would have no problem getting started.

Other houseboys found out about the job through some of Harrington's fellow housemothers.

"It's all who you know. I found out about the job through my housemom," Wilson said.

Once somebody is hired as a houseboy, he usually learns the ropes from Bartels. After that, he simply follows another houseboy around.

Most new houseboys are introduced to the sorority in an initiation-like manner.

"The girls usually take it upon themselves to do some sort of initiation," Bartels said. "It's usually just something to embarrass the new guy."

Bartels remembered a time when it was a houseboy's birthday. After the women finished singing "Happy Birthday," he walked back into the kitchen doors and fell on the floor because the other houseboys had locked the doors on him.

The busiest time for the houseboys is after the women have eaten.

As the women leave the dining room and prepare for their weekly chapter meeting, an entire room full of tables with dirty dishes awaits the houseboys. Then they take off their nice shirts and ties and really get to work.

While volunteering to be part of a skit, Russ Wilson, senior in advertising, laughs as Stacy Foulk, sophomore in business administration, sits on his lap after a formal dinner Wednesday evening. Wilson and three other houseboys volunteered to be part of the skit, which the Thetas were planning to perform at a fraternity.

BRIEFS & NOTES

KU wins in Bramlage

The streak will continue for another year.

K-State lost to Kansas 78-67 in front of a sold-out crowd at Bramlage Coliseum Saturday.

The Kansas win was the Hawks' 12th straight in Manhattan, which kept the Jayhawks at a perfect 7-0 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Despite being out-rebounded 44-36 and shooting a frigid 14 percent from behind the three-point line, the Cats stayed within 10 points for most of the game.

Starting at the 10:34 mark in the second half, the Cats went on a 8-2 run to make the score 59-58,cutting the KU lead to one. But the Hawks answered with a 16-5 run, which put the game out of reach.

K-State was led by Elliot Hatcher's 18 points and seven rebounds.

K-State will travel to Stillwater tonight to play the first place Oklahoma State Cowboys.

PHILL SPIKER

WILDCATS lose leads

This weekend's season opener against Oral Roberts saw the K-State baseball team pick up where it left off last year — in the loss column.

The Wildcats blew a 6-1 lead in Saturday's contest and went on to lose 8-6. The Golden Eagles walked away with a 14-9 victory Sunday.

Saturday's game saw K-State starting pitcher Eric Yanz allow just one run and three hits as his Cats clung to a 2-1 lead through the fifth.

The K-State bats finally got hot in the sixth inning, as the Cats scored four runs on two hits, powering them to a 6-1 advantage. But K-State couldn't hold on.

The Golden Eagles scored two runs of their own in the bottom of the sixth, then put the game away after a five-run eighth inning.

Todd Fereday was 2-for-3 on the day, while Hess went 2-for-4.

The Cats again jumped ahead early in Sunday's action, holding a 5-1 lead at the top of the fifth. But the Golden Eagles responded with five runs in the bottom of the fifth and seven more runs in the sixth to take a 13-5 lead.

K-State will be at home today against Missouri Western.

NICOLE POELL

TENNIS to host Lobos

After a two-week layoff from an 0-2 road trip to Utah, the K-State women's tennis team gets back into play with a home match Saturday against New Mexico.

K-State's No. 1 singles player, junior Karina Kuregian, is reeling after three consecutive losses.

After this weekend's match against New Mexico, the team will travel next weekend to Des Moines, Iowa for a pair of matches against Drake and Northern Illinois.

The team's record stands at 3-3 after the shutout in Utah.

Saturday's match will be the last time to catch the Cats in action at home until April 2 in their Big Eight Conference home opener.

The Wildcats were picked to finish third by the Big Eight Coaches, but Coach Cliff Rovelto said they could just as easily finish sixth.

"It is very close between third and sixth in the conference this season," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Ten points could possibly separate the two spots."

One event that stands out to Rovelto is the high jump.

Ed Broxterman, Itai Margalit and Percell Gaskins will join forces to represent K-State.

Broxterman and Margalit have already provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships with heights of 7 feet 3-3/4 inches and 7'1".

Gaskins cleared 6'11" in his first meet of the season Saturday at the KSU Open.

"The high jump really jumps out at me as an event to watch," Rovelto said. "Ed cleared 7'3", Itai is stuck on 7'1", but he's really jumping well, and Percell is just a phenomenal athlete."

Margalit has registered a height of 7'1" at his last four meets, but he said it doesn't concern him.

"It is not really a mental problem, it's more of a technical problem," Margalit said. "I've been trying to adjust my step, and hopefully, I'll have it straightened out."

The Wildcat high jumpers will have to overcome Nebraska's Petar Malesev and Sheldon Carpenter. Malesev owns the best jump in the NCAA this year with a leap of 7'5". Carpenter, despite injuries this season, has cleared 7'4".

The Wildcats have had their share of injuries as well.

Steve Duren, a transfer from Barton County Community College, has also battled injuries all season and has the capability to place well for K-State in long jump and the 55-meter dash, Rovelto said.

Women's team hopes to end NU's 15-year Big Eight Indoor reign

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

K-State's "best team ever" is trying to do something no team has done for 15 years — take the Big Eight title from Nebraska.

The Big Eight Indoor Track and Field Championships begin at 9 a.m. Friday at Ahearn Field House.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said the women's squad competing at the Big Eight Championships this Friday and Saturday is strong in almost every event.

"Quite frankly, I see it as a two-team meet," Rovelto said. "They will have some events they will dominate that we can't do anything about, but so do we.

"This is the best team I've ever had here."

"Quite frankly, I see it as a two-team meet. They have some events they will dominate that we can't do anything about, but so do we."

CLIFF ROVELTO
K-State track coach

The Nebraska women have not only won every indoor meet for the last 15 years, but also won the last 15 outdoor conference championships as well.

"I don't know of any other program at any other level who has a streak like this," Nebraska coach Gary Pepin said. "We've just had so many outstanding athletes come through here."

The Nebraska women dominate the throwing events.

Paulette Mitchell, Tressa Thompson and Dagmar Pesakova own three of the top four marks this season in the shot put and the top three marks in the 20-pound weight throw.

"On our team, we try to have balance," Pepin said.

"We feel like we have a scorer in every event."

Gwen Wentland and Wanita Dykstra own the top two clearances in the high jump with leaps of 6' and 6'4-1/2".

"She's improved tremendously," Rovelto said of Wentland. "She was a consistent 5'9" jumper as a freshman."

Rovelto said he was excited to watch Dykstra perform as well. He said at this point in her career, she is jumping higher than Wentland at the same point in her career.

K-State looks to be strong in the pentathlon and the sprints. Wentland's total of 4,115 at the Wildcat Pentathlon is the best in the conference this season. Teammate Jill Montgomery has the second-best total with 4,001.

"Jill has the capability of putting up an outstanding score, and she's second," Rovelto said.

"Gwen could put up one of the top three marks in the nation."

Karissa Owens has established herself as the top runner in the 55-meter dash with her time of 6.92.

However, Annette Hall and Kathy Travis-Miller from Nebraska are second and third in the conference with times of 6.97 and 7.01.

"We have to go and perform," Pepin said.

"If you go strictly by what's on paper, there wouldn't be any need for the meet."

If the two teams dominate the events, Rovelto said the difference in the meet could come down to the middle- and long-distance races.

K-State distance coach Terry Drake said this will be a challenge to his athletes.

"It's a little scary, really," Drake said.

"I'm trying to tell the kids how important their events are, but I'm not trying to put any pressure on them."

Irma Betancourt sits in third in the conference with a time of 2:11.55 in the 800 meters.

However, she is only a second behind Nicki Webber, the front-runner from Missouri.

Drake said Betancourt will also run the mile for the first time this year.

"She could win both races," Drake said. "She will have to work hard, but she is capable."

K-State will look to Belinda Hope to boost team totals.

Hope is undefeated in the 400 meters so far this season and has the top time in the event with 54.47.

"People are shooting for me this season," Hope said.

"I feel a lot of pressure, but I think I can handle it."

After finishing 13-45 the Cats are trying to Forget last season

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

Forget the 13-45 record.

This is a new beginning for K-State baseball, and Wildcat coach Mike Clark doesn't want his team dwelling on the past.

"We don't talk about last year," Clark said. "The first day of practice, we said that last year was last year, and I didn't want it mentioned. It's something that happened — something we had to go through."

It's also something that Clark doesn't want to go through again this year.

But Clark said he doesn't think that should be the case this season.

"We're cautiously optimistic," he said. "We like what we've seen so far. The players came back a lot better after working on their weaknesses this summer."

One of the primary weaknesses that plagued the Cats last season was their pitching — or lack of it.

"We weren't very successful in the pitching area last year, and one of our goals is not to go through the kind of situation we had last season," Clark said. "By the end of the season, we really didn't know where we were bullpen-wise when we'd go in there, and that's one area we stressed in the fall."

So what exactly did Clark do to help heal his hurting bullpen?

"We've brought in a lot of pitchers, and at semester, we had a lot of pitchers transfer in — pitchers we didn't recruit, they just came in," Clark said.

"And now we've got 13 guys that all bring it up to 80 to 85 mph with pretty good stuff. We've got a pretty good mix of left-handed and right-handed pitchers, so now it's just a matter of them executing in the game."

While Clark may be a little more confident about this year's pitching rotation, he said he doesn't know what his Cats will bring to the plate.

"Offensively, they're making a big adjustment because new assistant coach Rocky Ward is on board," Clark said.

"He's been teaching them a new hitting style and new hitting philosophy, which is an adjustment for them. So I don't know how they'll be coming out of the gate swinging. They've made great strides so far."

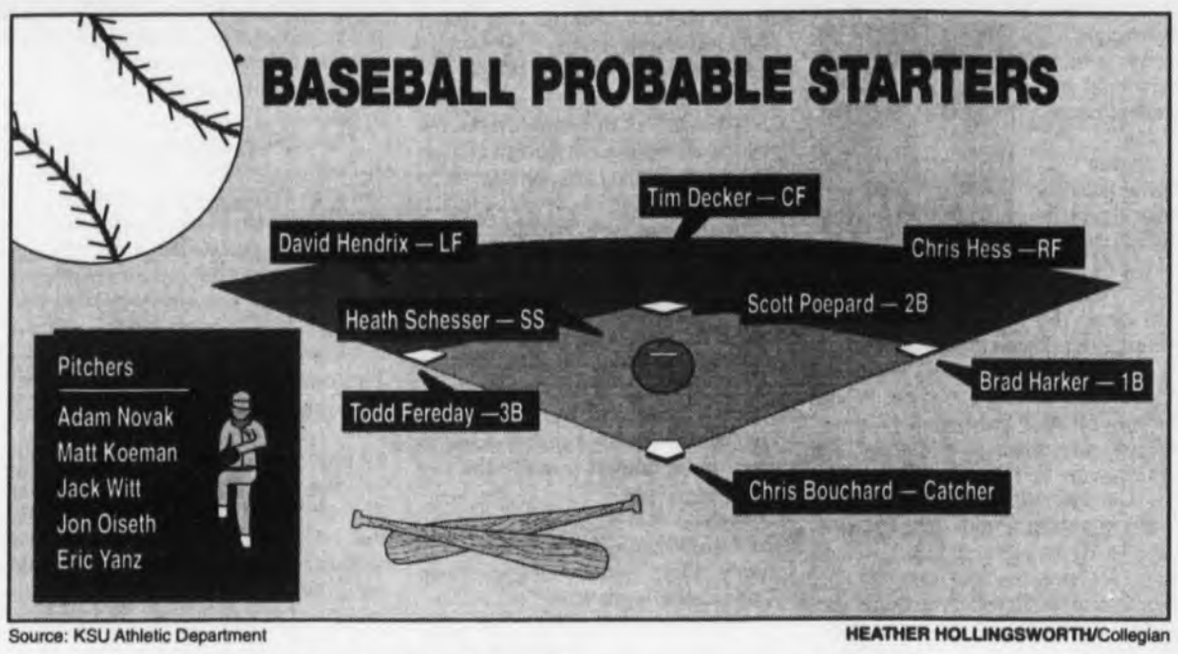
Clark said he's also confident that his team will make big strides in its overall play this year.

"Our guys went through the fall and did a great job," he said. "So we'll roll the balls out there, and I think we'll make a substantial move from last year."

So just how substantial of a move is Clark expecting?

"We're not talking about winning a certain number of games — we're not doing anything like that," he said.

"What we want to do this year is play nine innings every game. We'd win seven innings of a game last year, but we'd have that bad inning that would take us out of the ballgame. That's what we've been working on, and I think it's been working out really well so far."



Something that Clark also hopes will work out well for his team is its youth. The Cats return 18 lettermen and seven of eight position starters from last year's team.

But Clark said he thinks this season's squad, although still young, will show more maturity and poise on the field.

"I think in game situations, we've been through it," he said. "I don't think the kids this year will be nearly as in awe as much as they were last year. I think they'll be able to deal with adversity better just because of the experience they went through last year."

Clark also sees another advantage to his team's youth.

"We're still young enough that I don't have to worry about the guys going into bars when we're on road trips," he said. "As long as they card them, I'll be all right."

Wentland knew she had the talent to reach the top

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

Gwen Wentland can see the future, and good things lie ahead.

She owns the world pentathlon high-jump record, two Big Eight titles, a second-place NCAA finish — all of which she always knew were going to happen.

"I have these premonitions," Wentland said. "I always knew I would be great. I don't know why."

Even during her freshman year in high school when her best jump was 4 feet 11 inches, Wentland said she never had any doubts.

ONE on ONE

It didn't hurt that the summer after her sophomore year she cleared 5'10".

"I went to a track camp at Indiana, and the coach there gave me some information I wasn't getting from my high-school coach," Wentland said. "That's when I really started to turn it around."

Her leap of 6'4-1/2" this season is the best jump by any athlete in the United States.

"You have to put things in perspective," Wentland said. "It's nice to know that I've done this and that, but I have higher goals.

"I can't get too happy about what I've done because I know I can go a lot higher."

The world record Wentland broke this season also needs to be put into perspective, she said.

"When you compare it to the real world record, it's not all that great, but I think about all the people who have done the pentathlon, and no one has jumped as high as me," Wentland said.

Despite her tremendous talent in the high jump, she doesn't let the event rule her life.

"I try to keep my life varied," Wentland said. "It is not good to be consumed by something, that includes track and field.

"If you get obsessed with something, you get burned out and you get bored with it. I do track and field because I enjoy it."

Despite her best efforts not to let the sport take over her life, she said sometimes sacrifices must be made for the sport.

"When you take away things you enjoy for something else, I think you start to resent whatever it is you had to sacrifice for," Wentland said.

Athletes are often faced with this, but Wentland said it is just a part of being in the public eye.

Wentland said when she stepped into the sports arena, she knew that her actions would be watched more closely.

"Athletes are under the microscope. It's unavoidable," Wentland said. "On the other hand, sports people have doors opened to them that other people just don't.

"When people who don't really know me see me in Aggieville drinking a beer, they say, 'You're supposed to be in training.' I'm not sitting there with a pitcher getting stupid. I'm just relaxing, but because I'm an athlete, people assume that I'm doing something terrible."

Wentland has earned a bachelor's degree in sociology, and she is pursuing a master's in personnel and student counseling.

Wentland

"I don't know exactly what I want to do with it," Wentland said. "Nobody can tell the future, but it keeps me busy."

However, she said her counseling career will have to wait. When her eligibility is finished at K-State, Wentland plans to stay in Manhattan to train for the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta.

Wentland said to do that she will have to sign with a sponsor, which helps athletes pay for expenses as they compete in meets around the nation. However, they do not pay the athletes.

"When I was at the 1992 Olympic Trials in New Orleans, I was just happy to be there," Wentland said. "I had a good time, but I wasn't real serious about it."

Although there are many things to accomplish before the Olympics, Wentland said she thinks about it every day.

"I think 6'4" will be good enough to get in, but I hope to be jumping higher than that by the time the trials roll around," Wentland said. "I've had premonitions of representing the United States."

Iowa State, Nebraska favorites

Other conference leaders on the members of the K-State men's team are Travis Renner in the pentathlon, Marlone Davis in the 800 meters and Travis Livingston in the 55-meter hurdles.

All-American Dante McGrew has the second-best performance of the season in the triple jump, but he might be battling a sprained ankle.

"In 14 years of coaching at this level, I've never had a triple jumper compete the week before a conference championship, and the one time I do this happens," Rovelto said. "He tweaked his ankle, but he should still be able to compete."

Iowa State and Nebraska were selected by the Big Eight coaches to wage their annual war for the top conference spot.

Either the Cyclones or the Cornhuskers have won the title every year since 1983, when Kansas took home first.

"When we looked at this team and looked what we had as far as athletes at the beginning of the year, I wasn't sure how good we would be," Nebraska coach Gary Pepin said.

"We really have a good men's team."

The Cornhuskers, much like their women's team, look to have a balanced squad. Rovelto said Nebraska has the capability of scoring in every event.

"We try to have a complete program," Pepin said.

"Sometimes it means giving up a top-caliber athlete in one area to get a couple of athletes to cover another two events."

Iowa State lost some outstanding distance runners to graduation, but Corey Ihmeis, Dmitry Drozdov and John Kilhonge are all in contention for victories in the mile, 3,000-meter and 5,000-meter titles respectively.

"Iowa State is very strong in the distance races again," Rovelto said.

Gogo Peters leads the charge for the Cyclones in the field events. Peters is second in the Big Eight in the long jump and first in the triple jump with a season-best leap of 52'1/2".

However, Nebraska's Robert Thomas owns the top spot in the long jump with a leap of 26'2-3/4", and the third-best performance in the triple jump with a leap of 50'6".

"We may finish really well at this meet and then not so great at the NCAA Championships, but regardless of what happens, I feel we have a great men's team," Pepin said.

TODAY'S MEDITATION

by Newton McPherson, philosopher and cat owner

Today, I will face the world with the confidence that comes from knowing that my armpits have been deodorized. I've learned to bathe more regularly, and now I am using deodorant. No more dirty looks and winces will come from classmates when I raise my hand to answer questions from the lectern. No one can take away my confidence now.

Bachelor seeks casual relationship

Dear Cassie,

Hey, I was wondering something. I was dating this girl for a while, and things got a little too long-term, if you know what I mean.

Well, what I am looking for is something casual-like. Not too heavy. But I've noticed that girls don't like it if you just want to hang out, drink together and maybe have sex. I'm just wondering if I am a typical male pig, or are there girls out there that would be interested?

Signed, Bachelor and Happy

Dear Bachelor,

I am sure there are plenty of girls out there who are just as into the casual thing as you are, but I wouldn't recommend it if I were you. Not only is it unfulfilling and shallow, it just gets old after a while. You'll realize there aren't many women who like to play that game, especially as you get older.

'Brady Bunch' unrealistic but really neato

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER
Collegian

MOVIE REVIEW

A groovy time can be had at the happening new movie "The Brady Bunch."

It's not just the story of a lovely lady who was bringing up three very lovely girls, nor is it the story of a man named Brady who was living with three boys of his own.

This film seeks to parody the fads of the early 1970s, which was when the TV show, "The Brady Bunch" was at its apex, as well as the fads of today.

This is the Brady Bunch living in the Southern California of the '90s.

While everyone else has moved on to flannel, Birkenstocks and hair spray, the Bradys, portrayed by a new cast, still have the lambchop sideburns, Breck Girl locks, tab collars, polyester bell-bottoms and platform shoes they always had. In other words, they're anachronisms.

The premise of the show, honestly, is pretty dorky.

After all, no family could possibly be so stupid, naive, magnanimous and outdated all at once.

Besides, the kids of Southern California certainly would have murdered and dismembered one of the Brady kids by now.

People get beaten up every day for wearing the wrong brands of sneakers. Surely leisure suits would be grounds for execution.

Once you get past the unrealistic premise of the show, you can enjoy it.

The plot of the show is an amalgam of several TV episodes thrown together.

The central plot involves the family members trying to raise enough money to pay their property taxes so they can keep that outdated structure they call a house.

One subplot deals with the Bradys' avaricious neighbor's desire to turn the entire neighborhood into a strip mall. He's a real estate developer, and his plans are being thwarted by the Bradys' refusal to leave.

Another is about how Jan, the middle sister, tries to form her identity in the shadow of her prettier and more popular sister Marsha (or, as she says, "Marsha, Marsha, Marsha!").

The film replicates the old TV series in incredible detail. They use the same house, the same ugly furnishings and the same Astroturf lawn. Cindy still has a lisp. Peter's voice is still changing. Mike is still embarrassing.

Alice still has her romance going with Sam, the butcher, in this show. Alice almost gets caught by the Bradys in her black teddy when Sam comes by to make a late-night "meat delivery."

Cameo appearances are made by four of the original cast members — the old Greg, the old Peter, the old Carol and even the old Alice.

Once you accept that this movie is purely stupid, you can enjoy it for what it is — a joke on the ridiculousness of the '70s and '90s both with the Bradys bridging the two.

Have a far-out time.

Speech team sweeps tournament

JOE KLEIDOSTY
Collegian

The K-State speech team continues to live up to the tradition previous teams established at the University.

The speech team placed first at the Oklahoma-West Texas Speech Tournament Swing in Norman, Okla., Feb. 10-12.

Craig Brown, coach of the speech team, said six people were entered in 28 events at the tournament, and 20 of the entries made it into the finals.

"Just making finals is something to be excited about," he said. "Normally, if you break 10 or 12 entries to finals, it's a great weekend."

Brown said he is optimistic about the team's chances at the national tournament this year.

"It was a tournament that we use to point to nationals for, so it was a good sign that we did well," he said.

Brown also said he was excited to see so many different participants do so well.

"What it meant was it wasn't any one person who carried us," he said. "It was a really good sign that everyone did well."

Four K-State students placed in the top five in the pentathlon category. Students who compete well in at least five different events are eligible for this category.

"Someone can be good at one event, but it's impressive to be good at a lot of events," Brown said.

Jeni Pruitt, sophomore in speech and mass communications, placed fifth in the pentathlon category.

She said this year's team has become more unified because of the loss of Tim Schultz, last year's national champion.

"What was one person bringing in five trophies is now five people bringing in one trophy," Pruitt said. "It takes more of a team effort this year to get the results that we had last year."

Rachel Hart, senior in speech, said the team needs to prove so that they can continue the tradition of winning without a powerhouse like Schultz.

"If everybody does what they're capable of, we can have a stellar year," she said. "This team has something to prove this year."

Brown said 10 of the 19 people on the team have already qualified for nationals.

Those who have not yet qualified for nationals will get an opportunity to do so at district on March 4-5 at St. Thomas University in Houston.

"District is for the people who haven't gotten invited yet," he said.

Brown said the high caliber of the team this year has been bad in one respect.

"Since we have such a good team, we're kind of knocking ourselves off because we have K-State students competing against each other," he said.

Brown also said the team prepares for the tournaments by rewriting speeches, working on delivery, discussing interpretation events and preparing extemporaneous speakers for current-event topics.

Brown said the tradition and the talent and motivation of the students should propel the team into the top five in the nation again.

"We've finished in the top five in the last three years in a row," he said. "Our goal is to finish in the top five again, and I think we have a really good chance."

The team's next tournament will be at Ottawa University Saturday and Sunday

Professor still dreaming of world without hatred, distrust

In 1965, MacFarland had the opportunity to shake Martin Luther King's hand after a banquet honoring him for his Nobel Peace Prize.

"That was a thrill for me," she said. "He was, to me, one of the great, courageous figures of the time.

"King really did believe that we all are human beings," MacFarland said.

MacFarland said she wished that she could have gone to Alabama and other places to participate in the movement, but she was unable to.

"I just stayed right where I was and did what I could," she said.

She said she believed many of the things that King said would come true.

"I really believed that we'd only be judged by the content of our character and not by the color of our skin," she said.

"The ideal picture was that we'd all walk arm in arm."

MacFarland said she also supported King's philosophy of passive resistance, even though it took a great amount of courage and self-control to not lash back.

MacFarland said she is disappointed that not much came out of the hard work of the movement.

"As a young woman, I thought that by about the '70s, racism would be over," she said.

"It makes me sad that it's not over because I thought it would be over."

MacFarland said she hoped her children would grow up in a society with no racism.

"Now, there seems to be so much distrust and hatred," she said. "There's a lack of communication and kindness. We're such a divided country. It seems that, in many ways, we're even more divided now."

Alumnus to perform trombone recital

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

Old friendships drew a K-State alumnus back to campus for a trombone recital.

Jan Zubeck will perform at 8 p.m. Wednesday in All Faiths Chapel.

He received his undergraduate degree from K-State in 1976 and is now on the teaching faculty at the University of Texas at El Paso.

While at K-State, Zubeck studied under Jack Flouer, head of the K-State music department.

"I kept in touch with him over the years as with most of my students," Flouer said. "Music education is a one-to-one situation, and you get to know each other very well."

Flouer said he remembers Zubeck as being a perfectionist.

"He would get very upset if he missed a note," Flouer said. "He probably still does."

Zubeck said he chose to come back to K-State to perform because of the strong ties he has with Flouer and K-State.

"We had a fantastic jazz program at K-State," Zubeck said. "I played in the Concert Jazz Ensemble, the top jazz ensemble at K-State."

"We won the Wichita Jazz Festival and the Kansas City Jazz Festival all in one weekend," Zubeck said.

Zubeck does not remember actually choosing to play the trombone.

"My mom tells me I wanted to play the trumpet, but the band instructor convinced my parents and me to play the trombone in grade school," he said.

Zubeck has worked with numerous orchestras, including the Mid-Texas Symphony Orchestra, the Wichita Metropolitan Ballet Orchestra, the San Angelo Symphony Orchestra and the Harbor Playhouse Orchestra.

Zubeck's Wednesday evening program will include solo works for alto, tenor and bass trombone with arrangements by Ferdinand David, Jan Koetsier and Jean-Michel De Faye.

The program will have several past and present K-State trombonists performing with Zubeck. The trombonists will be performing several of Zubeck's own arrangements for trombone ensembles.

The program will conclude with Meredith Wilson's "Seventy-Six Trombones."

The recital is open to the public and free of charge.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

towards it," Tim Scanlan, Manhattan, said.

At the old location, My Place operated a kitchen for the lunch crowd.

"We are going to reopen the kitchen here as soon as we bring it up to health code," Lucas said.

"We served salads, homemade sandwiches, and usually had a special taco day," she said. "But first we have to put in a couple of sinks and then we will be ready for lunches again."

Work is continuing on the new My Place, but is not quite finished.

"We are working at it, but can't be everywhere at once," Scanlan said.

Another quality that My Place has is that it is one of the few places in Manhattan that has a Foosball table.

Foosball is a table game that is designed to be played by four people. It is a table soccer game. The object is to use the 'players' which are on sticks to hit the ball into the goal.

"The guys around here line up on Friday night to play," Lucas said. "It came out about 20 years ago when all these guys were 18 years old. They haven't grownup I guess."

While some things have changed at My Place, some things have stayed the same.

"It is still the coldest beer in town," Scanlan said. "The beer comes out of the tap at 36 degrees and you get a new iced mug with every new beer."

The old building that My Place was located in has been used for a grocery store, an antique store and finally a tavern.

It used to be the K-Hill Market. Then, after that could not make it any more, it was converted to be an antique store.

In the 1970s, it was converted to a tavern, which it has been ever since.

"It has always been a working man's bar," Scanlan said. " It is all about getting together with people."

The changes with the relocation have caused some stress though.

"Our rent went up three times, but our space doubled," Lucas said. "It was kind of nice to get out of the old place, we didn't do any remodeling because we knew that the place was going to be torn down."

Lucas is going to get paid for relocation expenses, but hasn't received the check yet.

She said the relocation check will barely cover the minimal cost of the move.

"But how do you get paid for all the stress?" Lucas said.

Lucas is a single parent and said the stress of the relocation process was great but the people at the bar helped out all they could.

"It will end up being better here," Lucas said, "But it will be different."

Lucas said that they used to sit out on the picnic tables and throw horseshoes. With the city ordinances, it will not be allowed anymore.

"We'll adapt to being city people, I guess," Lucas said.

the speaker's schedule, he said.

To save time, Perry will be flying into the area on a military jet, Reagan said.

After a unanimous vote in U.S. Senate, Perry was sworn in as secretary of defense on Feb. 3, 1994.

Perry, 67, also served as deputy secretary of defense from March 5, 1993, until his confirmation as secretary. Prior to these positions, he was chairman of Technology Strategies and Alliances, a professor in the School of Engineering at Stanford University and co-director of Stanford's Center for International Security and Arms Control.

Other degrees and honors include bachelor's and master's degrees from Stanford University and a doctorate from Penn State, all in mathematics. Perry also received the Army's Outstanding Service Medal in 1977, and the Department of Defense's Distinguished Public Service medal in 1980 and in 1981.

Perry has served on a number of U.S. government advisory boards, including the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. He is a member of the Committee on International Security and Arms Control of the National Academy of Science.

Buildings to be brought to code

"After the Anderson Hall fire, we knew we wouldn't be as lucky again that a student would run across campus to report the fire to the campus police," Carter said.

Carter also said the money from the Anderson fire helped with the purchase of the panel that the buildings will all be connected to.

"We are taking a little money from each construction project to help connect buildings to campus police," Carter said.

"It is the safest thing for students, faculty and staff," Carter said.

By improving the conditions in the buildings on campus, facilities' goal is to bring buildings up to full compliance of fire and building codes.

Some of the buildings on campus that are being brought up to code are Thockmorton Hall, Farrell Library, Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, the residence halls and the K-State Union.

Pham, program assistant for the group, said.

"The newsletter is very important to us. We also tell them about off-campus places to get their wheelchairs fixed if they need it," Pham said.

With the amendment, the group will receive $57 for subscription fees for magazines and $350 for the Shuttle Service and newsletter.

The other groups and amounts SGA passed were as follows:

- Amnesty International will receive $164 for a publicity campaign and a Human Rights Day speaker.
- Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students has been given $230 for a guest speaker.
- The KSU Environmental Professional group will have a series of speakers and a workshop with the $1,470 it received.
- Chi Alpha Christian Fellowship has been given $444 for a guest speaker.
- Hispanic American Leadership Organization will receive $1,745 for Hispanic Awareness Month and a recruiting picnic.

statement by suggesting when people enter a room, they only speak to or greet the people near them.

Ouattara said he agreed with Kwatamdia.

"Before we understand our cultures, we need to understand our history," she said.

Suggestions were taken from the panel members and the audience as to how the two groups could come to a better understanding of their similarities and cultures.

Kouassi Kouakou, graduate student in grain science, said ASU and BSU should take advantage of the role models within their group and invite them to speak at each other's meetings.

He also suggested taking advantage of KSDB-FM 91.9, K-State's student-run radio station, to talk to black students about their concerns.

Kwatamdia suggested more social gatherings such as dinners and parties.

Regardless of the primary purpose of the meeting or what they accomplished, Kouakou said he thought there was a greater point of interest.

"I'm not a black man. I'm not a minority. I'm a human being, living in this world," he said.

▶ STUDENT GOVERNMENT

SGA wins award for excellence

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

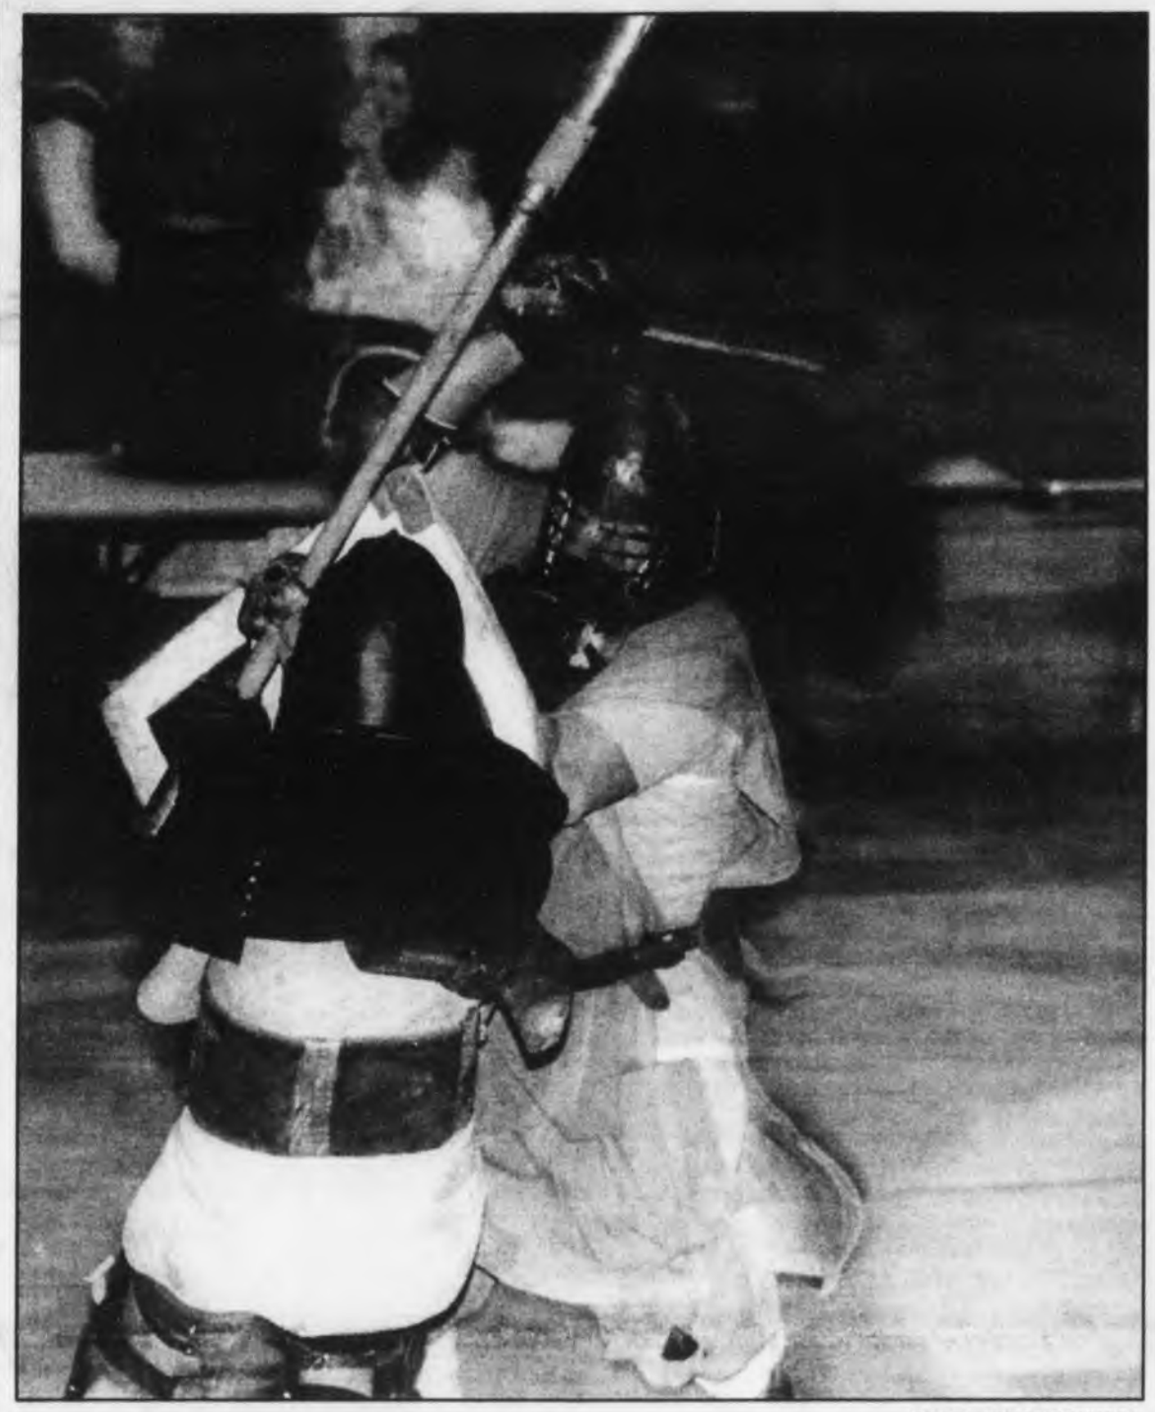
K-State has the one of the top student governing associations in the country.

The National Association for Campus Activities announced last week at a national convention in Anaheim, Calif., that K-State is the recipient of the 1995 Excellence in Student Government Award.

Competition was plentiful. More than 1,700 students and staff from more than 450 colleges and universities attended this year's convention, Tricia Nolfi, SGA adviser, said.

Clayton Wheeler, Student Senate chair, said a big reason K-State's Student Governing Association received the award was student involvement in the government.

"It's an opportunity for all students to get involved," he said. "Not all universities have that."



K-State's government is structured that way so SGA can be more effective with students' participation, he said. Student involvement during the past few years has been particularly strong on issues such as the plus/minus system.

Last fall's proposal would have made K-State's grading system similar to the one most people had in high school. For example, students would have been able to receive a C- or B+. Students and faculty defeated the bill by a large margin, Steffany Carrel, Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate, said.

"When major changes come about, it seems our students really get involved," she said.

Consideration for the award was based on criteria including understanding and addressing of student concerns, effectiveness of the student government related to their stated goals, and innovative services and programs initiated for the campus.

K-State's SGA was recognized for working with the University and state Legislature to fund the new library, restructuring the campus judicial program to be more fair and having open forums on campus issues conducted in a variety of locations, Nolfi said.

Men are clad in steel battle armor . Women weave, brew and cook, and archery is the hobby of the day.

Welcome to the Society for Creative Anachronism. Time: the Current Middle Ages.

Recreating the Renaissance, members of the SCA spend most of their time perfecting the arts and skills of the period.

"Any aspect of the Middle Ages — cooking, brewing, fighting — someone is studying it and recreating it," Holly Mayland, K-State alumna and SCA member, said.

Incorporated in 1968, the society recognizes a 1966 tournament in California as its founding date.

Students, faculty, citizens of Manhattan and Junction City, and many military personnel make up the membership of the society's local group, the Shire of Spinning Winds.

This is the first of a three-part series about the candidates for the city commission race.

Eight candidates have put themselves in the limelight and are dedicating their time to running for city commission.

Voters will be asked to choose their top three choices in the primary election Tuesday.

Six candidates will be chosen to continue their campaign for the April 4 general election, said Rich Doan, city clerk and assistant director of finance.

"The general election will be to elect three candidates to fill the seats available," Doan said.

There are two seats open for four-year terms, and one seat is open for a two-year term.

"The winners will be seated on April 18," Doan said.

Economic development, Fort Riley and K-State are some of the issues candidates are concentrating their campaigns on.

MIKE MANNING

Manhattan is a small town with several resources waiting to be used, Mike Manning said.

"K-State is one of the most vital areas in Manhattan. It's an institute of higher learning, not just for Manhattan citizens or Kansas residents, but for anyone," Manning said. "It provides arts, college athletics of a high caliber and a strong, educated work force that we don't take advantage of locally."

The Manhattan Municipal Airport is another resource that residents don't use to their advantage, Manning said.

"I'm sure most Manhattan residents have

School finance concerns for candidates

KRISTEN BRIGHTON
Collegian

This is the first story in a three-part series looking at candidates for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board.

Financial issues continue to be a top concern for candidates running for seats on the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board.

Issues of parental involvement and communication are among other concerns.

DEB NUSS

Deb Nuss, assistant director of the KSU Research Foundation, was appointed to the board in October 1994 after Jim Wittwer resigned.

She had run for that spot and lost in a close race to Wittwer.

Now she is running again on the issues of parental involvement, communication and district finances.

Nuss said parents want to see some changes, and the best way to understand and encourage those changes is by actively participating.

As a member of the board, she said she feels it is her responsibility to explain the effect of changes and decisions to the community.

"I know, as a parent, any concerns or questions I have had have been addressed or responded to," she said.

Nuss is concerned with the uncertainty of how Fort Riley's downsizing will affect the district's budget, which is already strained because of the state not changing its part of the budget for three years.

To counteract such budget strains, she said, the board may have to begin cutting programs or charging fees.

"These decisions will be tough unless the Legislature surprises us," she said.

Anita McAllister, graduate student in theater, helped black people register to vote.

Fighting racism through the power of the vote

Faculty member assisted with voter registration

CHRISTI WRIGHT

One K-State faculty member recalls a time in Birmingham, Ala., when black people had to pass a literacy test to vote.

Anita McAllister, graduate student in theater, experienced the civil-rights movement firsthand as she grew up in Birmingham.

"When I was in the eighth grade, the philosophy of the NAACP was to use children in the protests. Martin Luther King Jr. thought this was a good idea because he knew children aren't afraid, and the police wouldn't hurt the children," McAllister said.

The civil-rights advocates would come to the elementary schools to recruit the children during their recess times.

"Skipping school to protest was the first lie I ever told my mother. I slipped downtown with the other children to help in the cause," she said.

Her first job was working in voter registration. During this period, black people had to pass the Alabama Literacy Test, which consisted of 100 questions that were designed not to be answered.

"I had that whole list of questions memorized so we could help the people answer the questions," she said.

The children of Birmingham spent their days downtown helping with the cause. She said they were always tired at the end of the day, but they always felt like they had made a difference.

"We would stay all day, and the churches would feed us lunch. Some people were afraid to talk to us. If they were seen talking to us, they would be threatened or they could lose their job," McAllister said.

McAllister grew up in the South during a time when black people couldn't enter white stores or restaurants. Sometimes this meant there wouldn't be Easter or Christmas presents for the family.

"If we went in a store, we couldn't even try on clothes or hats. If the

A Manhattan resident was killed when a cement mixer rolled on top of his truck earlier this week.

Eric Whitney Martin died 3:30 p.m. Monday at the intersection of 11th and Yuma streets. Martin was a K-State student in engineering.

Martin was employed as general manager of Pizza Shuttle in Manhattan for 6-1/2 years while he was attending K-State.

Richard Botbyl, Pizza Shuttle owner, said he and Martin had a close working relationship.

"We got along very well. He was a hardworking man who was devoted to his family," Botbyl said.

Martin's interests included spending time with his family, fishing, working on his computer and building wood furniture for his home.

Martin had been taking classes at K-State but was not enrolled this semester.

"Eric was a part-time student off and on, but he found keeping his family at a proper income level was more important than a degree," Botbyl said.

There will be a funeral service at 2 p.m. today at the Edwards-Yorgensen-Meloan Funeral Chapel at 1616 Poyntz Ave. Burial will follow at the Sunrise Cemetery.

▶ FORUMS SCHEDULED FOR CANDIDATES TO DISCUSS ELECTION ISSUES

Candidates for seats on the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board have two more forums before Tuesday's primary.

The Northview/Dix Neighborhood Association will be sponsoring a forum at 7 p.m. today at Northview Elementary School.

David Braddock, president of the association, said this forum would address questions of interest to the entire community but would also ask about issues specific to Northview area students, including elementary-student busing.

Braddock said his group would also like to give citizens without school-aged children a chance to ask questions.

The audience will be allowed to write questions down and submit them the panel for discussion, he said.

Wrapping up the week will be the PTA/PTO Elementary School Forum at 7 p.m. Friday at Amanda Arnold Elementary School.

Susan Oviatt, president of the Eugene Field School PTO, said this forum would address district-wide concerns such as budgets, Outcome-Based Education, Quality Performance Accreditation and parent involvement.

Oviatt said the city's PTO/PTA groups represent an entire range of religious and political beliefs, not any one extreme viewpoint.

The audience will be given a chance to write down any questions, and a moderator will select a broad range of questions from those to ask, Oviatt said.

▶ CLINTON FOLLOWERS BEHIND HEALTH PLAN

WASHINGTON (AP) — For some, getting inside to help craft the Clinton administration's health-care plan had to do with who they knew. For others, it simply was a matter of what they said in a newspaper article.

A review of government documents found that as the administration assembled its army of 1,000 or so health advisers, it compiled lists that emphasized the political connections of potential appointees.

One such list, titled "Request for Appointment as Task Force Consultants," recommended nine candidates — six of whom assisted President Clinton's 1992 election bid.

▶ BRITAIN, IRELAND REACH COMPROMISE

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Prime Ministers John Major of Britain and John Bruton of Ireland set out today toward a seemingly impossible goal — lasting peace in Northern Ireland.

After two years of private negotiations between their governments, Major and Bruton have struck a compromise between the province's two steadfast traditions, pro-British Protestantism and Irish nationalism.

But it remains to be seen which factions — if any — will embrace their framework for a Northern Ireland political settlement.

The document was to be unveiled Wednesday morning in Belfast.

▶ PILOT ENDS SUCCESSFUL FLIGHT

CHICAGO (AP) — He floated farther than any other balloon pilot, enduring temperatures so cold he had to hold his drinking water next to his body to thaw it.

When he finally landed in Canada Tuesday night after a grueling four-day flight that covered more than 6,000 miles, stockbroker Steve Fossett had become the first person to fly a balloon solo across the Pacific Ocean.

Cold and tired, Fossett celebrated as his 150-foot-tall helium balloon touched down on a muddy farmer's field in Leader, Saskatchewan, about 250 miles east of Calgary.

"He's very laid-back about it," flight manager Alan Noble said. "When he crossed the coast, he said, 'I've flown the Pacific. I'm over Canada.' No 'Whoopee!' or anything like that."

Fossett took off from Seoul, South Korea, on Saturday.

▶ SPEAKER ISSUES PLAN, WARNING

WASHINGTON (AP) — With the first 100 days of the Republican revolution in the House only half over, Speaker Newt Gingrich already is working on his plan for the next 265.

Gingrich, R-Ga., is preparing to distribute to Republican lawmakers this week a private memo outlining the House agenda for the rest of the year.

He also is issuing a warning, saying the provisions were popular, but spending cuts to back up those provisions may not be. The Gingrich plan recommends developing legislation for cutting capital-gains taxes and attacking racially based affirmative action laws. It addresses health care through measures designed to curb federal spending while making insurance coverage more available.

Gingrich warned members to expect special-interest lobbying groups to descend on Washington seeking to protect cherished programs.

Trio moving forward, pleases crowd

MARK GOODWIN
Collegian

Live grand piano could be heard above the usual sounds of rabble-rousing and merriment in Aggieville.

Until recently, a Beatles reunion at Memorial Stadium with the ghost of John Lennon may have seemed more plausible.

But Six Minutes Down, a band of three K-State students, plans to offer local music fans acoustic piano, guitar and vocals each week this semester.

The trio, composed of guitarist/vocalist Jay Szymanski, vocalist Jennifer Hall and pianist/keyboardist John Etzel, has been together since Etzel joined up with Hall and Szymanski last fall.

"The thing that makes us different is we play the newer stuff that comes out — Lisa Loeb, Toad The Wet Sprocket, stuff like that," Szymanski said.

Although the group focuses on cover songs, Szymanski said they have five or six originals in their repertoire.

The group's performance at Rowdy Trouty's last week kicked off with a cover of the 1991 hit "Losing My Religion." Covers of songs from the '70s, '80s and '90s followed.

Crowd favorites included several Indigo Girls covers, which highlighted Hall's vocal ability.

"She's got a beautiful voice. I love to listen to her. They could use a drummer though, to give more of a beat," Allison Laudermilk, sophomore in elementary education, said.

Karen Way, senior in biology and pre-med, said she agreed.

"If they had a drummer, I'd be out there dancing in two seconds, but they're still good," Way said.

Despite the lack of percussion, all three of the performers were skilled.

It was obvious Six Minutes Down has grown more comfortable performing together since last fall's open mike performances at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

Hall said the group, which took its name from a Denny's slogan guaranteeing prompt service, has taken a new direction since she and Szymanski teamed up with Etzel.

"I can't imagine not playing with John now that he's with us," Hall said.

Hall and Szymanski said the group will perform regularly on Thursdays at Rowdy Trouty's. They also play occasionally in Lenexa.

"They're the best band I've seen since 311," Terry Lillis, junior in business, said.

Although the comparison to the national recording artists who performed in Aggieville last semester may be a stretch, there's no doubt that Six Minutes Down pleased the crowd and created an enjoyable atmosphere in which to imbibe a couple of fishbowls.

So, if you like some musical accompaniment while you kill off a few non-essential brain cells, Six Minutes Down might be just what you're looking for.

KSU rodeo before spring break

STACEY HAGER
Collegian

The K-State Rodeo club will have its 39th annual collegiate rodeo Friday through Sunday in Weber Arena.

Dan Suderman, Rodeo Club president and a senior in animal sciences and industries, said the rodeo used to be during spring break, but the date for this weekend came available, and the club decided it would work better and attract more student-body participation.

"We hope to set an attendance record. My own personal goal is 10,000," Suderman said.

"A lot of people have worked hard. It should be really neat. We've tried to make it more of a show," he said.

Randel Raub, Rodeo Club adviser, said the rodeo will include bull riding, saddle bronc riding, bareback riding, team roping, calf roping and bulldogging in the men's competition.

The women's competition will include barrel racing, break away and goat tying.

The rodeo will include other collegiate rodeo teams from 12 to 14 different schools, Raub said.

Money raised from the event goes back to the rodeo club for participation in other rodeos, he said.

In addition to the rodeo, the club will also be sponsoring dances at Kickers Bar & Grill both Friday and Saturday evening.

Fellowship of Christian Cowboys is also sponsoring a Cowboy Church Service at 10 a.m. Sunday, Raub said.

Besides the three days of events, Raub said they will also have an Exceptional Rodeo and an Intramural Rodeo on Thursday evening.

The Exceptional Rodeo is for the children of Big Lakes Developmental Center and the Kansas Neurological Institute.

The performance for the children will include only the K-State rodeo team and is free, Raub said.

Kara Beth Lowe, sophomore in agricultural journalism and member of the rodeo club, said Big Lakes is participating in order to spark an interest for the children in rodeo.

"We try to explain to the children about the rodeo and answer any questions they might have," she said.

Raub said the Intramural Rodeo is new this year, and various sororities and fraternities are participating.

"It is just for fun. No one will get hurt," he said.

Suderman said the events for the intramural rodeo include things like riding a steer backward.

"This is something that is going to be a lot of fun, and we hope to continue in the future," he said.

KSU RODEO INFO

The Exceptional/Intramural rodeo is 7 p.m. Thursday in Weber Hall Arena, and admission is free. The Miss Rodeo K-State coronation is at 7 p.m. Saturday in Weber Hall Arena. The competition times are at 7:30 p.m. Friday, 1 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. Saturday and 1 p.m. Sunday in Weber Hall Arena. Tickets are $5 in advance and $6 at the door.

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

P.E. requirement needs alternatives

As it stands, only one course, Principles of Physical Fitness, satisfies the requirement.

P.E. survives at K-State.

A bill that would have eliminated the physical-education requirement failed in committee in Faculty Senate. With this failure, the requirement will remain unchanged. As it stands, only one course, Principles of Physical Fitness, satisfies the requirement.

While it is true that this is an informative, well-organized course, we feel that restricting the fulfillment of the physical-education requirement to only that course is unwise.

The kinesiology department here at K-State offers a number of low-level courses, all at a one-hour credit level, that promote physical fitness in different ways.

Some of these courses include swimming, softball, volleyball, judo, tennis, aerobics, jogging and weight training, among others.

Giving students a choice from the above courses would enable them to take a greater interest in becoming physically fit and would make physical fitness more relevant to them personally.

In addition to their basic subject matter, these courses address general health issues. For those students who do not have a strong preference for any specific activity, the basic course could still be available.

P.E. is a valuable requirement.

Allowing other courses to satisfy it would make it still more valuable.

Meaning of tolerance has changed

JOHN HART

What is tolerance?

This is a question I've asked myself numerous times as I've seen tolerance become a dominant ethic among students. The whole issue of tolerance seems to be a part of almost any discussion about controversial issues.

In a traditional sense, tolerance is a respect for the views, beliefs and practices of others that differ from your own. This includes an ability to understand others and put yourself in their shoes. These are great character traits for anyone to attain.

However, the way tolerance is used in the university setting is often a great distortion of its essential meaning. True tolerance entails a respect for the dignity of human beings regardless of their qualities. The liberal conception of tolerance, on the other hand, doesn't merely ask for a respect of differences but often demands acceptance of the beliefs and practices of others. Any person or idea that opposes this is, of course, intolerant.

This species of "tolerance" is not tolerance at all, but totolerance; an ethic by which one group maintains complete control of debate under an intellectual dictatorship and bans all opposing views.

What liberals often mean when they preach tolerance is that you should be tolerant of all views except those they disagree with.

A good example of totolerance in action comes from the Mainstream Coalition, a new political-action group whose sole purpose is to harass political candidates who are religious conservatives. The group is not at all interested in tolerating views that differ from their own. They are only interested in banning certain ideas they dislike from the public sphere.

Other good examples of the hypocrisy of totolerance come from gay-rights crusaders. The goal of the gay-rights crusade is nothing short of a universal endorsement of the homosexual lifestyle. It's not enough for homosexuals to be respected as human beings — society must accept the gay lifestyle. Anyone who says "Wait a minute, homosexuality may be immoral" is labeled intolerant, hateful, bigoted and homophobic.

Imagine how absurd it would sound if Newt Gingrich threw up his hands in frustration and declared that anyone who opposed the "Contract with America" was intolerant, hateful, bigoted and republicanophobic. This is exactly what gay-rights crusaders do. Gingrich has a point of view just like the gay-rights people do. Because of totolerant ideal, the gay-rights crowd believes that they alone are justified condemning opponents with venomous language.

It is ironic that the same people who preach tolerance and condemn judgmental attitudes in others are themselves intolerant, self-righteous and judgmental when their views are contradicted. This again is not tolerance but totolerance.

Of those who disagree with the gay lifestyle, far more people are genuinely tolerant and respectful of homosexuals than those who are homophobic or hate gay people. Myself and many of my friends find homosexuality immoral but treat gay people with the same, if not more, respect than the average person.

People who are totolerant have confused genuine disagreement with hatred for the people that are being disagreed with. Totolerant people are also often the ones who preach tolerance the loudest but are themselves intolerant of other views.

It is also ironic that totolerant people often say that morality is relative to the individual and each person's values should be tolerated but they judge everyone according to their understanding of "tolerance." They are basically saying "don't you dare impose your values on us, but we can impose our values on you."

The great contradiction of totolerance is that it is an absolute moral standard in a world view that rejects absolute moral standards.

Not all liberal people who preach tolerance are totolerant. The growth of tolerance has fostered understanding and respect for differences, which is a first step in learning to love and care for people. Tolerance also encourages open-mindedness. However, we don't want to be so open-minded that our brains fall out. Hopefully, those who advocate tolerance can reject totolerant attitudes by simply being consistent in their beliefs and, in essence, practicing what they preach.

John Hart is a senior in political science.

New crime bills only endanger citizens

DAN LEWERENZ

The fun thing about democracy is that people will consistently elect a fair number of true idiots to high public office. Those idiots will do their best to make you happy, regardless of the consequences.

Need an example? Try virtually any national or state crime bill passed in the last dozen years or so.

Let's start with the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1984. Great name — who can argue with crime control? (Although I must admit that words like "omnibus" tend to scare me.)

Among the more popular provisions of the Act was the creation of the U.S. Sentencing Commission, a board formed to create uniform guidelines for sentencing in the federal courts. The Sentencing Commission and its new guidelines would replace the existing Parole Commission beginning in 1987.

It came as no surprise that this measure was copied in almost every state, including Kansas, within the next few years.

These guidelines were opposed by the vast majority of the federal court judges. They dramatically increased the length of sentences, virtually eliminated probation sentencing, abolished parole and removed judicial discretion from the sentencing process. Judges were asked to follow a chart to determine the appropriate sentence for every crime.

In the eight short years since the Sentencing Commission guidelines took effect, the number of inmates in the federal prison system has more than doubled, and the amount of money we pay to keep those prisoners behind bars has more than tripled.

All for a few votes. There was no cry from the criminal-justice system for a change in sentencing patterns; nor did the federal judges appreciate the change. A mere 6 percent of federal parolees were ever convicted for a second crime, and violent offenders in the federal system were ineligible for parole from the start.

But Congress was getting tough on crime. Democrats and Republicans alike participated in a mass rectal-cranial inversion, leading to an even more dangerous America.

Our federal prisons are terribly overcrowded, and we can't build more fast enough to house new inmates. As a result, the early release of violent offenders has become more and more common.

And we need even more politically motivated crime bills.

Locally, the latest bonehead blunder regards gun control, or the attempt at lack thereof. The Kansas Legislature is considering legislation that would legalize carrying a concealed handgun.

"This bill offers an opportunity for the citizens of this state to lawfully resist crime," Phillip Journey, Wichita resident, said.

But law-enforcement personnel and agencies, precisely the people who would love to prevent violent crime, overwhelmingly oppose the bill, citing the increased risk of accidents and the threat to officers.

"I cannot recall one single instance where an innocent citizen armed with a firearm in a public place successfully protected himself or herself from a criminal," Dan Menteer, Overland Park Police Detective, said.

The Kansas Highway Patrol and the Kansas Peace Officers Association also oppose the bill.

Nationally, the Contract for America is quickly becoming the Contract on America.

Democrats and Republicans alike participated in a mass rectal-cranial inversion, leading to an even more dangerous America.

The House of Representatives recently passed a measure allowing federal authorities to search and potentially seize your property without a warrant. (Hey, boys — ever hear of the Fourth Amendment?)

Since search and seizure without a warrant are still unconstitutional, there is an escape clause.

The officer must be acting in good faith, unaware that he or she is doing something wrong.

You can be detained and your personal possessions searched without a warrant, and all the officer has to do is claim that he thought he was in the right.

Good call.

The FBI doesn't like it. In fact, Director Louis J. Freeh testified that the number of cases the Bureau loses because of illegally obtained evidence would be minuscule compared to the potential for abuse.

But we elected idiots. Let's hope the Senate thinks before voting.

Politicians are feeding off our fear of crime. But their "solutions" have only increased the danger, while threatening the individual rights of their constituents.

Dan Lewerenz is a senior in philosophy.

▶ BLOODMOBILE

Red Cross needs support

Dear editor,

We need the help of all the K-Staters this week at the Bloodmobile. Four to five years ago, the American Red Cross would collect between 400 to 500 units of blood each day. Yesterday, the American Red Cross collected only 106 units of blood. Although we do appreciate all the donors and volunteers, we need a lot more donations. Unfortunately, we are not capable of monetarily compensating you for your donation. Your personal donation of whole blood can save up to three lives. While plasma is important for medical research, your donation at the Bloodmobile can save the life of someone you know and love by supplying them with blood in an emergency situation.

Come to the K, S and U rooms in the K-State Union any time this week from 10:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. to volunteer your time or blood. Thanks for supporting the K-State blood drive.

Troy Diehl
junior in music education

▶ PARKING

K-State needs shuttle service

Dear editor,

Kurt Sivilich, in his letter that appeared in Monday's paper, proposed that the University provide a shuttle service to "outskirt parking lots for those students who detest walking." While I agree with Kurt's proposal for the shuttle service, I disagree with his implying that the motivation for students parking so close is laziness. I live eight blocks from campus and walk every chance I get. However, I drive during the winter because it is dark when I leave the house, and it is dark when I am ready to come home. I drive to be safe. I have tried to use alternatives to driving.

"The shuttle service should include the hours 5 p.m. to midnight."

KAREN CLARK
graduate student in marriage and family therapy

Unfortunately, the escort service does not extend that far off campus and, unless other ride arrangements can be made, I will continue to drive and park as close as I can.

Along with Kurt, I propose that a shuttle service be started on campus. This shuttle service should include the hours of 5 p.m. to midnight. This service should provide rides to outer parking lots as well as off-campus destinations. The university I previously attended had such a service, and it was greatly appreciated and used frequently by the students.

Minorities complain too much

Dear editor,

I am so tired of hearing about all the problems the black students seem to face within this institution. I'm not saying that all black students within this University cry foul, but there are those who are always crying about problems, and they are the ones who seem to dwell on them.

I'm sorry that some of the black students within the facility think that everyone is out to get them, but they have as many opportunities, if not more, than most of the white students. Minority students get privileges that we white students don't. For example: certain financial-aid benefits, acceptance into accredited schools based on their ethnicity, and basically everyone kissing their butts in fear of being accused of discrimination or being titled as a racist.

In Wednesday's Collegian, Shannon M. Cox claimed that the non-minority student population based their understanding of black experience on watching a Snoop video on MTV. What does a Snoop video have to do with understanding the black experience? I'm sure that most of the white student population has better sense than to compare the black experience to a rapper, just like I'm sure the black student population has more intelligence than to compare the white experience to Madonna.

I take the comments about the white and black populations to heart because I have lived both lives. But in the four years that I have been here at K-State, I have only heard one white student make a derogatory remark, compared with the multiple remarks I hear every day in the Union coming from black students.

Being raised in Miami, Fla., around a neighborhood full of minorities, married to a black man, and having a child with a bicultural background gives me enough experience to speak my mind. Every day, I'm offended by what I hear in the Union.

I feel sorry for the students who do nothing but complain about how they are mistreated. They talk about how white people put them down and take their opportunities away, when it is those students who discriminate and segregate themselves from the rest of the University.

Jeanne Lewis
senior in kinesiology

Letter showed intolerance

Dear editor,

I am writing again to the Collegian, only this time on a mission to educate and enlighten. After reading Kevyn Jacobs' last two columns and reading the letters generated in response, I felt that I had to make my voice heard once more.

Firstly, I commend Mr. Jacobs' courageous stand for issues which he feels are important.

Whether I agree or disagree with his lifestyle is irrelevant. As a citizen of the United States, he is guaranteed freedom of speech and expression under the provisions of the First Amendment of the United States Constitution.

Secondly, I take great offense to the hateful statements made by Joe Cummings. Not only is he spewing hatred and ignorance in his vitriolic diatribe, but he is also accelerating the deterioration of an already fragmented American society. (Note to Mr. Cummings: the last time I checked the U.S. map, Kansas was north of the Mason-Dixon Line.)

Intolerance coupled with racist animosity produces only negative results.

Finally, my last comment is directed towards the self-professed "Christians" who are preaching a gospel of hatred that is in direct contradiction with the Bible.

To see my point, they should read the First Epistle of John to see that GOD IS LOVE. (1 John 4:8).

Thank you, God Bless, and excelsior.

Freddy Lee Moore II
senior in secondary education and mathematics

▶ DRINKING

Drinking doesn't make an adult

Dear editor,

According to an article in the Feb. 17 edition of the Collegian, drinking to excess under the guise of a birthday celebration is "a sign of adulthood" and "the beginning of freedom."

"Drinking oneself into a drunken stupor is not a sign of adulthood."

JEFFREY PATTERSON
graduate student in journalism and mass communications

Asinine might be a more appropriate description.

Drinking oneself into a drunken stupor is not a sign of adulthood. Neither is the so-called magic number 21.

Two true marks of an adult are a mature sense of responsibility and self-control. Binge drinking demonstrates neither trait.

Though the Weekend section in the Collegian is a light-hearted look at K-State student life, the topic of drunkenness is not one to be taken lightly or portrayed glamorously, as evidenced by the DUI arrest reported on page 2 of the same edition. While the disclaimer printed by the Collegian addressed the seriousness of alcoholism, it did not justify this inappropriate and irresponsible attempt at humor.

Jeffrey Patterson
graduate student in journalism and mass communications

STOP. JAVA TIME

COFFEE SUBCULTURES ARE STARTING TO POP UP EVERYWHERE. WHAT IS ALL OF THIS JAVA JIVE ABOUT?

Coffee is a favorite beverage for a multitude of people.

For years, regular coffee has been associated with getting people motivated in the morning.

"I have to have a cup of coffee in the morning to get me going, and I really enjoy the aroma, too," Judy Schurle, keyboard operator in grain science, said.

The trend now seems to be changing.

"We noticed it took about three years after we opened in 1987 before coffee really caught on in Manhattan," Bonnie Zack, manager of Espresso Royale Caffe,, said. "At first, it was mainly students. Now, we have a more diverse crowd."

More and more people are drinking not just coffee. They are drinking many types of coffee as an any-time-of-the-day drink instead of just in the morning.

"After dinner, I drink coffee pretty much all night long," Jane Strobel, junior in English, said.

New types of coffee, such as espresso, cappuccino, caffe latte and caffe mocha, have begun to take the place of regular coffee in recent years.

The difference among each of these beverages is in the way they are prepared.

Espresso, or dark-brewed coffee, is a 1-ounce cup of strong coffee. It is also the name of the preparation of a rapid, high-boiling method that forces steam and boiling water through coffee grinds.

Americans wanting to tame the bite of espresso make a concoction called caffe latte.

The French and the Italians drink caffe latte in the morning with breakfast.

Caffe latte is a concoction of 7 ounces of steamed milk for every ounce of espresso.

Caffe latte also comes in many flavors, not just the regular coffee taste.

"Raspberry latte is really good. I get it most of the time," Strobel said.

Cappuccino, which is arguably the most famous coffee in America, is made from steamed milk that is added to espresso and topped with foamed milk.

For chocolate lovers, there is caffe mocha. Chocolate syrup, steamed milk and espresso combine to make caffe mocha.

Coffee mania started about 1985 and spread to the East, after a Seattle-based company set up shop. Star Bucks Coffee Co. was a coffee importer, retailer and roasting company that started the craze.

The Star Bucks Coffee Co. idea came from Italy, where coffee stands are common.

The taste and smell of coffee also play a big part of the enjoyment of coffee.

"Espresso and chocolate taste is addicting, and it has a very pleasurable smell, too," Melanie Dannatt, clerical worker at Fort Riley, said.

Favorite coffees people like are anything from a raspberry latte to espresso to cappuccino.

"Cappuccino is probably our most popular drink," said Lora Taylor, senior in human development and family studies and employee at Java Espresso and Bakery.

Atmosphere also plays an important part in the enjoyment of coffee.

"I like going out for coffee for the atmosphere, and there are usually interesting people here," said Walt Strobel, transfer student in business administration.

The rise in the popularity of coffee has been helped out by the emergence of the coffee house.

"What has helped the popularity of coffee is coffee houses. It is a place for people to get together and socialize," Zack said.

Kris Goering, senior in secondary education and French, said she liked to meet her friends at night to have a cup of her favorite coffee, vanilla cappuccino.

Going out more for coffee instead of making it at home not only has to do with socializing, but with convenience.

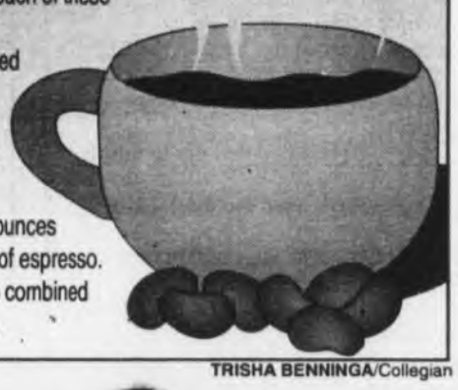
"I drink coffee mostly out because it's easier for them to clean their machine than it is for me to clean mine," Dannatt said.

Even though people are beginning to drink coffee all day, the most popular time still seems to be in the morning.

David Denning, sophomore in secondary education and employee at Espresso Royale, said that mornings are really busy, and business tapers off in the afternoon.

Business picks up at about 9 p.m., but it varies day to day, Denning said.

THE NEW GENERATION OF COFFEE



New types of coffee have begun to take the place of regular coffee. They are called espresso, cappuccino, caffe latte and caffe mocha. The difference between each of these is in the way they are prepared.

Espresso — a strong, dark-brewed coffee served in a 1-ounce cup.

Cappuccino — made from steamed milk added to espresso and topped with foamed milk.

Caffe latte — a concoction of 7 ounces of steamed milk for every ounce of espresso.

Caffe mocha — chocolate syrup combined with steamed milk and espresso.

Agler has women's program back on track

Susan Yow.

DEREK SIMMONS

Now there's a name plucked from the dusty, forget-me files of K-State.

OK, let me refresh some memories here.

Yow virtually destroyed women's basketball at K-State in three years for whatever reason, whether it was recruiting average players or not properly coaching recruits. She is the only coach in school history to post a losing career record in women's basketball.

K-State won a mere three of 28 Big Eight Conference games in Yow's last two seasons, including just one at Bramlage Coliseum. Wildcat basketball was sinking like the Titanic.

Brian Agler was called upon to keep the basketball boat afloat.

In his initial season, the Cats won five league games. This year, K-State is 14-10, 6-6 in the conference, and Agler has upped his career record to 27-24.

Not only did Agler patch the leak-bearing holes in the program, he's actually made it capable of producing some sizable waves.

Like the ones that washed out then-No. 15 Kansas and once-ranked Oklahoma State.

Has this program already been revitalized? Most certainly.

But not without some people rocking the boat.

Shawnda DeCamp, the Newcomer of the Year in the Big Eight and leader in conference scoring in 1994, quit after 17 games this season. Dee Ella Lewis dropped out just eight games into this year's campaign.

And following last season, five players opted not to return to the improving program.

But DeCamp's departure may have been the most disruptive.

In her 17 contests, she led the team in scoring five times, averaging 14 points per game — still second-best on the squad. DeCamp was a lively scoring threat, giving K-State an added dimension from the outside.

"She just decided that basketball wasn't for her," Agler said.

More turmoil set in at the beginning of the spring semester.

The Cats were 2-0 in the league and 11-4 overall but then lost five straight league games, starting with a 73-62 setback at Kansas on Jan. 15.

"Some changes were made," Agler said. "We were going through some tough times. Shawnda decided not to play."

K-State sported an 11-6 record with DeCamp and has compiled a 4-4 record since she left.

This is a bit deceiving.

Most of the wins with DeCamp in the lineup were against less formidable non-conference foes. The four losses without her include two to Oklahoma, which is second in the league, one to Colorado, 12-0 in the conference and No. 3 in the nation, and one to Missouri.

The Cats are now playing their best basketball.

"I've always liked this team," Agler said. "We have great people in our program.

"I was just always anticipating the time we were going to jell."

By "anticipating" the time it would happen, did Agler actually see it coming?

"Well, I didn't see it happening," he said. "And I was concerned about it early in the year."

No need for that now.

K-State has positioned itself to climb from fifth to fourth, possibly third, in the conference in the last two regular-season games.

Postseason aspirations are tangible as well.

"I feel good about our team right now," Agler said. "I think our chemistry is the difference right now. We've won a lot of close games.

"I see all the ladies improving individually and our team improving. They feel more confidence in themselves and in our system."

Agler described his "system" as one concentrated on team principles. "Team effort" seems to be a buzz phrase in Agler's vocabulary.

The statistics reiterate his concept.

Excluding Shanele Stires, the Cats' do-everything senior, and Brit Jacobson, no player has started every game.

Stires, averaging 18.9 points per game, has started in every contest at K-State but her first as a sophomore.

This, among other things, suggests a role-development strategy.

Stires leads in many categories, including points, rebounds and steals, but Missy Decker leads in assists and Lisa Gaitor leads in blocks.

And a stat sheet doesn't tell all.

"You see people starting to make plays," Agler said. "You see people starting to step up.

"You've got Brit Jacobson knocking in a crucial shot. You've got Lisa Gaitor hitting a big free throw. Shanele is getting a big rebound."

For some of the players, like Kjersten Larson, you won't know just how much they contribute unless you're there watching.

"Kjersten, you know, you look at a stat sheet and say, 'she must not be very good or very important.' But she is real important for us," Agler said. "She has leadership qualities on the floor.

"All of a sudden, someone makes a play here, and a play here and a play here," he said. "It all fits together, and it is all just as important."

And with time and with players adapting to the new methodologies of Agler, the program is bound to constantly mature.

"I see our program steadily improving," he said. "It's starting to show signs now."

More signs will come.

Stillwater, Okla. — K-State guarded Oklahoma State's main scorers well, so some unexpected players knocked out the Wildcats.

Bryant Reeves and Randy Rutherford were held under their averages so Terry Collins, Chianti Roberts and Jason Skaer picked up the slack.

O-State 70
K-State 46

The trio combined for 35 points as Oklahoma State beat K-State 70-46. The loss was K-State's sixth in a row and drops their record to 11-13 overall and 2-10 in the Big Eight Conference.

The Cowboys moved into first place one-half game ahead of Kansas with a 9-2 conference record and 19-7 overall.

"Skaer or whatever his name is came in and hit some threes and then 23 and 32 were hitting some shots and just all of them," Elliot Hatcher said.

Reeves, who two years ago was Big Eight Conference player of the year, did not get his first score until 11 minutes into the contest.

He finished with 17 points and 10 rebounds.

"I'm very pleased with the continued improvement of Jason Skaer and Chianti Roberts," Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton said. "I thought they really came off the bench tonight and played well at both ends of the floor."

K-State played well defensively in the first half, limiting the Cowboys to 25 points on 33 percent shooting from the field. The Cowboys took a 25-22 lead into the locker room at the midway point.

"We did a very good job against Rutherford both games, and we did a very good job against Reeves tonight," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "But when they get those guys off the bench and they are just knocking in threes. When those guys do that to you, you are in big, big trouble."

Belvis Noland led the Cats with 10 points in the first half. Noland pitched in defensively as well with four steals in the first half.

Noland hit four of his seven shots from the field in the half.

K-State shot 35 percent from the field in the half, but take Noland's shooting away, and the rest of the team shot 25 percent.

However, the Oklahoma State defense clamped down in the second half and limited Noland to four points.

"They don't give you open shots," Asbury said. "The thing that worried me most about OSU is that their defense is really good at home."

The Cowboys' defense keyed 16-6 run early in the second half which extended their lead to 41-28 with 14 minutes remaining in the game.

Reeves finally broke out during the run with three buckets during the run.

"They played great defense, I have to give them credit," Mark Young said. "We played hard, but we just couldn't get anything by them."

Young guarded Rutherford most of the game, limiting him to 10 points in the contest, half of his season average.

Constantly chasing Rutherford may have hurt Young offensively.

"I was playing hard on offense —I just couldn't get open," Young said.

"It was tough getting through all of the screens on defense, but you have to just keep competing and work hard.

K-State cut the Cowboy lead to seven points, 41-34, with 12:39 left after back-to-back scores by Hamilton Strickland and a bucket from Hatcher.

However, that would be the closest they would get for the rest of the game.

"They've improved a lot since the last time we played them," George Hill said.

"It's tough when you play hard and lose."

Hill shared duties guarding Reeves with Strickland and Tyrone Davis during the game.

"He moves around a lot," Hill said.

"He screens and posts you up all over. If you slack up, he'll get you every time."

The Cowboys maintained a 10-point lead midway through the second half before surging ahead with another 16-6 run. The run spanned five minutes and gave them a 61-42 lead with 4:57 remaining in the game.

Oklahoma State closed out the game by scoring the last nine points, including a three-pointer at the buzzer by Chianti Roberts.

"I thought defensively we played well the whole ball game," Sutton said.

"They only had 22 points at halftime. I don't want to take anything away from K-State's defense because their players do play good defense, and they play hard, but we just didn't execute very well in that first 20 minute period."

Asbury said K-State misses the defense of injured forward Demond Davis. Davis injured his ankle against Colorado Feb. 11.

His return at this point is uncertain, Asbury said, but he is hopeful he will return for the Cats' game against Nebraska Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We decided it would be useless for him to come down here tonight because he could get two more treatments at home," Asbury said. "We are hopeful he can return for the Nebraska game, but it's just one of those nagging ankle sprains and you just never can tell."

Cats sweep two from Missouri Western

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

There's no place like home.

K-State won its first two games of the season Wednesday with a sweep of Missouri Western at Frank Myers Field.

The Cats improved to 2-2 after losing two games to Oral Roberts last weekend.

The Cats won the first game 6-4. Junior Kevin Wicker started the game but didn't make it past the first inning. Wicker was pulled with two outs and the Griffons leading 2-0.

K-State coach Mike Clark said Wicker's poor start was caused by his inability to make the proper adjustments.

"He's had some trouble making some adjustments pitching-wise," Clark said. "We've just got to keep working with him in the bull pen. He's got nice stuff. He's just got a tough time putting it in the strike zone sometimes."

K-State struck back in the bottom of the first when Tim Decker scored on a Matt Miller ground out, making the score 2-1, Missouri Western.

But the Cats really opened fire in the bottom of the second when freshman shortstop Heath Schesser nailed a three-two pitch for a triple into the right-field gap for a three-run triple that made the score 4-2, K-State.

Missouri Western tied the game again in the top of the fifth on Steve Reynolds' two-run single. But K-State would break the tie in the bottom of the sixth on an RBI sacrifice fly by Chris Bouchard. The Cats added an insurance run on a Schesser single.

The Cats were led by Brad Harker, who went two-for-three with two runs scored, and Schesser, who went two-for-two and had a game-high three RBIs. The winning pitcher was senior Adam Novak (1-0).

In the second game, the Cats' bats came alive, pounding out a total of 10 runs on 15 hits and beating Missouri Western 10-3.

"We did a nice job with good clutch hitting, and they made great defensive plays," Clark said.

Not only were the Cats smacking the ball, but sophomore pitcher Eric Yanz, who is 1-0, shut down Missouri Western's bats.

"He was throwing the ball real well. He had some good stuff," Clark said.

"His pitch count was low. I think it ended up around 90 or 91 or something like that."

Yanz pitched a one-run, four-hit complete game, in which he recorded nine strikeouts.

But despite Yanz's domination of the Griffons, Clark said he wouldn't have hesitated taking him out.

"If he would have got in trouble that last inning, we would have brought someone in. But we wanted him to finish, and we wanted him to get the win.

"He pitched some great games for us last year and didn't get anything in the win column for it. We wanted to get the monkey off his back and get him a win."

Harker paced the Cats' offense in the second game, going three-for-four with four RBIs, including a three-run home run in the bottom of the first that put the Cats up to stay.

The Cats travel to Louisiana this weekend to play in the Lake Area Classic. K-State will open play against Oral Roberts on Friday.

DEAR CASSIE,

by Cassandra Duveaux

A good butt doesn't mean everything

Dear Cassandra,

I ask for clarification. I feel I have some of the qualifications women are supposedly looking for. I may not be Adonis, but I am good-looking. I have a body that earns appraisal when I go shirtless. I've had women comment positively on my behind.

I have had female partners say my actions are romantic. I know I am sensitive, or I wouldn't be submitting this letter to you. Yet, here I sit writing to you alone. Can you share some wisdom that may let me know what I'm missing?

Signed, All That I Can Be

Dear All That I Can Be,

Each woman is different, and each looks for different things. I do know most women look for intelligence, kindness and consideration. It's not your body that is most important. If you haven't found a woman who loves you for more, either you aren't looking in the right place or they aren't paying attention. Give it time — it'll happen when you least expect it.

West African dancing troupe to visit K-State

MICHELLE BELCHER
Collegian

The Le Ballet national du Senegal presents Pangols performing traditional West African tribal dances and live music at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Pangols, a West African tribal word, refers to the spiritual nature of all beings.

West Africans believe all things are possessed with different spiritual aspects of good and evil, and that these animate or inanimate objects control situations, outcomes, personalities and behaviors.

Pangols, which celebrates West African culture, is coming to K-State as a part of Black History month.

BALLET

Tickets for the Le Ballet national du Senegal are on sale at the McCain Box Office, Bramlage Coliseum, K-State Union Bookstore, Manhattan Town Center and Fort Riley. Tickets cost $15 for the public, $13 for senior citizens and $7.50 for students and children.

"I don't think one has to have African events just in February," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said. "It's just an appropriate time to recognize it in February."

Martin said he saw the Ballet national du Senegal about 15 years ago.

"They were marvelous, exciting and exhilarating," Martin said. "It is not something you forget about immediately after you leave."

The Ballet national du Senegal was founded in 1960 by the famous poet Leopold Senghor in Senegal in the same year Senegal gained its independence from France.

The artistic director of the company, Bouly Sonko, travels throughout West Africa and Senegal in search of potential company members. He visits little villages throughout the country participating in ritual feasts. New ideas for different performances can be gained from these village visits.

The company has had 20 sold-out tours in North America, but this is its first visit to K-State.

"It is appropriate for them to come to K-State. We don't get to see African companies very often," Martin said.

There are 11 different dances in the performance of Pangols. Each section tells a story or explains a relationship between humans and their environment.

The live music and dancing recreate the West African traditions for the audience. One song is dedicated to an African war chief who resisted French attacks on West Africa. Another performance invites the audience to follow a young girl frightened by spirits.

Unusual instruments are used to create the traditional West African tribal sounds. The kora, which is a kind of harp with 21 strings, plays soft musical sounds. A balafon, which resembles a marimba, is also used in the performance. Martin said the company prepares the stage with only a scenic cloth backdrop. Instead of using traditional sets, they dress the stage with props and use special lighting.

"This is the type of thing that should be available on college campuses," Martin said.

Society gets best of both worlds

vation for getting involved in the SCA was," Kraus said. "My sister also got me involved.

"For many, we are a spectator thing. For others, people want to know more. There is a certain perception that you have to be invited in. The only thing you have to provide is initiative."

Twelve kingdoms make up the society around the world. The Kingdom of Calontir is made up of Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa and Missouri. Kraus and other members of the Shire were hosts to a kingdom-wide tournament Feb. 11 at Fort Riley.

The tournament was titled the "Queen's Prize Tourney," a birthday gift to the queen of Calontir. SCA members from surrounding groups in the kingdom fought and competed in an arts and sciences competition.

Entries included brewing, metalworking, weaving and costumemaking.

Fighters spent part of the tournament in one-on-one battle using rattan swords on the dance floor turned tournament field at the Custer Hill Activities Center.

John Danos, director of Goodnow Hall, got involved during his junior year at Grinnell College in Iowa. Danos lived on a residence hall floor of predominantly SCA members.

"At first, my parents thought it was a bit strange," Danos said. "I've always been a history buff, and once my parents found out what it was all about, they were OK with it."

Some members work at Renaissance fairs, and Spinning Winds Shire gives presentations to area schools every year. Tournaments and other events are conducted both locally and throughout the United States.

"The schools always want us back," Kraus said.

Now concentrating on his career, Danos said he does not have the time to participate in many of Spinning Wind's or SCA activities.

"My involvement in the SCA has suffered. It's really impossible now for me to be active," he said. "My position as hall director — it's not so much a job, but a way of life. It's much the same for the SCA."

Danos said he doesn't think his membership in the club is unusual.

"Everyone has hobbies," he said. "The SCA just happens to be one of mine.

According to the Society's introductory guide, an anachronism is something outside of its proper time period.

Creative anachronism is taking the qualities of the Middle Ages and recreating them in the modern world.

"It's a double-edged sword," Michael Handly, Topeka resident and SCA member, said. "Your SCA persona and modern life tend to blend.

"I feel like it's the combining the best of the two, but it also bothers me because I've lost the sense of totally being someone else for a weekend. A lot of people use the SCA as an excuse to be someone or something else," Handly said.

Mayland said she realizes SCA isn't for everyone.

"Once you get into it, you find that you either like it, or it's just not for you," Mayland said.

not even flown in or out of the airport, and yet we fund it because it's nice to have," he said. "We need to be sure the money invested should match what we want out of it."

Manning views economic growth with the same attitude.

"I'm in favor of growth, but responsible growth," he said.

Manning said the problems Manhattan has had with the American Disabilities Act could have been avoided.

"I am 100-percent behind the ADA. All public facilities should be accessible to all citizens," he said. "This is the way it should have been when we started. If we would have taken the responsibility, then we wouldn't have these problems today."

Manning, a retired member of the military, said Fort Riley and Manhattan need to improve relations.

"We need to embrace Fort Riley instead of writing them off," he said.

Because of his military background, Manning has lived in numerous towns and cities, and he said Manhattan has several advantages.

"Manhattan has small-town flavor with the benefits of higher learning," he said. "This should help attract a lot of businesses that are in tune with what citizens want and what complements what the town already has."

JUSTIN KASTNER

Justin Kastner, junior in food science and industry, has lived in Manhattan all of his life.

"I sincerely feel I have a stake in this community," he said. "And I have a concern for the future of Manhattan."

Kastner

One of these concerns stems from the youth of Manhattan.

"We have youth problems like kids lighting fires at CiCo Park and signals of gang violence," Kastner said. "I want to push coordinating efforts of the city and county commissions, the school board and businesses. It's going to take a community effort."

One solution Kastner has proposed for youth is to create more activities.

"Living in Manhattan, there are always extra things to do with the University, but there's always going to be a party out at the lake or something else going on," he said. "There needs to be more activities to eliminate the problems. There just needs to be a few more alternatives."

Kastner said the quality of life in Manhattan is fantastic, but he is worried about job opportunities.

"The job opportunities aren't as competitive, and it's severely important to have a good job base," he said. "I think the money from the half-cent sales tax can be used to improve this, but I don't mean bring in 2,000 new factories. We need to be just as friendly to the old businesses."

Another job-related concern Kastner has is Fort Riley.

"The majority of jobs here depend on the government, like Fort Riley and K-State," he said. "The downsizing of Fort Riley is another concern I have for the future."

clothes didn't fit, we couldn't return them. If they would allow you to try on the clothes, the salesperson would enter the dressing room with you."

She said when black people went to restaurants that were predominately white, they had to place an order in a small window in the back of the restaurant and take the food home.

"It still bothers me to eat there now. Even though those windows are covered up, or the place has a new owner or name, I still think of how it used to be," she said.

McAllister was raised by her mother in Birmingham while her father was an entertainer in New York City at the Apollo Theatre.

McAllister said her mother was a nurse who worked on the black floor of the hospital in Birmingham. She was a respected RN, but was not even addressed by her first name.

For McAllister, recalling the memories from the past is not a painful process but an emotional one. McAllister became emotional as she shared her memories of several family members being killed for civil rights and as she recalled memories of her mother, who died last year.

"I remember one time when I was a child marching with my mother. She was hit in the head with a rock, and it knocked her down. A man in the crowd stopped to help her up, and later on, I found out it was Dr. King who helped her," she said.

The peace marches brought the community together and united them in the war zone in the streets.

"When we were marching, we weren't afraid. We linked arms, and if one person fell, we all did."

Being so active in the civil-rights movement as a young person also got McAllister into trouble. She was arrested several times for protesting.

"When the police would arrest the masses of people, there was no place to take all of them. One time we were all taken to a baseball diamond and were forced to sit in the bleachers," she said.

Getting arrested also stopped her and many of her classmates from graduating from high school. The students went through the graduation ceremony and were handed an empty envelope. Though some of the students went back to get their diploma, McAllister never did.

"It really bothered me at the time, but I don't want one now," she said.

McAllister has based a part of her acting career on her memories of Birmingham. She performs monologues that show the emotion of stories of real people who have faced some of the battles that she has.

She has spent a lot of time collecting the information for her monologues. She got to know Vivian Smith, a woman who sleeps every night on the street across from the Lorraine Hotel where Martin Luther King Jr. was shot. McAllister had to stay with Smith for a week on the street to gain her trust and get to know the woman.

Looking back at her past, she said she is glad she was involved and is proud of the great strides Birmingham has made.

"I never let my kids forget our past. I take them by the restaurants and places where we were treated so badly. It's like the Holocaust. This time should never be forgotten."

Candidates discuss communication, budget and sex ed

Nuss said she believes Outcome-Based Education is a practice that has always been done because teachers have always set goals and objectives for their students.

"For me, OBE is not something to be concerned about. We just gave it a name," she said.

She said she does believe, however, the board should communicate more with the community about OBE and other issues.

Nuss said she believes Quality Performance Accreditation is just one measure of the district, that QPA encompasses many things the district was already doing.

QPA is a state program to assess schools on the basis of student scores on assessment tests, instead of by the old method of counting more quantitative aspects of schools, like the number of books in the library.

LARRY WEAVER

Larry Weaver, professor of physics, wants to contribute to public schools. He said he felt he was well-served by public schools himself, as were his children.

He said he believes the district prepares students for college; however, he thinks improvement could be made in preparing non-college-bound students.

"We are all in this together," Weaver said.

Weaver

The flat budget is a real problem, Weaver said, adding that it is hard to give teacher raises and to buy supplies without budget increases.

"We are caught in between the rock of no change and the hard place of the inflating cost of business," he said.

Weaver's said he believes QPA is good in that it assesses how students are doing in basic skills, although he said he does believe it has some problems.

"Hopefully, we are going to wind up with a modification," he said.

He said he is glad, however, that the state's standards were higher than student scores.

"I am delighted we are confronted with standards of performance higher than what students are doing," he said.

He said he believes these standards will be a motivation for everyone to do better.

One of Weaver's problems with QPA has to do with the large amount of paperwork teachers must face.

"I'm in favor of teachers spending more time teaching," he said.

COLLEEN HAMPTON

Colleen Hampton, assistant scientist of agronomy, has three children in the district and a master's degree in secondary education, so she is taking a two-pronged approach to the campaign, as both an educator and a parent.

She said her biggest concerns are what is on the minds of the community, and these include OBE/QPA issues, Fort Riley downsizing and sex-education choices.

Hampton said she is unhappy with how her daughter at Theodore Roosevelt Elementary School is being assessed in school under OBE. She said her daughter isn't being assessed letter grades in basic skills.

Hampton

"To me, that report card is meaningless," she said.

The problem with QPA is the enormous amount of paperwork teachers are required to complete and file on each student, Hampton said.

"Where are we going to put it all?" she said.

Having a choice between an abstinence-based curriculum and the district's current sex-education policy is another concern for Hampton.

She said she doesn't see why it would cost much more or be too complicated to have two separate programs for parents to choose from.

"Pangols"

Thursday, February 23 at 8 p.m.
McCain Auditorium
Kansas State University
General Public $15
Senior Citizen $13
Student/Child $7.50

Twenty sold-out tours to North America should tell you what crowd-pleasers this company of 40 dancers, singers and musicians is. "Pangols," their program for the current tour, is a West African word referring to the spiritual nature of all beings and things. Each dance in the program, whether telling a story or celebrating a movement or music form, explores the spiritual relationship between people and their environment.

"Senegalese dancing goes beyond excitement, way past zeal, far above frenzy, into some kind of kinetic nirvana. It erases that awful distance that so often creeps up between performers and audience." (Pamela Sommers, The Washington Post)

For tickets call 532-6428 or come to the McCain box office. Box office hours: noon to 5 p.m. weekdays; from 1 p.m. before weekend matinees; and from 5 p.m. before weekend evenings. Tickets are also available at Manhattan Town Center customer service desk, K-State Union Bookstore, and ITR (Fort Riley).
Persons with disabilities call 532-6428.

Kansas State Bank, in cooperation with the Manhattan Arts Council, provides free bus service to series events for patrons 55 or older. For details, call Marie Dellen at 587-4000, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays.

Presented in part by the Kansas Arts Commission, a state agency, and the National Endowment for the Arts, a federal agency.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.
